MONDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1835.

The first session of the 24th Congress commenced this day at the Capitol. At twelve o'clock the Senate was called to order by the VICE PRESIDENT, when it appeared that a quorum of the Senators were in attendance.

The CHAIR communicated the credentials of the Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, elected by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March last;

Also the credentials of the Hon. NEHEMIAH R. KNIGHT, elected by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March last;

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the credentials of the Hon. GARRET D. WALL, elected by the Legislature of New Jersey a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March last; and

Mr. EWING presented the credentials of the Hon. JOHN DAVIS, elected by the Legislature of Massachusetts a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March last; all of which were read.

Mr. WHITE said that at the last session of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee he had been re-elected to the Senate of the United States for six years from the 4th of March last, but that the official information of his election was not in his possession. It had heretofore been the practice in the State of Tennessee to transmit to the presiding officer of the Senate the credentials of its Senators. But as this had not yet been done, he submitted to the Chair whether he should take his seat. During his attendance in the Senate he had frequently known such cases to occur, and that members known to be elected were suffered to take their seats before the arrival of their credentials. If any additional testimony was necessary in corroboration of his statement, there were some of his colleagues in the other House who were present when his election took place, and could vouch for the fact.

The CHAIR said that, if no objection was made, the gentleman could take his oath with the other Senators to be qualified.

The usual oath was then administered by the VICE PRESIDENT to Messrs. WHITE, HUBBARD, KING, CLAYTON, ROBINSON, and RUGGLES, whose credentials were presented at the last session; and to Messrs. WALL, KNIGHT, and DAVIS, whose credentials were just read.

Mr. PORTER reminded the Senate that at the close of the last session a committee was appointed on the subject of certain alterations in the arrangements of the Senate chamber. A report had been made by that committee, of which he held a copy in his hand; but as it had not been then acted on for want of time, and the officers of the Senate had, during the summer, made certain alterations in conformity with the resolution of the committee, it was necessary that the report should be at once considered. He accordingly moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report.

Regulation in Relation to the Senate Chamber, &c.

The report was then taken up, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

REGULATION IN RELATION TO THE SENATE CHAMBER, THE GALLERIES, AND THE REPORTERS.

The circular gallery shall be appropriated for the accommodation of ladies, and gentlemen accompanying them.

The reporters shall be removed from the east gallery, and placed on the floor of the Senate, under the direction of the Secretary.

No person, except members of the House of Representatives, their Clerk, heads of Departments, Treasurer, Comptroller, Register, Auditors, Postmaster General, President's secretary, Chaplains to Congress, Judges of the United States, Foreign Ministers and their Secretaries, officers who by name have received, or shall hereafter receive, the thanks of Congress for their gallantry and good conduct displayed in the service of their country, the Commissioners of the Navy Board, Governor for the time being of any State or Territory of the Union, such gentlemen as have been heads of Departments or members of either branch of the Legislature, and, at the discretion of the President of the Senate, persons who belong to Legislatures of such foreign Governments as are in amity with the United States, shall be admitted on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WHITE offered the following resolutions; which were considered and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress is assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate ordered that the Chair appoint the committee.

And Mr. WHITE and Mr. KNIGHT were appointed a committee to wait on the President.

Mr. EWING rose and stated that he had, at the close of the last session, given notice that he should, early in the present session, ask leave to introduce a bill to settle and define the northern boundary of the State of Ohio. He gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce this bill on Monday next.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, in the following terms:

Mr. President: I am directed to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that JAMES K. POLK, of Tennessee, has been elected Speaker thereof; and that it is now ready to proceed to business.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8.

BENJAMIN WATKINS LEIGH, a Senator from Virginia; BEDFORD BROWN, a Senator from North Carolina; WILLIAM R. KING, a Senator from Alabama; HENRY CLAY and JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, Senators from Kentucky, appeared.

Mr. MANGUM presented the credentials of BEDFORD BROWN, of North Carolina, elected a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March last.

Mr. SOUTHWARD presented the credentials of BEN-JAMIN WATKINS LEIGH, of Virginia, elected a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March last.

WILLIAM R. KING suggested that his credentials also had been issued.

These three Senators were then qualified.

Mr. WHITE, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and to inform him that a quorum had assembled, and was ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, reported that the joint committee had performed that duty, and had received for answer that the President would make a communication to the two Houses this day at 12 o'clock.

A message was then received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his secretary, which was read; and, on motion of Mr. GRUNDY, 5,000 extra copies of the message, and 1,500 copies of the accompanying documents, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. (See Appendix.)

Mr. CLAY presented the credentials of the honorable JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, elected by the Legislature of Kentucky from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March last; which were read; and the usual oath to support the constitution of the United States was then administered to Mr. CRITTENDEN by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, the reading of which was dispensed with, and the usual number of copies were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. (See Appendix.)

DEATH OF MR. SMITH.

Mr. TOMLINSON then rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: It has become my painful duty to announce to the Senate the death of the honorable NATHAN SMITH, late a Senator from the State of Connecticut.

Arriving in this city, apparently in the full possession and exercise of all his powers, my colleague and friend interchanged the kind salutations appropriate to the occasion, with the cordiality, and frankness, and vivacity, which characterized his social intercourse, and secured the attachment and confidence of those with whom he was intimately associated. He retired to rest on Saturday evening, as far as was observed, in the enjoyment of his accustomed health and spirits. Feeling indisposed, he rose from his bed, and obtained the advice of a medical friend, who subsequently left his apartment without the slightest apprehension of a fatal result. In a short time his altered appearance caused alarm, and his friend was again called. On his return, the heart had ceased to beat, and he expired in his chair on Sunday morning, about half past one o'clock, without a struggle or a groan. Thus unexpectedly and awfully was our late associate and friend summoned from a state of probation and trial into the presence of the Divine Redeemer and Judge, in whom he devoutly professed to believe and trust. May this renewed demonstration of the solemn truth, that in the midst of life we are in death, produce its proper effect on our hearts and lives, and be instrumental in preparing us for the judgment to come and the retributions of eternity.

The afflictive event which has cast such a gloom over this body cannot fail to excite profound sensibility and regret throughout the Union, as well as in the native State of the deceased, where he has long been ranked among her most able and distinguished lawyers and statesmen. While we lament the inscrutable Providence with humble submission, it becomes us to be still, knowing that the destinies of men and nations are in the hands of an omnipotent and holy God, whose dispensations are merciful and right.

State of Michigan—Michigan Senators.

[SENATE.]

With the Senate, sir, I leave the adoption of the measures requisite to manifest its high respect for the character and memory of the deceased.

Mr. SWIFT then moved the following resolutions, which were adopted unanimously:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the honorable NATHAN SMITH, which will take place to-morrow at 12 o'clock; that the Senate will attend the same; and that notice of the event be given to the House of Representatives.

[The committee under this resolution consists of Messrs. SWIFT, KNIGHT, TALLMADGE, SOUTHARD, and SHEPLEY.]

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the honorable NATHAN SMITH, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the honorable NATHAN SMITH, the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9.

At 12 o'clock the Senate assembled.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the reading of the journal was dispensed with; and the Senate adjourned, for the purpose of performing the obsequies of the late honorable NATHAN SMITH, of Connecticut, deceased, in conformity with the resolutions of the Senate adopted yesterday.

The President of the United States, with the heads of the executive Departments, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, and the members of the House of Representatives, with their Speaker and Clerk, having been received into the Senate Chamber and taken the seats assigned them, the corpse was brought in, in charge of the committee of arrangements and pall-bearers, attended by the Sergeant-at-arms of the Senate.

Divine service was then performed by the Rev. Mr. Higbee; after which,

The funeral procession moved to the place of interment.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10.

STATE OF MICHIGAN.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his Secretary:

WASHINGTON, December 9, 1835.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: By the act of the 11th of January, 1805, all that part of the Indiana Territory lying north of a line drawn due "east from the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan until it shall intersect Lake Erie, and east of a line drawn from the said southerly bend, through the middle of said lake, to its northern extremity, and thence, due north, to the northern boundary of the United States," was erected into a separate Territory, by the name of Michigan.

The Territory comprised within these limits being part of the district of country described in the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, which provides that, whenever any of the States into which the same should be divided should have sixty thousand free inhabitants, such State should be admitted by its delegates "into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State Government, provided the constitution and Government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles," the inhabitants thereof have, during the present year, in pursuance of the right secured by the ordinance, formed a constitution and State Government. That instrument, together with various other documents connected therewith, has been transmitted to me for the purpose of being laid before Congress, to whom the power and duty of admitting new States into the Union exclusively appertains; and the whole are herewith communicated for your early decision.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The message having been read,

Mr. BENTON moved that it be printed, together with the accompanying documents, and that the whole subject be referred to a select committee, consisting of five members; which motion was carried; and,

On motion of Mr. MANGUM, the appointment of the committee was postponed to Monday next.

A message was also received from the President, by Mr. DONELSON, his secretary, transmitting a report from the Secretary of War, showing the progress of the astronomical observations made for ascertaining the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio; which,

On motion of Mr. BENTON, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the same committee.

A message was also received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, made in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 24th February last.

The CHAIR communicated sundry other documents from heads of Departments, all of which were ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. GRUNDY offered the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Senate will, on Monday next, proceed to the appointment of the standing committees.

At the suggestion of Mr. EWING, the resolution was modified by the substitution of "Tuesday" instead of "Monday."

The motion to consider the resolution to-day being objected to, the resolution, of course, lies over until Monday.

On motion of Mr. MANGUM, it was ordered, that, when the Senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday.

Mr. TOMLINSON offered the following resolution, and asked for its consideration. The motion being agreed to, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be requested to notify the Executive of the State of Connecticut of the death of the honorable NATHAN SMITH, late a Senator of the United States from that State.

MICHIGAN SENATORS.

Mr. BENTON presented the credentials of JOHN NORVELL and LUCIUS LYON, elected Senators for the term of six years from the 4th of March last, from the Territory of Michigan, and moved that the courtesy of the Senate be extended to them by assigning seats to the new Senators, in the customary mode under similar circumstances, on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. EWING stated that this was a new matter, brought before the Senate for the first time this morning, and required, perhaps, some consideration. In order to afford a little time for consideration, and to examine the course of the Senate in similar circumstances, he moved, for the present, to lay the subject on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE.]

Death of Mr. Kane and Mr. Wildman—Michigan Senators.

[DEC. 14, 1835.]

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after a short time spent therein,
The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 14.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, appeared and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the reading of the journal was dispensed with.

DEATH OF MR. KANE.

Mr. ROBINSON rose and addressed the Senate to the following effect:

Mr. President: It is true, "in the midst of life we are in death;" and another inscrutable dispensation of Providence has given us renewed cause of painful sorrow and grief. ELIAS KENT KANE is no more! He, with whom many in this chamber have been here associated for the last ten years, has left this for "another and a better world." No eulogy is necessary to remind his associates of his many virtues and amiable traits of character; their rehearsal would but add poignancy to our loss. As his colleague, I must be indulged in saying death has taken from me a most valued friend; from his State and country an able Senator and an honest man; from his bereaved wife and orphan children the kindest of husbands, the most indulgent of parents. He died at half past one o'clock last Friday night, of a relapse of fever with which he had been afflicted previous to leaving home.

I offer for adoption these melancholy resolutions:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the Hon. ELIAS K. KANE, which will take place this day at half past 12 o'clock; that the Senate will attend the same; and that notice of the event be given to the House of Representatives.

This resolution was unanimously adopted.

[The committee appointed under this resolution are Messrs. BENTON, CLAYTON, HENDRICKS, CRITTENDEN, and WRIGHT.]

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. ELIAS K. KANE, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape around the left arm.

This resolution was unanimously adopted.

DEATH OF MR. WILDMAN.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by their Clerk, announcing to the Senate the adoption of certain resolutions, in consequence of the death of the Hon. Z. WILDMAN, a member of that House.

Mr. TOMLINSON then rose and stated that, in consequence of the melancholy information contained in this message, he would offer the following resolution:

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, as a further testimony of respect for the memory of the Hon. ZALMON WILDMAN, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Connecticut, will go into mourning, by wearing crape around the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON then offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. ELIAS K. KANE, the Senate now adjourn.

The Senate then adjourned.

[The President of the United States and the heads of the Departments, the Vice President and members of the Senate, the Speaker and members of the House of Representatives, then assembled in the Senate chamber, the corpse of the deceased was brought in, in charge of the committee of arrangements, attended by the Sergeant-at-arms of the Senate; and divine service was performed by the Rev. Mr. Post; after which the funeral procession moved to the place of interment.]

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 15.

Mr. WEBSTER appeared to-day, and took his seat.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The CHAIR announced that the election of the officers of the Senate was now in order; and the Senate proceeded to ballot for Secretary.

The ballots being given in, it appeared that WALTER LOWRIE was unanimously re-elected, having received the whole 36 votes given in.

Mr. LOWRIE was sworn accordingly.

The Senate proceeded to ballot for Sergeant-at-arms and Doorkeeper, when it appeared JOHN SHACKFORD was re-elected.

Mr. SHACKFORD was sworn accordingly.

The Senate proceeded to ballot for Assistant Doorkeeper, when it appeared that STEPHEN HAIGHT was re-elected.

Mr. HAIGHT was accordingly sworn.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate several communications from the Treasury Department, which were ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEES.

The CHAIR having taken up the resolution offered by Mr. GRUNDY, on Thursday, providing for the election of the committees on Tuesday,

Mr. GRUNDY moved to insert "this day," in the room of "Tuesday;" but expressed his readiness to insert "to-morrow," if more agreeable to any gentleman.

Mr. EWING suggested that the change should be made, as there were some Senators yet to come in, who might arrive before to-morrow.

Mr. GRUNDY modified his resolution accordingly, and it was then adopted.

Mr. BENTON called up his resolution, offered on Thursday, providing for the furnishing of certain officers, therein specified, with copies of the bills and resolutions; but, at the suggestion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, it was again laid on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON offered the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be requested to notify the Executive of Illinois of the vacancy which has occurred in the Senate in consequence of the death of the Hon. ELIAS K. KANE, late a Senator from that State.

MICHIGAN.

The CHAIR called up the motion to ballot for a select committee on the subject of the Michigan claims; but, on motion of Mr. MANGUM, it was ordered that the balloting be postponed until the day after to-morrow.

MICHIGAN SENATORS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, his motion of Thursday last, that the courtesy of the Senate be extended to the Senators from Michigan, by assigning to them seats on the floor, was taken up for consideration.

The question being about to be put,

Mr. CLAY rose and said that he was not prepared to vote for this motion. For what purpose were these gen tlemen to be admitted? Not to take part in the deliberations of the Senate generally, not for the purpose of voting. Certainly not. Why, then, were they to be admitted on the floor? If admitted, to what extent are their rights to go? Were they to be sworn in the usual form, or not? Were they to sit in the private as well as the public sessions of the Senate? If in the private sessions, under what injunctions? In short, he was entirely opposed to any action on this incidental matter, until the principal question, whether Michigan was to be admitted into the States of the Union, should be disposed of. He would not now offer any opinion on that principal question; he had not yet formed any. But why were these gentlemen to be admitted on the ground of courtesy? It must be because they have some rights, perfect or quasi, to come there as Senators of Michigan.

Putting that out of the question, there was no more reason for admitting them than any other gentlemen, when they may apply. He was opposed to the admission of the gentlemen, because it implied a right; and he was not willing to prejudge the question which the Senate would be hereafter called on to decide. It would be, to some extent, a commitment of the opinion of the Senate, and would have a tendency to mislead the public mind. He was opposed, therefore, to any thing which would seem to settle the principal question. For himself, he was ready to enter upon the discussion of that principal question, as to the admission of Michigan, as soon as any gentleman might be disposed to move it; and, whenever it should be decided, he was willing that all the consequences should follow, one of which would be the admission of the Senators on the floor, and the administering to them of the oath of a Senator. He was not for the inversion of the proceedings of the Senate, the adoption of the consequences first, and of the cause afterwards. The first question is, is Michigan to be admitted into the Union, and has she a right to send Senators? When that was decided, every thing would follow in its natural, appropriate, and legitimate order. Entertaining these views, he was compelled to oppose the motion.

Mr. BENTON, in reply, stated that he had not been curious or careful in looking for precedents for his motion, because he did not see why, on a question of mere courtesy, civility, the Senate should not rather be making than following precedents. He did not think, when a mere question of courtesy was referred to their consideration, that they were bound to suspend the action of the body until they could examine a parcel of musty records. If, in the ordinary intercourse of life, a gentleman brought to him a letter of introduction, he would ask him to take a seat. Here are gentlemen, who have brought letters, under the great seal, de facto, of the State of Michigan, from a person who acts as the Governor of that State, and these letters are among the archives of the State. He adverted to the case of the Rhode Island Senator, two years ago, as proving that Senators who came here had a right to hold their seats, in case of dispute, until the dispute was settled. By the report of the Committee of Elections, in that case, confirmed as it was by a large majority of the Senate, it was settled that a Senator had a right to come here as a Senator until it was shown that he had not this right. But no such thing was asked in this case. All that was asked was that gentlemen sent here by a State should be requested to take seats, and that chairs be provided for them, until it should be determined by the Senate what their precise rights were. Could there be shown any case where, in such circumstances, Senators were not asked to sit until there could be an examination of all the analogies and the nice and hair-breadth distinctions which gentlemen might choose to draw? He desired to see the Senate, on this question, unfettered by precedents, and that every question should be decided according to its own particular circumstances. He asked what difficulty had resulted from an extension of this courtesy in former cases, where seats had been assigned under similar circumstances? Was any effort made to take part in the debate, to answer on the call of the yeas and nays, to stand up and sit down when there was a count? There was no instance of the kind.

If these gentlemen are admitted, a motion to clear the galleries would induce them to go out, or the slightest hint from the Senate would be sufficient to lead them to do that which their own gentlemanly feelings would suggest, if they took the time to reflect. But it seemed to be supposed that the civility of asking the gentlemen to sit down was to commit the Senate to a particular line of conduct. He reminded the Senate of the course adopted on the admission of Missouri, in which case the Senators were admitted during the deliberations. The Senate decided against their claims, and they were sent back; but was any single Senator influenced in his vote by the fact of their presence? Not one. Did any one understand the courtesy extended to them as having any thing to do with the decision of the question? He was here himself on that occasion; and he was told by that most accomplished and amiable man who then filled the chair, Mr. Gaillard, to take a seat on the floor. He enjoyed all the incidental privileges of that seat; he franked his letters, and the two Houses paid him, from the beginning, the same as the other Senators were paid. Yet the principal question, so far from being prejudiced by this course, was determined against them. He begged to inform the Senate that, while he felt himself bound to act the part he had taken in bringing forward this motion, he, for one, should remain entirely uncommitted on the main question, and not only uncommitted, but free from any bias which would affect his course when the Senate should decide.

Mr. CLAYTON thought it was desirable that more time should be allowed for consideration; and, if the gentleman from Missouri had no objection, he would move to lay the motion on the table for the present. Without intending to commit himself in any way, there was one distinct view which he desired to present. By the constitution which Michigan had adopted, and under which she claimed the admission of her Senators, she had annexed to her territory a considerable portion of the State of Indiana, as it was laid off and recognised by Congress, when that State was admitted into the Union. The adoption of the claims of Michigan, or any measure looking to that adoption, would incline strongly against the rights of Indiana; and every principle entitling Michigan to this portion of the territory of Indiana would operate to give Wisconsin a large tract out of the State of Illinois. By the same ordinance which, according to her construction of the boundary line, gave to Michigan a part of Indiana, a strip, fifty miles in breadth, of the State of Illinois, would be cut off by Wisconsin.

He was fearful of any thing which could even touch this question at this moment, although he was willing, as to matter of politeness, to go as far as any Senator. But, while doing this, he was bound to inquire if there was not also some courtesy due to Illinois. One of her Senators was dead, and we had this day adopted a resolution to inform the Executive of the State of that event. Before we take any step to admit Michigan, according to the claims she presents, we ought to allow time for the State of Illinois to be fully represented on this floor. He had not made himself sufficiently master of all the precedents to understand whether, after they had admitted the Senators to the floor, they could have a right to exclude them again. The gentleman from Missouri had stated that, if admitted, they would be liable to be removed, and could not be entitled to sit during executive sessions. If such was the understanding of the Senator from Missouri, it ought to be so expressed in the motion. Unless the motion was thus modified, they would be as free to sit in secret session as in public. He would prefer, however, not to be called on to decide the question now. If the gentlemen could be admitted without any interference with the rights of Indiana, of Ohio, of Illinois, or of the Senate, he could have no difficulty in deciding his course. But he wished, under the circumstances, more time for deliberation, and he would move to lay the motion, for the present, on the table.

Mr. BENTON signified his assent.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, expressed a wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the phraseology of his motion. The language used is, "in the Senate." For this there was no precedent. None but Senators could sit within the bar. He had no objection to admit the gentlemen on the floor, but none within the bar. He hoped, before the motion to lay on the table was made, that the Senator would so modify the motion as to remove this objection, by saying "without the bar of the Senate." When the Senators from Missouri applied, the President of the Senate had a right to assign seats, but the Senate had now taken away this power.

The motion was then laid on the table.

Mr. PORTER, pursuant to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the adjustment of claims to lands therein mentioned; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his secretary, as follows, to wit:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of State, accompanying copies of certain papers relating to a bequest to the United States, by Mr. James Smithsonian, of London, for the purpose of founding, at Washington, an establishment, under the name of the "Smithsonian Institution," for the diffusion of knowledge among men. The Executive having no authority to take any steps for accepting the trust and obtaining the funds, the papers are communicated with a view to such measures as Congress may deem necessary.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE AT NEW YORK.

Mr. WEBSTER offered the following resolution, and moved its consideration at this time; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire what measures should be adopted by Congress in consequence of the destruction of merchandise and other property by the late fire in New York.

Mr. WEBSTER then offered a few observations on the circumstances and extent of the fire. There had been no example in this country of a fire of such magnitude. There was no place where the ravages of this destructive element had continued for such a period and to such an extent, or had been productive of such calamitous results, as it appeared to have raged, for so many hours, in the most crowded part of that great commercial capital. A strong expectation prevailed out of doors that Congress would do something for the relief of the sufferers. In cases of much less extensive mischief, relief had, in some form, been given by Congress. He could not take it on himself to say what relief was expected in this instance; but, as he had already said, there were already signs of strangely excited expectation that something would be done by Congress in the way of extending relief. In some former cases, he believed, there had been an extension of the time for the payment of duty bonds, and other modes might be combined with that. He was not at this moment prepared to recommend, or even to propose, any specific measure. The city of New York was represented in the other branch by gentlemen who were in the habit of constant intercourse with their constituents, and they would be best enabled to devise some mode of relief. For one, he was disposed to do all which the constitutional power of Congress would permit him to do. It might be considered as the best course, at present, to wait for some action on the part of the other House, before any report was made from the committee. But, in the mean time, they could have the subject under their consideration. He hoped the resolution would be adopted to-day, and that the public expectation would be thus far gratified.

The resolution was adopted.

NORTHERN BOUNDARY OF OHIO.

Mr. EWING, pursuant to notice, rose to ask leave to introduce a bill to define and settle the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio.

Leave being granted, Mr. EWING introduced the bill; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On introducing this bill, Mr. EWING addressed the Chair in the following speech:

Mr. President: I feel it due to the importance of the measure which I propose, and to public expectation and public opinion in my State, that I present, at this early stage of the proceeding, a brief summary, at least, of the question to which this bill will give rise. I feel it the more important to do so, as public opinion abroad, throughout the Union, has been assailed, and in some measure pre-occupied, with papers issuing from various quarters inimical to the proposed measure; papers in which a one-sided view of the case has been presented; and in some instances erroneous statements of public documents have, in the over-zeal of individuals to establish their favorite position, been sent abroad as a part of the political history, and of the law and truth of the case. I wish, in behalf of Ohio, that the facts as they exist may go forth to the public in such small compass, that they may be seen, examined, and understood. And I wish, by reference to documents here, and all the documents that I think bear upon the question, to lighten the labor of gentlemen who wish to examine it and form their judgment. This being my object, I shall attempt little argument, and indulge in no digression.

This bill, so far as it relates to Ohio, is the same in all its provisions with that which I have twice offered in the Senate, which has twice passed this body, and which has been twice lost among the unfinished business of the House. A few words are necessary, however, to explain the full purport of its provisions. The act of Congress of the 30th April, 1802, "authorizing the inhabitants of the eastern division of the Northwestern Territory to form a constitution and State Government," directs that the contemplated State shall be bounded "on the north by an east and west line drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan," "running east until it shall intersect Lake Erie, or the territorial line; thence, with the same, through Lake Erie, to the Pennsylvania line." Under this law the convention met, and formed the constitution of Ohio; but fearing that the mouth and estuary of an important river, which had its course within the State, would be excluded by the prescribed boundary, the convention accepted it, with a proviso which is found in the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution, and is in the following words:

"Provided always, and it is hereby fully understood and declared by this convention, that, if the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan should extend so far south that a line drawn due east from it should not intersect Lake Erie, or if it should intersect the said lake east of the mouth of the Miami of the Lake, then, and in that case, with the assent of the Congress of the United States, the northern boundary of the State shall be established by, and extend to, a line running from the southerly extremity of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of the Miami bay," "thence, northeast, to the territorial line, and by the said territorial line to the Pennsylvania line."

Now, sir, the position of Lake Michigan is proved to be as was apprehended by the framers of the constitution of Ohio. The southerly extreme of Lake Michigan is so far south that a line drawn from it due east cuts off the mouth of the Miami of the Lake, and intersects Lake Erie many miles east of that river; and this bill copies substantially the above-recited proviso of the constitution of Ohio, and will, if it become a law, give the express assent of Congress to the boundary designated therein. The objection to the boundary named in the act of Congress is best understood by reference to a map of the country, which Senators will find upon their tables. It will be seen that the Miami of the Lake, a large and navigable river, (the largest, I believe, which flows northward into that chain of lakes,) has almost its whole course in Ohio, and its whole and entire navigable course in Ohio and Indiana, except the last eight miles, with its mouth and bay, or estuary, which is cut off by this east and west line, and thrown into another jurisdiction—that of the Territory of Michigan.

I can acquit, at once, the framers of the ordinance of 1787, and the Congress which passed the law of April 30, 1802, of the apparent neglect of the just interests of the great civil division of our country which comprises the community which those acts called into being. They had fixed, according to their belief of the geographical relations of the country, boundaries to that State which were wholly unexceptionable. The line, as they had fixed it, did, as they believed, instead of cutting off from Ohio the mouth of the Miami of the Lake, extend northward beyond the river Raisin, to the head of the lake, or rather above it, near the mouth of the Detroit river. I refer to an ancient map of the country, the same which was of the highest authority at the time of the passage of the ordinance and the act of 1802, to show what was their purpose, and what were their opinions as to this boundary. It is a singular case of an error affecting a division of land or a tract of country. It is not a mistake in the position of an object which forms part of a boundary, but the position of a very remote object, lying in an unexplored region, from which a line was to be produced in the given direction, until it should touch the Territory in question, and form the boundary.

But the difficulty will be remedied by adopting the bill which I now offer. It will give to Ohio, not all that was supposed and intended by the Congress which framed the act of 1802, but it will give her all that is important to her internal improvements and commercial interests, and all that was asked for by the framers of her constitution. And there would seem to be the most obvious propriety and policy in according it, having a due regard to the great leading features of our country in its civil divisions, if, indeed, Congress have the power to do so without the infringement of a compact, or the violation of national faith.

This measure has long been a subject of discussion. Those who oppose it contend that Congress, by the terms of the deed of cession from Virginia, by the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, and by their own subsequent acts, have been deprived of the power of extending the boundary of either of the southern States of the Northwestern Territory, Ohio inclusive, north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan. And the first and most important inquiry is, whether Congress does now possess that power. To me, indeed, it seems a question of easy solution.

At the close of the revolutionary war, Virginia and Connecticut claimed each a portion of the Northwestern Territory. Connecticut ceded her jurisdiction without any directions as to its future civil divisions, but Virginia required that the lands so ceded should be divided into States, "containing a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will permit," &c.; which provision was made in accordance with a resolution of Congress of the 10th of October, 1780.

The country was at that time unexplored, and great difficulties might have arisen from the fixing of any unbending rules for the formation of new States, in respect to location and boundary. Congress soon became sensible of this, and, by their resolution of July 7, 1786, asked Virginia to revise her deed of cession. The preamble to that resolution shows what were the views and wishes of that Congress in the formation of new members of the federal Union, and what, I believe, has been (at least what ought to have been) the purpose of each succeeding Congress which has been called to act on this subject. It is as follows:

"Whereas it appears, from the knowledge already obtained of the tract of country lying northwest of the river Ohio, that the laying it out and forming it into new States, of the extent mentioned in the resolution of Congress of October 10, 1780, and in one of the conditions contained in the cession of Virginia, will be productive of many and great inconveniences; that, by such a division of the country, some of the new States will be deprived of the advantage of navigation; some will be improperly intersected by lakes, rivers, and mountains; and some will contain too great a proportion of barren and unimprovable land, and, of consequence, will not, for many years, if ever, have a sufficient number of inhabitants to form a respectable Government, and entitle them to a seat and voice in the federal council: And whereas, in fixing the limits and dimensions of the new States, due attention ought to be paid to natural boundaries, and a variety of circumstances which will be pointed out by a more perfect knowledge of the country, so as to provide for the future growth and prosperity of each State, as well as for the accommodation and security of the first adventurers: In order, therefore, that the ends of government be attained, and that the States which are formed may become a speedy and sure accession of strength to the confederacy,

"Resolved, That it be, and is hereby, recommended to the Legislature of Virginia to take into consideration their act of cession, and revise the same, so far as to empower the United States in Congress assembled to make such a division of the territory of the United States lying northerly and westerly of the river Ohio, into distinct republican States, not more than five nor less than three, as the situation of that country and future circumstances may require; which States shall hereafter become members of the federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the original States, in conformity with the resolution of Congress of the 10th of October, 1780."

By this resolution Congress asked for authority to change nothing relative to the contemplated States in the Northwestern Territory, except the extent and boundaries; and they asked for discretion for the purpose of adjusting their boundaries to suit the natural features of the country. And this discretion (which was accorded by Virginia) is, if I can read and understand the laws and ordinances aright, continued over the whole northern portion of that country down to the present day.

The extent of the powers thus retained by Congress depends upon the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio. I join in all that has ever been said in praise of this invaluable charter. It has been called irrevocable—so it is, as long as the faith of the nation is regarded. It has been called a sacred instrument—I hold it so. Next to the constitution itself (of which, indeed, this ordinance is by adoption a part) I hold it the most sacred among the muniments of our national liberty. But it does not, therefore, follow that every manner of pretension must be sanctioned which any one thinks fit to advance in its name.

The question of the power of Congress over this disputed territory grows out of the fifth article of the ordinance. I need not trouble the Senate by reading that article; a simple analysis of its provisions, so far as they touch the present question, will suffice.

1st. It ordains that Congress shall form not less than three, nor more than five, States within that Territory.

2d. It defines the boundaries of three of those States, according to the present boundaries of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, on all sides except the north; and it extends them all northward to the boundary line of the United States.

3d. And it provides that "the boundaries of these three States shall be subject to be so far altered, that, if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of the Territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan."

It appears to me clear, by the mere reading of the latter part of this section, of which I give the words, that all the obligation imposed upon Congress was to form three States in said Territory, the northern boundary of any of which should not be pressed farther south than the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan; that the east and west boundaries of each of the three States should be fixed within the limits prescribed; and that the northern part of the Territory should be formed into States, or attached to the southern States, or part of it be formed into one or two States, and part of it attached to the State lying immediately south of it. One or two States may be formed by Congress in that part of the Territory which lies north of the east and west line above named; but it is not said that they shall be formed of that territory, or of all that territory. It were hard to reason on the subject; the ordinance itself is as clear to the point which I would sustain as any language I can use in support of it; and it is only by passing over, or interpolating, or modifying its provisions, either in statement or in argument, that a doubt has been raised as to its interpretation.

I will refer, by way of specimen, (and it is not the only one in which public documents have been thus treated in this contest,) to an article entitled "The case of Michigan," which appeared in the Intelligencer of the 5th instant. The writer is unknown to me, but the editors say it is "from a highly intelligent and respectable source." The sentence in that "exposition," in which a clause in the ordinance of 1787 is misstated, is as follows:

"By the ordinance of 1787, whenever any of the States or Territories in the Northwestern Territory 'shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State Government.'"

I call the attention of the Senate to the word Territories, in that part of the paragraph which is introductory to the quotation from the ordinance, and which fixes the sense of that quotation. That word is an interpolation in language, and it changes the whole sense of the paragraph. It is not to be found in the text quoted, nor in the context, nor any word or words which convey an equivalent meaning to it, in the connexion in which it is here introduced. And, unfortunately, this single word, thus thrown in, is the one on which the whole argument in behalf of Michigan and her rights to this territory must hinge: take that away, read the ordinance truly, as it is written, adding nothing and suppressing nothing, it does not leave them ground whereon to rest the soles of their feet. It is the fifth article of that ordinance (1st vol. Laws of the United States, page 480) that has been thus misused. That article declares that there shall be formed, in the Northwestern Territory, three States; it defines their boundary on all sides except the north, as the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois are now bounded; and it extends them all northward to the northern boundary of the United States, which is there called the territorial line. It then provides that "the boundaries of these three States shall be subject to be so far altered, that, if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of the Territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan." Then follows the misquoted clause, which is in these words: "And whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a constitution and State Government."

I am bound, in courtesy, to believe that the misrepresentation of this clause of the ordinance, by the writer who thus volunteers to instruct the community on this subject, was a mistake. But if any one can find in the clause of the ordinance referred to by that writer, and which I have just read, a vested right in this Territory (which is not formed by the ordinance or by act of Congress into a State) to come into the Union when its inhabitants shall be sixty thousand, or to hold fast, permanently, against the will of Congress, to the boundaries fixed for it as a Territory, for the express purpose of temporary government, he must have perceptions and reasoning faculties of a different order from those which are possessed by the rest of mankind. Indeed, when the ordinance is set out truly, as it is, no one will, I think, be able to draw any such inference from it.

Congress had the right, by virtue of their general powers, without any express compact authorizing it, to erect territorial Governments, such as they might see fit, as to number, extent, and boundary, and to change and modify them at pleasure. So at least it has been held, and such has been the practice of the Government.

SENATE.]

Northern Boundary of Ohio.

And if they have not this power, the Territory of Michigan was created without authority; for the ordinance of 1787 expressly authorizes a division of the Northwestern Territory into no more than "two districts;" and this express authority was exhausted by the act of the 7th of May, 1800, which divided the Northwestern Territory into two separate Governments. I take it, therefore, for granted, that the general power will not be disputed by the advocates of the claims of Michigan; and if it be not, why do they fix upon, as the boundary to which they have a permanent right, that assigned to the Territory, "for the purpose of a temporary Government," by the act of 11th January, 1805, instead of either of the other acts fixing other limits? That act is neither the first nor the last which gave a temporary Government to the inhabitants of the country included in that Territory. It first formed a part of the Government of the Northwestern Territory. It was next divided between that Territory and Indiana. It was, in the next place, attached wholly to Indiana, and made to form a part of it; next, it was formed into a separate Territory, "for the purpose of a temporary Government;" and, lastly, the whole residue of the Northwestern Territory was attached to it, and formed with it one Territory for a like purpose, and remains, and is part and parcel of it, at this day. How, then, can it be with reason contended that the limits of the local Government, to which the inhabitants of this tract of country owed allegiance, should, in its fourth modification, though never before, be holden fixed and immutable? There are no words in the law to countenance it, save what are also contained in the other laws fixing the boundaries of the several territorial Governments, which, by different names, were from time to time extended, in whole or in part, over this peninsula. On the whole, that law gives to the inhabitants of that part of the Territory of Michigan no vested right to come into the Union as a State with those particular boundaries assigned them; it therefore throws no obstacle in the way of extending, or adjusting and defining, the boundaries of the States of Ohio and Indiana north of the east and west line above referred to, even if we admit that line to have been once made the boundary of the Michigan Territory.

I believe it has not been denied, by those who advocate the claims of Michigan, that Congress had a right to extend all or either of the three southern States north to the territorial line, according to their limits as set out in the first part of the 5th article of the ordinance; but they contend that Congress must include in each of those States all or none of the territory which lies within its limits north of that line; that they cannot include a part, and exclude another part; that an option is given them in fixing the boundaries of those States on the north, but no discretion beyond the mere choice of one of the two lines. In aid of the several arguments which I have advanced against this position, I will now adduce a series of acts of Congress showing a legislative construction of their own powers.

The east and west line named in the ordinance of 1787 has but a single call, "the most southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan;" it has no terminus to the east or the west; it of course passes across the whole territory; and if the position be correct that Congress could not extend any State beyond that line without including all the territory which lay beyond it and due north of such State, then Congress, in the formation of the State of Ohio, and the designation of its boundary, has violated the ordinance. In the act of April 30, 1802, under which Ohio was authorized to form a State Government, the line running due east from the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan is taken in part as the northern boundary of the contemplated State. Thus far it agrees with the line named in the ordinance; but it introduces another call, "Lake Erie, or the territorial line; and thence, with the same, through Lake Erie, to the Pennsylvania line;" making a totally different northern boundary. The two lines run together until they touch Lake Erie, then diverge widely. The line named in the ordinance runs through the southern bend of Lake Erie, and, passing out of it, cuts off a large extent of territory, with fifty or sixty thousand inhabitants, in the northeast corner of the State of Ohio, to which Michigan has the same right, by virtue of the ordinance, that she has to the country north of that line and south of the northern cape of the Miami bay. But Congress did not consider themselves bound by the ordinance to pursue that line, or they acted under a mistake as to the true position of Lake Michigan; the bearing of which error I will by and by consider.

In the formation of the State of Indiana, Congress disregarded this assumed restriction in the ordinance, or they had failed to discover it. That State is extended ten miles north of the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan; and Illinois, which was admitted a few years after, is extended north about thirty-five miles further than Indiana, and within a few miles of the line of latitude which, according to the old maps, (to which I shall by more particularly refer,) cut through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan. The mistake which had been made in the position of the object of that call was substantially corrected in the case of Illinois.

I need not now advert to the unhappy consequences which would flow from holding the east and west line, named in the ordinance, as a fixed and immovable boundary: the question is too clear, by the very language of the ordinance itself, and the legislative constructions of it have been too frequent and unequivocal, to require this auxiliary aid in settling the principle; still it ought not to be forgotten that the establishment of the doctrine contended for by Michigan involves, as its consequence, the dismemberment of three States of this Union, and the bringing of a large number of their citizens under a Government which they did not help to form, and to which they have never yielded, and to which I believe they never will yield, their willing allegiance.

Having, as I trust, established the position, (if any arguments were necessary to establish it,) that Congress has power to pass this act, without violating the constitution or the compact, or any principle which ought to govern legislators, I will now proceed to offer some reasons why the proposed adjustment of boundary ought to be made.

First, then, it was the intent of the framers of the ordinance of 1787 that the northern line of each of the three southern States should extend north of the points over which that east and west line is, by actual observation and survey, found to pass. This intent is proved by the clearest evidence. At the time of the passage of that ordinance, we had no information of the country north and west of Lake Erie, save what we derived from observations made or collected under the colonial Government. A map of that country, published in 1755, and still familiarly known as Mitchell's map, was the first in authority in England and America, from the time of its publication until long after the date of the ordinance. It is said to have been the map referred to by the American and British commissioners at the treaty of peace in 1783. And in the particulars in which it bears upon the present question, it was copied, or very closely followed, in all the maps which appeared in our country from that time until after the close of the late war. That map, and indeed every contemporaneous map that I have seen, fixed the latitude of the southern extreme of Lake Michigan about 42° 20' north, or about forty-five miles north of its actual position, and so situated with regard to Lake Erie, that a line running due east through it would touch the lake near its head, or the Detroit river a little north of its entrance into the lake. I have laid upon your table, and on that of each of the Senators, a copy, on a reduced scale, of this map, as it is preserved in the State Department; by which may be seen, at a glance, the position of those lakes and of that line, as it was then believed and understood to exist. Congress had earnestly sought the power of fixing the limits of the proposed States according to natural boundaries, so that none of them should be improperly intersected by rivers or lakes, and so that there should be secured to each such natural advantages of navigation as most properly pertained to it. They obtained that power, and intended to exert it for the benefit of each of the new States; and, in fixing that east and west, they obviously intended to prohibit any future Congress from bringing down the northern line of that State, which is now Ohio, south of a line which would touch Lake Erie near its head, or the Detroit river above the lake. Ought that intent to be defeated by a mistake, by misinformation as to the position of a natural object in a hostile country, remote from any part of the State whose boundary was to be fixed? We are of opinion that the intent of the framers of that ordinance ought to be carried into effect, so far as it is necessary for the well-being of the State that it should be so.

It can be shown that the same intent prevailed with the Congress who passed the act of 1802, under which Ohio framed her constitution, and came into the Union as a sovereign and independent State. The line designated as her northern boundary is the same as that before referred to, laid down on Mitchell's map. That map then hung, as I have been informed, in the committee-room of the committee of Congress who reported that law. That there was a mistake in the position of this line by the Congress which enacted the law of April 30th, 1802, is proved further by the fact that the boundary they affix to Ohio is an impossible boundary. The law provides that the northern line shall run due east through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, until it intersects Lake Erie or the territorial line; thence, with the same, through Lake Erie, to the Pennsylvania line. This boundary, therefore, is based on the assumption that that east and west line will touch the territorial line (which is the northern boundary line of the United States) in Lake Erie, or north of it; otherwise it could not, without changing its direction, run with it, through Lake Erie, to the Pennsylvania line.

But that line does not touch the northern boundary line of the United States at any point in Lake Erie. The act of the 14th July, 1832, directs the President "to cause to be ascertained (among other things) by accurate observation, the latitude and longitude of the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan." Also, "that he cause to be ascertained, with all practicable accuracy, the latitude and longitude of the most southerly part in the northern boundary line of the United States in Lake Erie." The performance of this duty was, as a matter of course, assigned by the President to the War Department. And among the executive documents of 1833-'34, vol. 6, doc. 497, is found the report, in part, of the engineer employed to perform that service. He fixes the latitude of the southern extreme of Lake Michigan at 41 deg. 37 min. 7.9 sec. north. His observations as to the southern point of the northern boundary of the United States in Lake Erie do not lay claim to accuracy, but he supposes it to be in latitude 41 deg. 38 min. 38 sec., being north of the east and west line one mile one thousand four hundred and forty yards. But there was another and better mode of ascertaining the last-named fact than that adopted by the Department. It will be remembered that commissioners were appointed by the United States and Great Britain to mark the boundary between the two countries, under the treaty of Ghent. This duty was performed. This line was marked with great care through the western part of Lake Erie, and the map showing its position is among the archives of state. I hold in my hand a letter from Thomas P. Jones, keeper of the archives, directed to Mr. VINTON, of the Ohio delegation in the House of Representatives, dated January 7, 1835, in which he states that he has carefully examined the map of Lake Erie, as laid down and marked out by those commissioners, and that he finds the latitude of the most southern point to be 41 deg. 39 min. 43 sec., as nearly as he can ascertain by the scale, but that the measurement may possibly vary a second or so from the truth. So that the east and west line would not touch the northern boundary line by about three miles. I understand, however, (for I have not yet seen the report,) that the Department has at last brought the two lines together. Lake Michigan, I believe, still holds its first position—its southern extremity would move no farther north; but the boundary line between the United States and Great Britain has been found more flexible, and has come about four miles south of the point at which it was fixed by the commissioners under the treaty of Ghent. This has, it is true, been an ex parte proceeding by the United States; but Great Britain cannot object to it, as it gives her (if the new position of the line be adhered to) jurisdiction over many miles of the surface of the lake, which was assigned by the joint commissioners to the United States. For the present, however, I am disposed to consider the line run by the commissioners of the United States and Great Britain, in pursuance of a treaty stipulation, as the true boundary between the two countries. Taking, then, the position of the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, as found by Captain Talcott, and the southern point of the northern boundary line of the United States in Lake Erie, as settled by the commissioners, and as measured on their map by the keeper of the public archives, it is clear that these lines do not close, and that one of them must be varied by legislative enactment or judicial construction, or the State of Ohio has no boundary. This state of things could not have been in accordance with the intent and purpose of the framers of the law of April 30, 1802.

The line, then, so far as it touches the boundary of Ohio, was intended, by the Congress of the United States, to be where it appears on Mitchell's map, and the other maps of the day. If this were the case of two individuals contracting for the transfer of land, who had been governed in their contract by a plat spread out before them, and if such contract had been made, and such map exhibited as showing the boundary between them; I ask every land lawyer here, if a reference in the deed to some remote object, as that from which one of the boundary lines should emanate, when the position of that object was proved to have been mistaken by the parties, would control the bounds of the grant? In equity would it? Would it between man and man, the facts being fully made out? Would it be permitted to defeat the manifest intent and purpose of both parties? We know well it would not. We know that where the lines and bounds of a tract of land are shown by the vendor to the purchaser, either upon the ground or on a plat, and the description in the deed does not cover it, no matter whether by accident or design, a court of equity will hold the conveyance to be according to the boundary shown, and so correct the deed. In the acts of Governments, there is no distinction between law and equity. The appeal to law, as it regards a nation, is an appeal to the national sense of justice; and an obligation much less strong than that which would move a court of equity, in the case of an individual, ought to be sufficient, especially in a case like this, to command the action of a just and generous nation.

But Congress not only intended to give a boundary which included the mouth of the Miami of the Lake and its bay, but the people of Ohio, in convention, asked and expected to receive it. They believed the line included the Miami bay, and a doubt was for the first time thrown upon it by information received from a trapper, who returned from the shores of Lake Michigan while the convention was in session, which caused the insertion of the proviso in the 6th section of the 7th article of the constitution. This constitution was accepted by Congress without a syllable, yea or nay, on the subject of the proviso. It was accepted all together, the proviso forming a part of it. No objection was urged to it by Congress, or by the committee of Congress which reported on the constitution. And when we consider that this proviso was fully and entirely in accordance with the end and aim of the resolution of Congress of the 7th of July, 1786, which asks of Virginia, a modification of her deed of cession, with a view to regard natural boundaries and the commercial relations of the contemplated States; that it accorded with the views of the Legislature of Virginia, who changed their deed of cession for that express and declared purpose; that it accords with the views of the framers of the ordinance of 1787, as appears by the map of their day, showing their opinion of the line which should bound the contemplated States; that it accords, also, with the opinion of the Congress who passed the law under which Ohio formed her constitution and State Government; that this proviso, the solemn act of the people of Ohio, met in convention, declares that as a part of their constitution they ask and claim of Congress that boundary; and, finally, when it is considered that the whole constitution was accepted without a dissent to that proviso, I think a strong case of equitable if not legal right is presented on the part of Ohio, for the definitive sanction of the boundary which she claims; and that it is an irresistible appeal to the sense of justice of the nation. And I, for one, care not whether this act be passed on the ground that Ohio is entitled to the boundary claimed by law, by equity, or on principles of political justice and expediency; but sure I am that the people of that State feel strongly that the concession is due them, and that dissatisfaction will be general and deep if it be withheld.

But it is said that the rights of Michigan are implicated in the adjustment proposed by this bill, and that it cannot pass without doing injustice to that Territory; but, for myself, I can discover nothing solid in this objection. I have already shown that that Territory has no right to any particular boundary, either by virtue of the ordinance of 1787, or any of the acts of Congress. If I have succeeded in establishing this, what is left of her claim on those general principles of political justice and expediency, to which I have appealed in behalf of Ohio?

Michigan is a temporary territorial Government, extending over about 177,000 square miles of territory, equal in extent to three of the largest States in the Union. It was called into existence by an act of Congress; and, so long as it continues a Territory, it is subject to be changed and modified, as to boundary and extent, at the pleasure of the same power. The inhabitants have their rights as American citizens secured under the ordinance of 1787, and various acts of Congress; but they have no territorial rights; and Michigan, as such, has none against the will of Congress. The question of expediency, only, then occurs in behalf of a State that is to be hereafter formed north of Ohio and Indiana; and I ask, is it expedient that that State should hold the mouth of the Miami, which has its whole navigable course in Ohio and Indiana, and control its entrance? Those two States are constructing a canal connecting the Miami bay with the Wabash river; and that grand work is now delayed, awaiting the decision of this question. I ask, is it expedient that a State, which you are to form hereafter north of these two States, should hold this outlet of the vast region which is intersected by this canal?—that the new State should have delivered to her the key, and be the sole keeper, of the entrance to the noble edifice erected by the industry and enterprise of her neighbors? It is not right. And the pride of those States must be wounded, and their sense of justice outraged, by such a determination. But again: what policy is there in giving the new State, when it shall be created, the jurisdiction over this disputed territory? Is the territory of that State, without it, likely to be too small, or does it want for navigable communication? Neither. One hundred and seventy-seven square miles, an extent equal to three of the largest States in the Union, must be formed into no more than two States; and its eastern portion has advantages of navigation equalled by few States on the Atlantic seaboard.

Then, with respect to those who belong to the unclaimed part of the territory—who profess to be contending for their rights, and who accuse Ohio of ambition, and usurpation, and injustice—what is their claim, and for what do they contend? Not the right of self-government, or the right to choose their own rulers, or the jurisdiction to which they shall be attached; for nothing of this is sought to be wrested from them; but they claim to govern their neighbors, who deny them allegiance; or, if not to govern them, they wish to force into their fellowship and fraternity those who turn from them with fear and aversion, and who seek protection from Ohio, whom they think more regardful of their feelings and more friendly to their interests. Those who, in the plenitude of their chivalry, wish to protect the weak against the strong, would do well to think of extending that protection over this people, who, if attached to Michigan, will feel themselves delivered over to a kind of political bondage, and into the hands of those whom they look upon as their adversaries and rivals.

Something is surely due to the opinions and feelings of these people of the disputed territory. If joined to Michigan, they cannot and they will not be content with their condition. They contend against it now, like men who are struggling for all that they hold dear and sacred, and against whatever is deemed most calamitous. They think (but I cannot answer for the correctness of their opinion) that, instead of enjoying the privileges of freemen, instead of being placed in the hands of a fostering and paternal Government, which would watch over and protect their interests, and aid in the improvement of their natural advantages, and in the development of their resources, they would be delivered over to a bitter adversary, and a determined and inveterate rival.

Mr. President, I ask, in behalf of Ohio, and I most earnestly ask, an early decision of this question. It has been for years past the victim of procrastination. For more than thirty years has Ohio presented herself, year after year, at the bar of Congress, as a petitioner for what she deems her right—what this body, whenever it has spoken, has declared to be hers, either on principles of justice or of national policy; but she has been delayed, postponed, and the measure for her redress lost in the other House, without a hearing had or an opinion elicited. I trust and hope that it now approaches a termination, and that its result will be such as to satisfy the public mind, and calm the dissatisfaction of our people.

fully examined the map of Lake Erie, as laid down and marked out by the commissioners to settle the boundary line under the treaty of Ghent, and find the latitude of the most southern point to be 41 deg. 39 min. 43 sec., as nearly I can ascertain by the scale; but the measurement may possibly vary a second or so from the truth.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. P. JONES,
Office of Archives, Dept. of State.

Extract from Captain Talcott's report of January 7, 1834, (Executive Documents 1833-'34, volume 6, document 497.)

"The fourth station was at the most southern bend of Lake Michigan, on the beach of the lake, at high-water mark, and about the middle of a reach of the lake which lies east and west, and is about two miles in extent. The observations at this place were more numerous than at any of the other stations, and give for its latitude 41 deg. 37 min. 7.9 sec. north."

[The following is a copy of the bill introduced by Mr. EWING:]

A BILL to settle and establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio.

Be it enacted, &c., That the northern boundary of the State of Ohio shall be established by, and extend to, a direct line running from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of the Miami bay; thence, northeast, to the northern boundary line of the United States; thence, with said line, to the Pennsylvania line.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the boundary line surveyed, marked, and designated, agreeably to "An act to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate the northern boundary of the State of Indiana," approved March the second, eighteen hundred and twenty-seven, shall be deemed and taken as the east and west line mentioned in the constitution of the State of Indiana, drawn through a point ten miles north of the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, and shall be and for ever remain the northern boundary of said State.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the northern boundary line ascertained, surveyed, and marked, agreeably to a law of Congress, entitled "An act to ascertain and mark the line between the State of Alabama and the Territory of Florida, and the northern boundary of the State of Illinois, and for other purposes," approved March second, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, shall be deemed and taken as the line west from the middle of Lake Michigan, in north latitude forty-two degrees thirty minutes, to the middle of the Mississippi river, as defined in the act of Congress entitled "An act to enable the people of Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved eighteenth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen, and shall be and for ever remain the northern boundary line of said State.]

When Mr. EWING had concluded,

Mr. MORRIS objected to the second reading of the bill, and said that, as there was some difference between his colleague and himself, in relation to some of the principles involved in the bill just read, of an important character, he would submit a resolution, as presenting his views on the subject.

The CHAIR stated that, as the resolution was in the form of a joint one, it must be introduced after giving one day's previous notice.

Mr. MORRIS gave notice accordingly that he would introduce the resolution to-morrow.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE, &c.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,

Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to finance, together with the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Various other portions of the President's annual message were referred to the appropriate standing committees.

INCENDIARY PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. CALHOUN moved that so much of the President's message as relates to the transmission of incendiary publications by the United States mail be referred to a special committee.

Mr. C. said that this was a subject of such importance as, in his opinion, to require the appointment of a special committee. It was one which involved questions of a complicated character, and such as did not properly come within the duties of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, touching as they did on the constitutional powers of the Government. Another reason for the appointment of a special committee was to be found in the fact that, in the construction of the standing committees, there was only a single gentleman from that section of the country which was most deeply interested in the proper disposition of this very important subject. He did not anticipate any opposition to the motion, and hoped it would be at once adopted.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, expressed his hope that, in this instance, there would be no departure from the customary practice of the Senate, as he had no apprehension that the regular standing committee had the least desire to take any course which would interfere with any right which belonged to any State of the Union. Without looking particularly at the construction of that committee, he felt a confident belief that there was no disposition in any of its members to have the public mails prostituted to the purposes of a set of fanatics. He did not wish to see the subject taken out of the regular course, as he considered that it would be giving to it a greater degree of importance than was necessary. He was of the opinion that the only mode in which Congress could interfere was through the regulations of the Post Office. Beyond that, he believed they had no right to go. Thus believing, notwithstanding the situation of peculiar delicacy which he personally occupied, he could not consent to give to the subject more consequence than it deserved, by taking it out of the hands of the regular Post Office Committee. He hoped, therefore, that the Senator from South Carolina would take a different course, and wait to see what was done by that committee before he advised the appointment of a special committee. If he should find that the standing committee did not properly discharge their trust, then it would be time enough to see what other mode could be devised by which a restraint might be constitutionally imposed on the circulation of these mischievous publications. He hoped the subject would not be sent to a special committee.

Mr. CALHOUN replied that the Senator from Alabama had mistaken his object, which was not to produce any unnecessary excitement, but to adopt such a course as would secure a committee which would calmly and dispassionately go into an examination of the whole subject; which would investigate the character of those publications, to ascertain if they were incendiary or not, and, if so, on that ground to put a check in their transmission through the country. He could not but express his astonishment at the objection which had been taken to his motion, for he knew that the Senator from Alabama felt that deep interest in the subject which pervaded the feelings of every man in the Southern section of the country. He believed that the Post Office Committee would be fully occupied with the regular business which would be brought before them, and it was this consideration, and no party feeling, which had induced this motion. Whatever was to be done, whatever feeling to be expressed, it was earnestly to be desired that it should come from a committee, a majority of whom were of those who were most deeply interested in the matter; and he hoped this sentiment would be responded to by a general acquiescence on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY said that his situation was such that he ought not, perhaps, to take any part in this discussion, but that his silence might be misrepresented. In reference to the objection that the members of the standing committee were from a different part of the country, he would reply that, such being the case, if the same sentiments favorable to the opinions of the Senator from South Carolina were entertained by the majority of them, their report would go forth to the public so much the stronger, as it would show that there existed a similarity of feeling in every part of the country, as to the power of the Government to act efficiently on this subject. He did not intend even to give a full opinion; it was not the time for it; but he would say that the general Government could do very little, except it should be through the regulation of the Post Office, and by aiding to give efficiency to the operation of the State laws. Perhaps more might be done, but he did not desire to see any power exercised which could have the least tendency to interfere with the sovereignty of the States. He would only add, that the standing committee he had intended to call together to-morrow, chiefly for the purpose of deliberating on this subject, but, hearing that some motion of this kind might be made, he had delayed his intention. He neither wished for the labor of examining this subject in the regular committee, nor did he desire to avoid any responsibility. It was not improbable that there would have been unanimity of sentiment.

Mr. PRESTON made a few remarks, the commencement of which was inaudible, from the low tone in which it was delivered. It had been said that the evil was to be cured through the regulation of the Post Office. Had the Government any power to regulate that way? If so, to what extent? What surveillance could it exercise over the Post Office? If there can be any efficient action in this mode to protect the rights and harmony of the South, then to what extent do we want protection? He believed the importance of the subject, involving, as it did, the interests of a large portion of the country, required that it should be submitted to a special committee. There was great anxiety on the subject pervading the South, but no excitement was likely to grow out of it. If there should be any, it would not be as to the question of slavery, but the power which might be exercised by the Government.

Mr. CALHOUN stated that, if this subject had been within the ordinary duties of the Committee on the Post Office, he would not have objected to their taking charge of it; but every one must see that it involved considerations of a peculiar character, separate and distinct from the ordinary duties of that committee. He had no desire to bring into debate the important question of slavery, but merely the powers of the Government. The peculiar question of power now presented was a new one, and required to be examined with the utmost caution. In all free States, the most dangerous precedents had been founded on questions of this character. Great principles might be overlooked, and dangerous innovations adopted, from which the worst consequences would flow. He looked to the constitution only. This was a great constitutional question, and he should deem himself a traitor to his section of the country if he could suffer any consideration as to the presidential election to be brought to bear upon it. It was a question of infinitely higher moment. His desire was to allay every excited feeling; to look calmly, not only at the main question, but at all the collateral. He looked only to the importance of the subject, as a new one, which was now to settle a great principle. He did not desire to assume any responsibility which the crisis did not demand, but he would not shrink from any necessary labor. The Southern people were deeply interested; they deemed that principles were involved in this subject which affected their rights, and on the right decision of which the peace and harmony of the nation depended. On these grounds he had desired a special committee.

Mr. LEIGH said he should vote for a reference of the subject to a special committee, not from any distrust of the standing Committee on the Post Office, on account of the quarter of the Union from which the members composing the committee came, but because he did not think that the subject belonged to the province of the standing committee. He understood that committee to be charged with matters relating to the general arrangements of the Post Office, and not to take cognizance of any thing with which was mingled up constitutional questions of such delicacy. He would take occasion to say now, that, from the conversations he had had with intelligent individuals from the non-slaveholding States, there existed no essential difference of opinion between them and himself. All of them were deeply impressed with the wickedness of these incendiary publications, and were ready to go with him in a common effort to suppress them. There was therefore no fear to be entertained as to the course of the intelligent part of the North. But there was a fear lest this question should become involved in party considerations; and he should have no fear of this if the subject were sent to a special committee. So sure as it becomes entangled with party views, every thing like wise and efficient concert of action will be prevented.

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed his gratification to hear the gentleman from Virginia express the result of his conversations with the gentlemen of the North; and he was sure the honorable Senator spoke the sentiments of every intelligent man north of the slaveholding States, when he says he would suppress any incendiary publications which disturb the tranquillity of that section of the Union. I have yet to find that man of intelligence in the North who is of the opinion that the general Government has any right to interfere in the question of domestic slavery in the South; and all are disposed to go as far as they can constitutionally go, to suppress the transportation of incendiary publications through the mail. The reason why he was opposed to a special committee was, because by adopting the ordinary course party spirit would be effectually put down. He had no fear of creating any party spirit on the subject in this body; but abroad the question might be asked, for what purpose was this referred to a special committee? Is the subject so far out of the reach of law that it cannot otherwise be taken hold of? Are there any two individuals who differ as to the propriety of doing all that can be done to prevent the circulation of incendiary publications in the South? The only question is the constitutional one, how far can we go? I undertake to say that we are all disposed to go as far as we can; and when we have raised a standing committee, conversant with the business of the Post Office and post roads, shall we take the subject out of their hands, and give it to a special committee? Abroad this may be considered a party movement. Mr. B. concluded with saying he should vote to send the subject to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Incendiary Publications.

[SENATE.]

Mr. MANGUM was disposed to vote for a special committee, because he desired to see the subject fairly and fully deliberated on. He deprecated all party feelings, and hoped they would be avoided in the consideration of this matter. He did not believe there was any intention, and for himself he disclaimed any, to cast the slightest disrespect on the general committee. But this was a subject which did not come within the range of their duties. The great question to be considered, and it was of the highest magnitude and delicacy, was, how far have we a right to proceed? He was unable to lash himself into any excitement on the subject. He had never been able to apprehend those dangerous results which others seemed to fear; and, whatever was to be feared from the dispersion of incendiary publications in the South, he thought there was in the Government no power over their general circulation. He should regard the assumption of any such power as deeply to be deprecated. After seeing many Eastern friends, he was prepared to concur with the gentleman from Virginia, that, through all the Northern region of country, whatever difference existed on the abstract question of slavery, the general structure of public opinion was sound. He did not fear any excitement here or elsewhere. We were compelled to act on this subject by the suggestion in the message of the President. He regarded it as a question of great moment, and every gentleman must see the propriety of giving it to a separate committee. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were likely to have more labor than they would be able to discharge. New routes would be presented to them from every part of the country. But whether such was the case or not, the great question here to be considered was foreign to the objects within their province, and could have no reference to their duties.

If it were to be sent to either of the standing committees, the Judiciary would be the most appropriate one. Those who most deprecate the circulation of incendiary publications feel a still stronger apprehension as to the extension of the powers of the Government.

Mr. PORTER, of Louisiana, said that the question was not of much importance, though the matter which gave rise to it was of paramount importance to that portion of the Union from whence he came. He thought, with the Senator from North Carolina, that, if the subject must go to one of the standing committees, it should be that on the Judiciary; as the main question to be examined was the constitutional power of conferring such authority on the Post Office Department as had been solicited from certain quarters of the Union—not on any of the details connected with that branch of the Government.

Mr. P. preferred the special committee, not because he thought it would differ widely in its conclusions from that on the Post Office and Post Roads, but because he thought it was due to the importance of the subject that every thing which could mark the deep sense of the Senate of its weight and gravity should be done. He concurred with the Senator from North Carolina on the opinion which generally prevailed among persons of intelligence in the non-slaveholding States on this question. He also gave his ready and cheerful testimony to the liberality which his brother Senators from all parts of the Union exhibited, and he had no doubt felt, on this most delicate of all questions. They looked at it with the eyes of statesmen and patriots. They saw that, constitutionally, the non-slaveholding States could not interfere, and they knew that all attempts of this kind must end either in drawing tighter the bonds which confined the slave, or in bursting them with consequences which no one could contemplate without horror.

But while he assented to all that had been said in relation to the intelligence of the non-slaveholding States, he could not agree with the honorable Senator from North Carolina that there was no danger. Certainly there was no immediate danger. The decision and energy exhibited during the last summer at the South, with the aid of public opinion to the North, had checked the incendiaries. Without such decisive manifestations we should now have had philanthropists travelling in the slave States, and claiming the "constitutional right" to stimulate the slaves to rebellion. But though there was no cause for immediate alarm, there was every motive for the Southern States to keep a vigilant eye on all the movements in relation to this matter. It was well known that associations made up principally of hypocrites and fanatics, and rendered more mischievous by having obtained the assistance of some well-meaning but most weak and misguided men, were laboring incessantly to render their position in regard to their slaves uneasy and insecure. Fanaticism of all kinds had a tendency to spread. In its very nature it was contagious, and it could only be extinguished by decisive measures on its first outbreaking.

He had not made up his own mind, Mr. P. said, on the power of Congress to the extent to which the inquiry suggested by the President might lead. It was unnecessary to state that a strong excitement prevailed through the South, and the citizens of that section certainly expected action on this subject, if it could be constitutionally had. If it could not, they would not ask it, and would look round for measures from their own legislation by which they might protect themselves. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was composed, in a large proportion, of gentlemen from non-slaveholding States. He could not be misunderstood, after what he had already said. He meant no disrespect, but he thought that, if the conclusions to which the committee who might have the matter in charge arrived were adverse to the power, it would obtain an easier and more cordial assent from the people of the South if it came from members having the same interests with themselves, and acting under the same sense of danger, and the same desire to obtain a remedy for a common evil. For this reason, Mr. P. said, he preferred a special committee.

Mr. CLAYTON said, if this subject was to go to any standing committee, he would like to hear some good reasons why, if it involved a question of constitutional law, it ought not to be sent to the Judiciary Committee. But he believed the gentlemen on that committee were not anxious to assume the duty, and therefore he would vote for sending it to a special committee. It should be remembered that this subject was not before the Senate when the standing committees were appointed, and that the committee on the Post Office was not selected in reference to it. He was in favor of a special committee, because he wished gentlemen from the South on the committee. He was desirous to see more of these than from any other section of country. Four out of five of the Post Office Committee were Northern Senators, and this was an objection in his mind to sending the subject to that committee. He spoke as one representing Southern interests and feelings, and his constituents would be better satisfied if Southern gentlemen were on the committee. If it was to go to a standing committee, the subject should be sent to the Judiciary, as the most appropriate; but, as they were not anxious to have it, he was willing to give it to a special committee.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, expressed some surprise at the general disclaimer of party feelings. He had charged no such feelings to any Senator, and there was no reason or necessity for the disclaimer. He had contended that the Government had no right to interfere with the slave question at all, nor by any of his acts would he even indirectly give them the power. His constituents were almost as deeply interested in this question as any portion of the community—perhaps there were none more so. With this conviction, and notwithstanding the excitement which had existed last session, he would rely on the Northern States to put it down at home, and not permit any of their citizens deliberately to disturb the peace and harmony of the whole country. But he would not interfere here, in his place, as a Senator. He was not prepared to say how far the Post Office Committee could interfere with any other matter; but, so far as these incendiary publications go, to put an end to their transmission by the mail would be their duty and the duty of Congress. Further than this he thought they could not go. Did the President recommend any thing beyond this? Gentlemen had talked about a new principle. He did not see any of the dangers which they seemed so much to dread, and he would rather see the subject in the hands of the Senators from the North. He was not disposed to add to an excitement already too great. Although he felt great confidence in the feeling of the Northern Senators, among the people, who had less favorable opportunities for judging, different opinions might sometimes prevail. These suspicions did not confine themselves to the ordinary body of the community, but had even found their way into executive communications, and they would all be satisfied when they saw those States, which ought to put down the excitement, taking measures do to so.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH suggested that the Senate had gone into a discussion of the subject, when the only proposition before them related to the institution of an inquiry. The Senator from South Carolina had asked for a committee, not merely on a subject which was relevant to the duties of the Post Office Committee, but involving a question as to the constitutional powers of the Government. He should be sorry to do any thing which might be considered discourteous to the Post Office Committee. They were worthy of all confidence. But they did not come from the proper section of the country; and, as this was not a matter in relation to the Post Office, but concerning the power of Congress, he was disposed to prefer a special committee. When the gentleman from Massachusetts presented his resolutions to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary the subject of the transportation of the mails by the railroads, there was no objection intimated, and he hoped this motion would pass.

Mr. LEIGH said, adverting to the occurrences of the past summer, it was natural, it was wise and right, that the President should make such a reference to the subject as he had made in his message. He understood that part of the message much as the Senator from Alabama did. He recommends the subject to Congress, but leaves them to say how far they can interfere through the Post Office. If it should turn out, as it will, to be impossible to act thus, it will be found that the Post Office Committee will have nothing to do with the subject.

Mr. DAVIS stated that he was one of the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. He was not sure that more importance had not been attached to this subject than it deserved. When gentlemen had spoken of the powers of the Government, constitutional powers, and the course which this matter must take in reference to these powers, he was not able exactly to understand their views, for he had not ascertained what they had in their minds when they said this was no matter for the consideration of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Looking at the motion rather as a matter of courtesy than in any other light, he, for one, would be glad to have the subject away from the committee to which he belonged, and he would be glad to send it to a special committee, not because it struck him as not properly belonging to the Post Office Committee—for he rather thought it did belong to that committee, because if the Government had any power on the subject it must be through the Post Office—but because it was desired by the gentlemen from the South.

He wished to present one other view, as to a matter which occurred in the other House, when he was a member of that branch; and, as it occurred several years ago, there was nothing disorderly in speaking of it. Great questions were at that time in agitation, deeply affecting the interests of that part of the country from which he came, and he then saw all the members of that section of the country constantly excluded from the committees to which these subjects were referred. He, and those associated with him, had then thought there was a little want of magnanimity and generosity in thus excluding from committees the gentlemen who represented a people that were most deeply interested in the subject.

He viewed this as peculiarly a Southern interest, and was willing the gentlemen from that section of the country should present to the Senate their views; not that a naked question of constitutional power may not be as well understood in one portion of the country as another; but Southern gentlemen certainly best knew their own embarrassments in relation to this matter. When the subject comes here, gentlemen from other parts will no doubt do their duty fearlessly; but it seems not only courteous but parliamentary that those who are most vitally interested should first present us with their views. He would, therefore, cheerfully vote for a select committee.

Mr. PRESTON suggested that there were other modes of arresting the evil than through the Post Office, and he had himself received a proposition and a bill, which had been drawn without touching the Post Office at all. It proposed that the depositing of an incendiary publication in the post office should be constituted an offence in the State where it took place, and the letting of it out of the post office should be equally deemed an offence where it occurred. This would leave the matter open between the Judiciary and the Post Office Committees; and ought it to be thus left open? This suggestion he had made to show that the question might be affected by other laws than those of the Post Office. This was precisely a sectional question. They were thankful to the gentlemen from the North for the course they had taken, and respected and honored them for it; but he thought it was due to the South that they should have an examination, and that they should be permitted to present their precise views, and see what could be done to satisfy the public mind.

Mr. EWING said that, as one of the members of the Post Office Committee, he was neither desirous to have, nor to avoid, the labor of this inquiry; nor should he consider himself in any way slighted by the transfer of this subject from one committee to another. He was satisfied that this part of the message should take the same course as if no standing committee had been appointed. Look at the organization of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads: four of its members were from non-slaveholding States, and only one from a slaveholding State. As the subject was sectional, and affected Southern interests principally, there was a propriety in sending it to them for consideration. They best knew what was requisite to satisfy the public mind, and the people of the South could be more easily quieted by a report from them. Congress had been called upon by the public press in all quarters to act upon the subject. Who best knew how to effect the desirable object of satisfying the public expectation? The genlemen from the South. They were the most competent. For his own part, he knew nothing about it. If Congress could not act in this matter, who ought to declare the fact? From whom would a statement of the fact come with the most weight? Should it come from Northern Senators, who had no hold on the confidence of the people of the South, or from the Southern gentlemen, who were most deeply interested in the suppression of any injurious excitement? From the South a report would come with a more conciliatory effect than from the North. No result could be more satisfactory to the South than that which was brought about by the influence of the Southern Senators.

Mr. BROWN intended to vote for a reference of the subject to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It had been urged that it was more proper to send it to a special committee, because they would have more time to examine the subject, and would carry more ability into the examination. He entertained a different opinion. The Committee on the Post Office had all the necessary experience; they were conversant with all the Post Office laws. Gentlemen in all the important committees were much engaged. No one was entirely free. The special committee would not be able to afford more time to the investigation than the standing committee. Another reason had been urged, that the committee ought to be constructed from the Southern section of the country. He could not subscribe to the soundness of this doctrine. Gentlemen deprecate giving a party complexion to the matter; what would be the effect of sending it to a special committee? It would be more than giving a party complexion to the matter: it would be giving to it a sectional aspect, which was the worst kind of political aspect. The proper course appeared, in his opinion, to be, to display a confidence in the North, in the full conviction that they would do right. If they were to exclude the Northern gentlemen, it would imply a distrust which he was not willing to show. The proper course would be to confide the matter to the Northern Senators, who, he was confident, were as much interested as any others in putting down these incendiary efforts of a set of fugitives from the Northern States, and this was the course he was disposed to pursue in this case.

He never had believed that there was a majority in the North prepared to take a course which would tend to the destruction of the most glorious confederacy that had ever been seen on the face of the earth. He was, therefore, disposed to send the subject to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the chairman of which was experienced, and fully conversant with the whole subject. Whatever could be done, must be through the Post Office Department. He would not think of attributing any party feeling on this subject to any gentleman here; for any one who would stir up the subject for the purpose of sustaining fanatic abolitionists, would bring up that which would have a tendency to dissolve our free and glorious institutions, and would render himself an object for the finger of scorn to point at.

The question was taken on the motion to refer the subject to a select committee, and decided in the affirmative: Ayes 23.

The committee, on motion of Mr. CALHOUN, was ordered to consist of five members, and was chosen as follows: Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. KING of Georgia, Mr. MANGUM, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. LINN.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 22.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of War on the subject of the construction of the Cumberland road in the States of Indiana and Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, a report from the Treasury Department, concerning insolvent debtors.

A report, also, from the Treasury Department, in reference to custom-house officers; which was ordered to be printed.

Numerous petitions and memorials were presented by the Chair, and referred to the appropriate committees.

PATRIOTIC BANK OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, having presented a memorial from the Patriotic Bank of the city of Washington,

Mr. BENTON said that a petition for rechartering a bank in the city of Washington had been presented by a gentleman near him, and been referred, without exciting his immediate attention. During the last session he had objected to the receiving of petitions of this character, and during the present he had found on his table—and he presumed other Senators had been equally fortunate—a pamphlet of some two hundred pages, in which, without alluding to him by name, an attempt was made to refute his arguments, and to turn the position which he had then taken up against all banking companies as now conducted. He still maintained that position, nor would the essay of any man move him from it. He still believed that the banking system was full of corruption every where; but that it had been more abused in this District than in any other quarter of the globe—that these ten miles square had more banking capital on paper than any other ten miles square in Europe, Asia, Africa, or America.

He wished for the appointment of a special committee to inquire into the system upon which these corporations had acted; for he believed their currency had depreciated so low that the very washerwomen and laborers on canals had been cheated out of the better portion of their hard-earned wages, while at the same time the Government of the United States could have supplied them with more gold and silver than could possibly have been absorbed in all their business transactions. Such reports had reached him, indeed, as were sufficient to excite the indignation of any man. He intended to have proof upon every point; and if these reports were true, even in part, then the petitioners should have leave to withdraw, and all who followed in their track might go and do likewise. He had already taken a stand in favor of a hard-money currency, and he had no idea of being sneered out of all legislation upon the subject now. He believed there were ten or twelve banks, broken and unbroken, in the District; he believed they would all stop by the 4th of March, and he thought it would be better for the community if they were stopped now.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said that the memorial was handed to him by several of the most respectable individuals in this community, and that, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, it was assuredly his duty to present it. How far we should go in chartering or rechartering banking companies was a question for after consideration; as for this petition, it was perfectly respectful, and he hoped would be permitted to take the usual course. When the proper time arrived, the Senator from Missouri would have an opportunity of throwing such obstacles in its way as he might think necessary.

Mr. BENTON said that, as for waiting till the bill was on its passage before he offered his objections, that was not the way in which the Bank of the United States was prostrated. The petition for rechartering might be successful, but the petitioners would find themselves mistaken if they thought their purpose was to be accomplished without such improvements and modifications being insisted upon as the lights of the age seemed to require.

NORTHERN BOUNDARY OF OHIO.

Mr. MORRIS, in pursuance of notice given, asked and obtained leave, and introduced the following joint resolution; which was read, and ordered to a second reading:

Whereas it is provided in the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution of the State of Ohio as follows: "That the limits and boundaries of this State be ascertained, it is declared that they are as hereafter mentioned; that is to say, on the east by the Pennsylvania line, and on the south by the Ohio river, to the mouth of the Great Miami river; on the west by a line drawn due north from the mouth of the Great Miami river aforesaid; on the north by an east and west line drawn through the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, running east, after intersecting the due north line aforesaid, from the mouth of the Great Miami river, until it shall intersect Lake Erie on the territorial line, and thence, with the same, through Lake Erie, to the Pennsylvania line aforesaid: Provided always, and it is hereby fully understood and declared by the convention, that if the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan should extend so far south that a line drawn due east from it should not intersect Lake Erie, or if it should intersect said Lake Erie east of the mouth of the Miami river of the Lake, then, and in that case, with the assent of the Congress of the United States, the northern boundary of Ohio State shall be established by and extend to a line running from the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of the Miami bay, after intersecting the due north line from the mouth of the Great Miami river aforesaid; thence, northeast, to the territorial line, and by the said territorial line to the Pennsylvania line." And whereas the State of Ohio claims that the assent of the Congress of the United States has been virtually and substantially given to the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution as above set forth, and more especially to the latter clause thereof, describing her northern boundary as contained in the proviso to said section, by admitting her Senators and Representatives to their seats in Congress, and more fully by the act of Congress as declared February 19, 1803, entitled an act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio, in the preamble to which act it is declared that the State of Ohio has become one of the United States of America, whereby, as a matter of right, the said State has acquired, and can rightfully exercise, jurisdiction on her northern border to the line as described in the latter clause of the proviso contained in the sixth section of the seventh article of her constitution; but as doubts have arisen whether the act of Congress of the 11th of January, 1805, entitled an act to divide the Indian Territory into two separate Governments, does not contravene the rightful jurisdiction of Ohio to the line as described in the article of her constitution as above stated: In order, therefore, that doubts may no longer exist on this subject,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the assent of the Congress of the United States is hereby fully declared and given to the latter clause of the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution of the State of Ohio, which is in the following words, to wit: "The northern boundary of this State shall be established by and extended to a direct line running from the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of the Miami bay, after intersecting the due north line from the mouth of the Great Miami aforesaid; thence, northeast, to the territorial line, and by said territorial line to the Pennsylvania line."

And be it further resolved, That any State or States that may be formed of the territory of the United States lying east of the Mississippi river, which Congress may hereafter deem proper to admit into the Union, shall be bounded on the south by the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, as the law may require.

The Senate proceeded to ballot for the committee ordered to be appointed on the message of the President concerning the Ohio and Michigan controversy, when the following Senators were appointed:

Mr. BENTON, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. CLAYTON, Mr. CRITTENDEN, and Mr. PRESTON.

MICHIGAN SENATORS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate proceeded to consider his motion, laid on the table some days since, to extend the courtesy of the Senate to the Senators from Michigan, by assigning them chairs in the Senate.

Mr. BENTON stated that he now proposed to modify his motion by substituting what he would now send to the Chair, which was copied verbatim from the resolution adopted by the Senate when Messrs. Blount and Cocke came here as Senators from the Northwest Territory. The resolution could be found in the 2d volume of the reprint of the Senate Journals, page 269. The only change was in inserting the words "on the floor," which he had added.

The modification was then read, as follows:

That Mr. LYON and Mr. NONVELL, who claim to be Senators of the United States, be received as spectators, and that chairs be provided for that purpose, [on the floor] until the final decision of the Senate shall be given on the application to admit Michigan into the Union.

Mr. EWING moved to strike out the words "on the floor;" which was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. TIPTON. I must claim the indulgence of the Senate a few minutes, to explain the reasons that influence the course I feel it to be my duty to pursue on the question now before us. Coming as I do from a new State, that but a few years ago was knocking at the door of Congress for admission into the Union, as Michigan now is, I cannot consent to give a silent vote that would be thought unkind to the people of that Territory, amongst whom it is my good fortune to have some valuable friends, or uncourteous to the gentlemen sent to represent her in this Senate.

Sir, said Mr. T., I acknowledge the right of the people of the Territory, when they have 60,000 free inhabitants, to form a constitution, and to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, provided the constitution formed by them is republican, and not incompatible with the constitution of the United States. It will be recollected by Senators that, two years ago, I had the honor to urge on the consideration of the Senate a bill providing for taking a census of the people of both Arkansas and Michigan Territories; and if they were ascertained to contain 47,700 inhabitants, federal numbers, the present ratio of representation in the other branch of Congress, to authorize them to form a constitution and State Government. It was not the pleasure of the Senate to adopt the measure I then proposed. This I sincerely regretted, and still regret. I feel confident that the passage of this law at that time would have prevented most of the difficulty that has happened in a certain quarter; it would have promoted harmony and good feeling, and taught obedience to the laws; and more, these Territories would have been admitted into the Union, as independent States, at a much earlier day than they now can, under the existing state of things.

Michigan Senators.

[SENATE.]

The people of Michigan now inform us that they have ascertained, to their own satisfaction, that they have a sufficient number of inhabitants to enable them to form a constitution and State Government, and for their admission into the Union as an independent State; and they present a constitution formed by a convention of that Territory, and demand admittance. The Senator from Missouri has moved the Senate to allow two gentlemen, sent to represent the State of Michigan in the Senate, to take seats in this chamber. He tells us that we owe it to courtesy as well to the people of the Territory as to the two gentlemen sent to represent her. This is very civil, and looks well on paper; but, sir, courtesy is also due to the people of another section of the country, and my constituents come in for a share; and before I can vote seats in this chamber to Senators from Michigan, I must take the liberty of examining her constitution, to ascertain whether it is in conformity to the constitution and laws of the United States, and what territory it embraces within the bounds of the proposed new State.

I find, on examining the first article of her constitution, that Michigan attempts to include within her limits all the territory embraced in the Michigan Territory by an act of Congress of 11th February, 1805, organizing the Michigan Territory. That act establishes the south boundary of that Territory on a line to be drawn due east from the southern bend or extreme of Lake Michigan, and the Michigan convention has overlooked or disregarded an act of Congress of 19th June, 1816, authorizing the people of the Indiana Territory to form a constitution and State Government. This act proposes to establish the north boundary of Indiana on a line drawn east through a point ten miles north of the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, provided that the convention of the people of Indiana would accept and ratify that boundary. The Indiana convention did accept and ratify the boundary thus proposed, and the country between these lines became part and parcel of the State of Indiana.

I find, sir, said Mr. T., that the third section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States reads thus: New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union, but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislature of the States concerned as well as of Congress.

I consider it unfortunate for Michigan that her convention has entirely disregarded this provision of the United States constitution. She has set up a claim to a tract of country ten miles wide, north and south, and extending from Lake Michigan to the east boundary of Indiana, over 100 miles. Indiana has been in possession of this part of her territory near twenty years; has laid off counties, built towns, opened roads, and made her local arrangements, and she cannot tamely surrender it up to any power on earth. This claim of Michigan was as unnecessary to her as it was unexpected to us; she is larger without that territory than Indiana is with it. The people residing there have no wish to be included in Michigan—Indiana will never surrender them to her. It is therefore, sir, impossible, under this view of the case, for her to be admitted under the present form of her constitution. I can no more vote seats in this chamber to the gentlemen sent here as her Senators, than to any other gentlemen that may be in attendance here from the Territory. One of her Senators has a right to the privileged seats, in consequence of having been a Delegate in the other House. I would be willing to vote like privileges to the other. Let them come in as spectators, not as Senators.

Let Michigan retrace her steps, and strike from her constitution all that part that claims a portion of the neighboring States, and present herself here, and I will be amongst the first to take her by the hand and welcome her into our great family, the confederacy. Let her come in as a peaceable and good-humored sister; I want no more schisms in our family. What have we lately heard on our borders? We have had flaming general orders, calling on the militia to stand by their arms, to maintain the integrity of certain boundaries that Congress had fixed, and that Congress alone has the right to alter. It is true, sir, that no blood was shed in this tumult, but it is equally true that things there assumed at one time a most alarming aspect.

I am confident, said Mr. T., that, if Michigan be admitted with her constitution in its present form, there will be an appeal to the courts of the country, or, what is far worse, to arms. This will produce a state of things that I am sure every patriot will avoid.

Mr. T. said he had much more to say on this subject, but would suspend further remark to some other opportunity.

Mr. EWING said he would propose to the Senator from Missouri a modification of his motion. LUCIUS LYON, on the ground of his having been a Delegate in the other House, had a right to come on the floor of the Senate. No resolution, therefore, is necessary for him. He is already a privileged spectator. As far as that goes, a simple resolution to admit JOHN NORVELL as a spectator will be sufficient. He was not willing to do any thing which could be considered as directly or indirectly recognising the claims of Michigan. If the modification were adopted, the whole of the words after the word "resolved" would be stricken out, and the following words inserted:

"That JOHN NORVELL be admitted as a spectator."

In this form he would vote for the motion.

Mr. BENTON suggested that his motion was copied from the resolution on the journals. He thought we had better provide chairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that he always regretted when an appeal was made to his liberality or courtesy for that which he could not grant, and that this was his present situation. What is the case? said Mr. H. A man comes into my house; he tells me that he has come for the purpose of appropriating to himself a part of my house, or of despoiling me of a portion of my goods; and that he has means in train by which, in his opinion, he will speedily accomplish these objects. But, inasmuch as it will be more convenient to him to attend to this work of spoliation within the house than out of doors, he asks that, through courtesy, I would assign him a seat, and permit him to remain till he can finish his work. Now, said Mr. H., this statement well enough describes the relations, as far as this proposition is concerned, between the two citizens of Michigan and the two Senators from Indiana on this floor. They say that they are Senators from the State of Michigan; that the sovereignty and independence of that State is extended over a large territory of the State of Indiana; that it is their intention to eject the jurisdiction of Indiana from this territory; and that, to enable them more conveniently and more speedily to do this, they ask to be admitted upon the floor of the Senate. Comity should never ask what comity can never grant; and this seems to be a case of that kind.

It has been said on this floor, continued Mr. H., that Michigan is a State de facto. But this, with great deference to the opinion, on account of the source whence it comes, he must be permitted to controvert, and to say that he knew of no such case. He inferred, indeed, that no such case could exist, because the constitution says that "no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress." Now, sir, said Mr. H., if it had been indispensably necessary that Michigan should become a State, and that the State of Indiana should be partitioned and dismembered for her benefit, comity would have said that she should at least have asked the consent of the Legislature of that State; and the constitution of the United States, as well as comity would also have required the same thing. Comity, too, would have deferred something to the fact that the State of Indiana has been peaceably in the Union for about twenty years, and that, too, with boundaries prescribed and assented to by Congress.

Sir, said Mr. H., I undertake to say that Michigan is not a State, neither de facto nor de jure, and that she never can be a State with her assumed boundaries. The President of the United States is bound to see that the laws of the Union are faithfully administered, in and over the Territory of Michigan, until the people of that Territory shall have the permission of Congress to pass from a Territorial to a State Government; and no one can doubt that he will faithfully perform that duty. It might, perhaps, be out of place here to say much about the rights, or pretended rights, of Michigan for admission into the Union. He would, however, say that she is not on an equal footing with any of the three States already formed out of the Northwestern Territory. Their boundaries were described by the ordinance of 1787, and by it they were made and called States. In it, too, they had a guarantee that they should be admitted into the Union, with a population each of 60,000 free inhabitants. None of these pre-requisites exist in relation to Michigan. Congress has never yet determined to form any State north of the latitude of the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan.

The people of Michigan petitioned Congress two years ago to do this, but it has never been done. There is no case in existence to which the present condition and attitude of Michigan can be assimilated. That of Tennessee was a much stronger case; but he was willing to accord to the citizens in question all that was granted to the Senators from Tennessee. And what was that? He took it from the pamphlet, furnished as he supposed by a citizen of Michigan, for he had searched no further. It was that they should be "admitted as spectators," until the decision of the Senate on the pending bill. It would not enlarge the present privileges of one of the persons claiming to be received as a Senator from Michigan. That privilege he had already under our rules, in virtue of having been a Delegate in the other House; but it would confer this privilege on the other, who had it not. This much he was willing to do, and no more; and to effect this he offered an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, or a substitute, whichever it ought to be considered, (for he had not the proposition before him,) proposing to extend the same privileges of the Senate to the honorable JOHN NORVELL, which, by our rules, are extended to the members of the House of Representatives and the Delegates from the Territories.

Resolved, That the same courtesy be extended to the honorable JOHN NORVELL, as a spectator in the Senate chamber, which, by the rules of the Senate, is now extended to the Delegates of Territories and members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BENTON said we should be careful, lest the language be construed to expel these Senators altogether. He did not intend to charge any such design, nor would he say that such would be the effect. It was a case in which every man must consult his own bosom. When he came here as a Senator from Missouri, he and his colleague were not entitled to a seat as a right, but the presiding officer gave them seats as a courtesy. We never applied for seats or took them. The case is different here. These Senators have presented their credentials, and are bound to wait here until the admission of the State; and there could be no impropriety in their waiting on the same terms as the Senators from Tennessee. But, while the resolution carefully omits any word which can commit any Senator, while every such word is studiously left out, it may be, from the construction of the language, that the Senators from Michigan may think they cannot use the privilege at all, without surrendering their own grounds, and that they may believe that they cannot attend even as spectators in the gallery. He would leave it to gentlemen if it might not be better to give them chairs, and admit them as spectators. If they are allowed to listen to the debates which relate to the diagram of country to which they belong, they might be able to present their views. He had listened yesterday to the speech of the Senator from Ohio, which to him was unanswerable, but these gentlemen from Michigan might have found something to say in reply to it. They should have seats, to enable them to hear what concerns the diagram of country to which they belong, that if any erroneous facts or wrong analogies should be presented, they may furnish the correction. The Senate had better give them chairs, according to the precedent on the journals, and not use words such as might preclude them, by making them suppose they cannot accept the courtesy without the compromise of their rights.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that he could very well appreciate the feelings of delicacy so often mentioned in this discussion. The proposition before the Senate was exclusively one of courtesy and delicacy. He admitted, too, the propriety of prudence and caution in forming opinions about the right of Michigan to be received into the Union as a sovereign and independent State. But, in relation to himself and his colleague, a squeamish delicacy would be entirely out of place. For us to doubt or hesitate about our course or duty, with the constitution of Michigan on our tables, claiming as it does a large district of our State, would be wholly unpardonable. He, for one, had no opinion on this subject to form. He had but one course to take, and that was to resist the admission of Michigan as a State of this Union, at every step, until she expunged from her constitution her unfounded claim upon the territory of Indiana.

The Senator from Missouri had spoken of precedents, and had instanced those of Tennessee and Missouri. But the Tennessee case conferred no greater privilege than that already enjoyed by the honorable LUCIUS LYON, one of the gentlemen in question, in virtue of his having been a Delegate in the House of Representatives, and no greater privilege than that proposed by his amendment to be conferred on the other, the honorable JOHN NORVELL. The precedent of Missouri. And is there any similarity between the case of Missouri and that of Michigan? Surely, none. Missouri was a State, known as such to our laws. She had formed her constitution in pursuance of a law of Congress. She was a State de jure, as well as in form and in fact. She presented a constitution unexceptionable. There was no question of boundary; no question about her right of admission as a State. The only question was one involving the power of Congress to attach a condition, after her right to admission had become perfect. Here, in the case of Michigan, the question of State or no State has yet to be settled, as well as the question of boundary, involving, as it does, the integrity of one or more of the States. In relation to other States, where there were no difficult preliminary questions to settle, he believed that no special comity had been shown to the Senators who presented themselves. He referred to the admission of Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, and other new States, where the journals showed no resolutions of courtesy to the Senators in attendance before they were sworn as members of the body. He well recollected that the Senators from Indiana did not obtain seats until the joint resolution of admission had passed both Houses, and obtained the appropriate signatures. The precedents which the practice of the Senate in these cases afforded were against the application in the present case.

Mr. BUCHANAN thought more consequence was given to this matter than it deserved. There were some points in this controversy on which, after the fullest examination, he had entirely made up his mind; and one of these was, never, while he had a seat on this floor, to give a vote which would have the effect of disturbing either the territory of Indiana or that of Illinois. Further than this, at present, he would not go. But, having come to this decision, he had as little hesitation to expressing it as the gentleman from Indiana. The State of Michigan now came here and asked admission. It was proper that those who had been sent by her as Senators should be present in this body to hear what was said, and to prosecute the claim in a proper manner. All agree that they shall be admitted in some way, and the only question is, whether chairs shall be assigned to them, or they shall be admitted on the footing of other privileged spectators. It had been said that it would be sufficient to admit Mr. NORVELL. He thought so himself; but, as the precedent went further, he would vote with the Senator from Missouri. But, if he were in the situation of that Senator, and the course would be agreeable to the gentleman from Michigan, he would so modify the motion as to make it agreeable to what seemed to be the wish of the Senate. Mr. NORVELL might be admitted, and, when admitted, he would have to sit somewhere.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH suggested that the motion should be so modified as to admit the gentleman to the privileges of the Senate chamber.

Mr. BENTON suggested that the members of the other House were all privileged to come into the Senate chamber. There were many other privileged persons, and the whole number might be three or four hundred. There were more privileged persons than could get into the chamber, and these gentlemen might be so situated as to be excluded by the press of other persons. If chairs were provided, and a thousand persons were pressing into the chamber, they would be able to go to their chairs.

The question was put on the amendment moved by Mr. HENDRICKS, and decided in the affirmative: Ayes 22, noes 18.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

After taking up sundry bills, and adopting various resolutions lying on the table,

The Senate spent a short time in executive business, and then Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23.

NEWSPAPERS TO MEMBERS.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. ROBBINS, concerning the usual supply of newspapers to each Senator, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, read the rule which provides "that all resolutions proposing amendments to the constitution, or to which the approbation and signature of the President may be requisite, or which may grant money out of the contingent or any other fund, shall be treated, in all respects, in the introduction and form of proceedings in them, in the Senate, in a similar manner with bills." It was contended by Mr. K. that this resolution came within the meaning of the rule, and ought to have three several readings on three several days.

The CHAIR having placed the same construction on the rule, the resolution was ordered to lie over until to-morrow.

PATENT LAWS.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. PRENTISS was taken up for consideration.

Mr. PRENTISS modified the resolution by striking out all after the words "circuit court," and inserting the following words: "in all cases where the validity of a right derived from any such patent shall come in question."

The resolution, as modified and agreed to, reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving to the circuit courts of the United States original jurisdiction, exclusive of the district courts, of the process and proceedings prescribed by law for the repeal of patents for new and useful inventions and discoveries; and also of allowing an appeal to the Supreme Court, by writ of error or otherwise, from the judgment of any circuit court, in all cases where the validity of a right derived from any such patent shall come in question.

The joint resolution introduced by Mr. MORRIS was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BALLOT FOR CHAPLAIN.

The Senate, according to order, proceeded to ballot for a chaplain.

There were three balloting: Mr. Higbee and Mr. Harrison were the principal candidates. On the first ballot each of these gentlemen received 12 votes; on the second ballot Mr. Harrison had 16, and Mr. Higbee 15 votes; and on the third ballot Mr. Higbee received 23 out of 38 votes, and Mr. Harrison 14.

The Rev. Mr. Higbee was therefore elected chaplain of the Senate.

Much other usual business was transacted to-day, in the reception of memorials, resolutions, introduction of bills, and the reference of portions of the President's message to the appropriate committees.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 24.

After the reception of sundry memorials,

Mr. ROBBINS, in pursuance of notice given, asked and obtained leave, and introduced a joint resolution providing for supplying the members of the Senate with newspapers; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

SESSIONS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HENDRICKS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of fixing, by law, the time of the commencement and close of every succeeding session of Congress.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. HENDRICKS said it would be recollected that, at the last session of Congress, the Committee on the Judiciary had been instructed, on his motion, to inquire into the expediency of fixing, by law, the times of the commencement and close of every succeeding session of Congress. That this subject, owing to the great mass of business before the session, which was a short one, did not receive the action of the committee or the Senate; and it was his intention, at the present time, again to present it for consideration. He earnestly hoped that the present session would not pass away without legislation upon it. He was induced to look into this matter, from the fact of the great disparity in the length of the sessions, which disparity, too, was continually increasing, by the continual increase of the long sessions. The idea of equalizing the sessions, whatever their necessary length might be, seemed to be a reasonable one, and the increasing length of the long session had become a grievance and an evil which ought to be remedied. The third of March, from long usage and custom of this Government, had generally been looked upon as the termination of every Congress. But it was not necessarily so, not being established as such either by the constitution or by law. He stated it as a fact, that, since the first organization under the constitution of the United States, Congress had passed no law on the subject. There was nothing in the statute book about it, and the Senate of the United States had never acted upon it. There was nothing in existence upon this subject but a resolution of the old Congress of the 13th of September, 1788, which was obviously intended as an incipient and temporary regulation; and so the thing has rested ever since.

A glance at the history of this matter, said Mr. H., will be sufficient to show us the propriety of legislating upon it. The convention which formed the constitution of the United States reported that instrument to the Congress of the confederation on the 17th of September, 1787, and on the 28th of the same month Congress resolved that the constitution so reported be transmitted to the States for their ratification. On the 13th of September, 1788, Congress declared that the constitution thus transmitted had been ratified by a sufficient number of the States to give it effect. It was then necessary that measures be taken for the organization of the federal Government under it; and on the same 13th of September, 1788, the Congress of the confederation resolved that the first Wednesday of January next ensuing be the day for appointing electors in the several States which before that day should have ratified the constitution; that the first Wednesday of the ensuing February should be the day appointed for the electors to assemble in their respective States and vote for a President; and that the first Wednesday of March next be the time, and the then seat of Government the place, for commencing the proceedings under the constitution. Now, this first Wednesday of March next, said Mr. H., happened to be the fourth day of March, 1789, and this was the only reason why the fourth day of March, in every second year, has ever since been sanctioned, by usage and custom, as the commencement of the Congressional term; and the reason why the previous day, the third of March, has been considered the close of the term.

And here he remarked that, in this view of the subject, the delicacy felt by many members in protracting the sessions of the third of March beyond midnight was without any good reason: for, taking it for granted that the Congressional term of two years commenced on the 4th of March, the two years would not expire till the same hour of the day on the 4th in which the first session of 1789 was opened. The truth is, said Mr. H., the constitution says nothing about the 4th of March as the commencement of the term; nor does any law, save the resolution of the old Congress before referred to. The constitution merely says that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people." And in reference to the meeting of Congress, or the commencement of the sessions, it says that "the Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day."

It is obvious, then, that the whole subject is open for legislation. Congress cannot, indeed, say that the Congressional term of two years shall hereafter commence at an earlier day than the 4th of March; because that would infringe upon the constitutional term of the Congress in being when this arrangement should commence; but Congress can say that the commencement of the term shall be on any subsequent day, and that the sessions shall commence at any time thought to be most convenient.

The power, then, of regulating these matters by law being unquestionable, the propriety and necessity of doing so is scarcely less certain. He had said that the increasing length of the long sessions had become an evil which ought to be remedied. For proof of this, it was only necessary to look back a few years upon our journals for the dates of our adjournments. During the last session, Mr. H. said he had procured to be made out a statement showing the commencement and termination, and the number of days, in each session of Congress held under the constitution. A reference to this statement would show that, in the history of this Government, in times of peace, there had been no session at all equal in length to the long sessions of the last two Congresses; the sessions which terminated in 1832 and 1834. The session of 1812, when war was declared, was a few days longer than that of 1832, but the latter was much longer than any other session during the war. The long session of 1798, during our troubles with France, was the longest session since the adoption of the constitution. That, and the one just mentioned, of 1812, were the only sessions of greater length than that of 1832; and these and one other, that of 1790, are the only sessions as long as that of 1834. The long sessions since the last war had all terminated in April and May, save the last two.

There is, Mr. President, much evil in this tendency to perpetual Parliaments. We all know that they are not needed on account of legislative business; for the statute book, the journals, and our documents, show that during a short session as much useful business is generally done as in a long one. High party times, such as we have had for years past, and such as existed in 1798, give occasion for long sessions. Such times have a tendency to protract the sessions that are not limited by law; but, whether for good or for evil, is very questionable. Such times and such sessions are not well calculated to throw oil upon the troubled waters; and party broils and national discords are generally heightened, and often engendered, by lengthy and excited discussions here. A law, then, that would fix the termination of every regular session, giving time enough for all useful discussion and legislative deliberation, is, as I believe, greatly to be desired. The necessary business would then all be done, and probably with much more certainty and accuracy than as the matter now stands. The day of adjournment being fixed, business would be shaped in reference to that day, and much less time would be uselessly disposed of.

He would not, however, further pursue these remarks, but would content himself, for the present, with offering a resolution on the subject, and with moving that the statement referred to be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to state that he concurred in what had fallen from the Senator from Indiana. That gentleman had stated with entire correctness the manner in which every term of the members of the old Congress commenced on the 4th of March, and terminated on the 3d of March, of every second year thereafter. It did not appear on the record of the votes and proceedings of the old Congress that that body adjourned as a matter of necessity, on the 3d or 4th of March. All that appeared was, that Congress, as soon as the constitution was ratified by nine States, as it was their duty to do, put the new Government in operation; and that they were called together, in the city of New York, on the first Wednesday in March, 1789. The first Wednesday happened to be on the 4th of March, and as that day had been fixed, the 4th of March came to be considered as the commencement and end of the term of service of Senators and Representatives, for six and two years, respectively, and not the first Wednesday in March, which would be a variable period. He concurred in the general observations which had fallen from the gentleman from Indiana, but he thought it doubtful whether we could change the day of the commencement of the term of the session, because, since the practice has grown into a law, some of the States have recognised the Congressional term as beginning and terminating on that day, and this cannot be altered. This he suggested without examination of the subject.

But if it was found to be inconvenient in this respect, the chief object of the Senator might still be accomplished. It would be convenient to meet on the first Monday in November, and to give to every alternate session an addition of a month or six weeks. To such a difference in the length of the sessions there could be no objection, because the first session of every Congress is the long one, and, by the rules of the House, in certain stages, the business was continued from session to session, therefore less time was required at the second session. If a law were to be passed fixing both sessions to commence on the first Monday in November, and the second to terminate on the 3d of March, while the first session may be allowed to continue longer, he thought much good might result from the change. He was of the opinion that the present system was an evil, and it would be a great convenience if gentlemen could be able to ascertain precisely the time when their duties here would terminate. With this general concurrence of the views of the Senator from Indiana, he hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. CLAYTON said that there were other reasons than the lateness of the period at which this subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session, for their delay in then recommending to the Senate any alteration in the periods of commencing and terminating the sessions of Congress. It was not understood that a provision for commencing each session on the first of November, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, would not clash with provisions in some of the States fixing the time of electing Representatives, or render it necessary for those States to alter their constitutions. In some States the election of Representatives in November is provided for by their constitutions. [Mr. WENSTER said he knew of one—Mississippi.] Mr. C. said there was at least one other, the State he in part represented, although there the election occurred a year before the commencement of each new Congress. How far these constitutional provisions in other cases may form impediments to legislative action on this subject, the committee had not determined, and indeed it would require much consideration of the State laws and constitutions, which have been often changed or modified, to decide upon an unexceptionable measure to equalize the sessions. He was favorable to the object of the resolution, but the committee would not act without full information of the consequences of any measure which might be proposed to attain the end desired; and he desired, in the event of the adoption of the resolution, that a Senator from each State should inform them of the operation of any plan suggested upon his own section of country.

This resolution, which was considered and agreed to, and the statement accompanying it, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRESTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the bill concerning cases of appeals in suits arising out of the revenue laws, with an amendment.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after a short time spent therein, Adjourned till Monday.

ALEXANDRIA MEMORIAL.

Among other memorials presented to day,

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of sundry citizens of Alexandria, District of Columbia, numerously signed, on the subject of the financial condition of that town. The petitioners state, said Mr. B., that the corporate authorities of Alexandria had, to say the least of it, greatly mismanaged the affairs of the town, and that the town had been involved in difficulties and debts beyond its ability to pay; a state of things bearing hard on the middling and industrious classes. The petitioners prayed to be relieved from their Holland debt, and for such other relief in their embarrassments as Congress, in its wisdom, might see fit to grant. Mr. B. presumed that this petition had been put into his hands in consequence of some remarks he made a few days ago on the subject of the District banks, a kindred subject, referring to the embarrassed financial condition of this ten miles square, created, as he believed, by great mismanagement. It was not for him to say any thing in aggravation of the case set out by the petitioners. They were, some of them, no doubt, known to some of the members of the Committee on the District, who would inquire into all the circumstances referred to in the memorial. He would move to refer the petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which motion was agreed to.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was charged with the presentation of a memorial on behalf of the citizens of the city of New York, and more especially in behalf of that portion of those citizens who were sufferers by the late conflagration in that city. Consequent upon that unexampled calamity, a public meeting of the citizens of the city was called, and a committee of one hundred and twenty-five persons, distinguished for their standing, was appointed to prepare a memorial to Congress for such relief as it might be supposed Congress could afford. The memorial he held had proceeded from that committee, and was signed by its chairman.

Mr. W. said the memorial was too long to authorize him to ask for its reading at the Secretary's table, and he would therefore state, in the condensed language of the memorial itself, the relief prayed for, which was as follows:

1. "A remission or refunding of duties on goods in original packages, which have been destroyed by the late conflagration.

2. "An extension of credit on all the existing bonds for duties payable in this city, and falling due after the 16th of this month.

3. "A general temporary extension of the time of payment of cash and other duties on goods imported into the United States subsequent to the 16th of this month.

4. "An investment of a portion of the unappropriated surplus revenue of the United States, in such periods and such manner as will afford relief to the city of New York."

These, Mr. W. said, were the specific modes of relief prayed for in the memorial. It was not his purpose to consider them at this time; but he felt it to be a duty he owed to his colleague and himself, upon the presentation of this memorial, to trouble the Senate with a single remark. This signal calamity upon a very numerous and most important portion of their immediate constituents had not been unnoticed by them, or failed to excite their most lively anxieties; but upon full deliberation they had believed that they, as the immediate representatives of the State in this body, should best discharge their duties here, and best consult the interests of those who had suffered, to wait any action, so far as action of Congress might be expected, until the specific wishes of those immediately concerned, and therefore most competent to specify their wants, should be made known. That had now been done in the memorial he held in his hand, and he most cheerfully communicated those wishes to the Senate. For the single reason assigned, and for no other, his colleague and himself, up to this time, had remained silent upon this important subject, and had not made any proposition, or in any shape brought the matter to the notice of the Senate.

Mr. W. then moved that the memorial, without a reading, be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that the same be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER said he hoped the memorial would be printed with all possible despatch, that the members of the Senate might have an opportunity to read it. It appeared to be a long and reasoned paper, stating the grounds, both of right and expediency, on which relief, in the specified modes, was asked.

These modes were different, and all entitled to much consideration. For the present, he should express an opinion only on one of them, and that was the last. In that, the memorialists asked, substantially, for such an investment of the surplus revenue, or proper portions of it, as would be advantageous to the commercial community of New York. I have regarded this (said Mr. W.) as the most ready, plain, and effectual mode of present relief. It is known that the amount of revenue now on hand, and for which there is no immediate call, is great. It is understood that some millions lie in a single deposit bank in the city of New York, locked up from all public use. The emergency of the case calls for such a disposition of these funds, as that, to a just and proper extent, they may be the basis of a discount, to meet the new created wants of the merchants. Immediate means are wanted, some provision to meet existing obligations, till time shall be allowed for other arrangements, and other dispositions of business. In short, it is a great object to make the money market easy, if possible, during the excitement and the distress occasioned by this great disaster. The Government can readily do much towards producing this effect, without the slightest public inconvenience.

I have heard that the deposit banks cannot discount to the amount of their means, on account of the limitations of their respective charters.

If this be so, I know not why the Secretary of the Treasury might not, without any act of Congress, select other banks, and distribute the fund among them, so that the community might enjoy the fullest benefit to be derived from that source. If two or three banks may be selected, four or five might also, with the same propriety. I am persuaded it is the duty of Congress to act in this matter promptly and efficiently. The Committee on Finance will consider this memorial immediately, and be prepared to recommend to the Senate such measures as may occur to them as being necessary and proper; but I hope it is likely the Senate may only be called on to follow the lead of the other House.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Several bills and resolutions were now successively taken up and appropriately disposed of, without debate; among which

The joint resolution for supplying the members of the Senate with newspapers, was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

After spending some time in executive business, The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 29.

DISTRIBUTIVE LAND BILL:

After the usual preliminary business of the morning had been gone through with,

Mr. CLAY rose and addressed the Chair. Although (said he) I find myself borne down by the severest affliction with which Providence has ever been pleased to visit me, I have thought that my private griefs ought not longer to prevent me from attempting, ill as I feel qualified, to discharge my public duties. And I now rise, in pursuance of the notice which has been given, to ask leave to introduce a bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting land to certain States.

I feel it incumbent on me to make a brief explanation of the highly important measure which I have now the honor to propose. The bill, which I desire to introduce, provides for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands in the years 1833, '34, '35, '36, and '37, among the twenty-four States of the Union, and conforms substantially to that which passed in 1833. It is, therefore, of a temporary character; but, if it shall be found to have salutary operation, it will be in the power of a future Congress to give it an indefinite continuance; and, if otherwise, it will expire by its own terms. In the event of war unfortunately breaking out with any foreign Power, the bill is to cease, and the fund which it distributes is to be applied to the prosecution of the war. The bill directs that ten per cent. of the net proceeds of the public lands, sold within the limits of the seven new States, shall be first set apart for them, in addition to the five per cent. reserved by their several compacts with the United States; and that the residue of the proceeds, whether from sales made in the States or Territories, shall be divided among the twenty-four States in proportion to their respective federal population. In this respect the bill conforms to that which was introduced in 1832. For one, I should have been willing to have allowed the new States twelve and a half instead of ten per cent.; but, as that was objected to by the President in his veto message, and has been opposed in other quarters, I thought it best to restrict the allowance to the more moderate sum. The bill also contains large and liberal grants of land to several of the new States, to place them on an equality with others to which the bounty of Congress has been heretofore extended, and provides that, when other new States shall be admitted into the Union, they shall receive their share of the common fund.

The nett amount of the sales of the public lands in the year 1833 was the sum of $3,967,682 55, in the year 1834 was $4,857,600 69, and in the year 1835, according to actual receipts in the first three quarters, and an estimate of the fourth, is $12,223,121 15; making an aggregate for the three years of $21,047,404 39. This aggregate is what the bill proposes to distribute and pay to the twenty-four States on the 1st day of May, 1836, upon the principles which I have stated. The difference between the estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury and that which I have offered of the product of the last quarter of this year, arises from my having taken, as the probable sum, one third of the total amount of the first three quarters, and he some other conjectural sum. Deducting from the $21,047,404 39 the fifteen per cent. to which the seven new States, according to the bill, will be first entitled, amounting to $2,612,350 18, there will remain for distribution among the twenty-four States of the Union the sum of $18,435,054 21. Of this sum the proportion of Kentucky will be $960,947 41, of Virginia the sum of $1,581,669 39, of North Carolina $988,632 42, and of Pennsylvania $2,083,233 32. The proportion of Indiana, including the fifteen per cent., will be $855,588 23, of Ohio $1,677,110 84, and of Mississippi $958,945 42. And the proportions of all the twenty-four States are indicated in a table which I hold in my hand, prepared at my instance in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and to which any Senator may have access.* The grounds on which the extra allowance is made to the new States are, first, their complaint that all lands sold by the federal Government are five years exempted from State taxation; secondly, that it is to be applied in such manner as will augment the value of the unsold public lands within them; and, lastly, their recent establishment.

It may be recollected that a bill passed both Houses of Congress, in the session which terminated on the 3d March, 1833, for the distribution of the amount received from the public lands upon the principles of that now offered. The President, in his message at the commencement of the previous session, had specially invited the attention of Congress to the subject of the public lands; had adverted to their liberation from the pledge for the payment of the public debt; and had intimated his readiness to concur in any disposal of them which might appear to Congress most conducive to the quiet, harmony, and general interest of the American people.

After such a message, the President's disapprobation of the bill could not have been anticipated. It was presented to him on the 2d of March, 1833. It was not returned as the constitution requires, but was retained by him after the expiration of his official term, and until the next session of Congress, which had no power to act upon it. It was understood and believed that, in anticipation of the passage of the bill, the President had prepared objections to it, which he had intended to return with his negative; but he did not. If the bill had been returned, there is reason to believe that it would have passed, notwithstanding those objections. In the House it had been carried by a majority of more than two thirds. And, in the Senate, although there was not that majority on its passage, it was supposed that, in consequence of the passage of the compromise bill, some of the Senators who had voted against the land bill had changed their views, and would have voted for it upon its return, and others had left the Senate.

There are those who believe that the bill was constitutionally retained by the President, and is now the law of the land. But whether it be so or not, the general Government holds the public domain in trust for the common benefit of all the States; and it is, therefore, competent to provide by law that the trustee shall make distribution of the proceeds of the three past years, as well as future years, among those entitled to the beneficial interest. The bill makes such a provision. And it is very remarkable that the sum which it proposes to distribute is about the gross surplus or balance estimated in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1836. When the returns of the last quarter of the year come in, it will probably be found that the surplus is larger than the sum which the bill distributes. But if it should not be, there will remain the seven millions held in the Bank of the United States, applicable, as far as it may be received, to the service of the ensuing year.

It would be premature now to enter into a consideration of the probable revenue of future years; but, at the proper time, I think it will not be difficult to show that, exclusive of what may be received from the public lands, it will be abundantly sufficient for all the economical purposes of Government in a time of peace. And the bill, as I have already stated, provides for seasons of war. I wish to guard against all misconception by repeating, what I have heretofore several times said, that this bill is not founded upon any notion of a power in Congress to lay and collect taxes, and distribute the amount among the several States. I think Congress possesses no such power, and has no right to exercise it until some such amendment as that proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] shall be adopted. But the bill rests on the basis of a clear and comprehensive grant of power to Congress over the Territories and property of the United States in the constitution, and upon express stipulations in the deeds of cession.

Mr. President, I have ever regarded with feelings of the profoundest regret the decision which the President of the United States felt himself induced to make on the bill of 1833. If it had been his pleasure to approve it, the heads of Departments would not now be taxing their ingenuity to find out useless objects of expenditure, or objects which may be well postponed to a more distant day. If the bill had passed, about twenty millions of dollars would have been, during the last three years, in the hands of the several States, applicable by them to the beneficent purposes of internal improvement, education, or colonization. What immense benefits might not have been diffused throughout the land by the active employment of that large sum! What new channels of commerce and communication might not have been opened! What industry stimulated, what labor rewarded! How many youthful minds might have received the blessings of education and knowledge, and been rescued from ignorance, vice, and ruin! How many descendants of Africa might have been transported from a country where they never can enjoy political or social equality, to the native land of their fathers, where no impediment exists to their attainment of the highest degree of elevation, intellectual, social, and political! where they might have been successful instruments, in the hands of God, to spread the religion of his Son, and to lay the foundations of civil liberty!

Executive Patronage, &c.—Reduction of the Revenue.

And, sir, when we institute a comparison between what might have been effected, and what has been in fact done, with that large amount of national treasure, our sensations of regret, on account of the fate of the bill of 1833, are still keener. Instead of its being dedicated to the beneficent uses of the whole people and our entire country, it has been an object of scrambling amongst local corporations, and locked up in the vaults or loaned out by the directors of a few of them, who are not under the slightest responsibility to the Government or people of the United States. Instead of liberal, enlightened, and national purposes, it has been partially applied to local, limited, and selfish uses. Applied to increase the semi-annual dividends of favorite stockholders in favorite banks! Twenty millions of the national treasure are scattered in parcels among petty corporations; and whilst they are growing over the fragments, and greedy for more, the Secretaries are brooding on schemes for squandering the whole.

But, although we have lost three precious years, the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that the principal is yet safe, and much good may be still achieved with it. The general Government, by an extraordinary exercise of executive power, no longer affords aid to any new works of internal improvement. Although it sprung from the Union, and cannot survive the Union, it no longer engages in any public improvement to perpetuate the existence of the Union. It is but justice to it to acknowledge that, with the co-operation of the public-spirited State of Maryland, it effected one national road having that tendency. But the spirit of improvement pervades the land, in every variety of form, active, vigorous, and enterprising, wanting pecuniary aid as well as intelligent direction. The States have undertaken what the general Government is prevented from accomplishing. They are strengthening the Union by various lines of communication thrown across and through the mountains. New York has completed one great chain. Pennsylvania another, bolder in conception, and far more arduous in the execution. Virginia has a similar work in progress, worthy of all her enterprise and energy. A fourth, farther south, where the parts of the Union are too loosely connected, has been projected, and it can certainly be executed with the supplies which this bill affords, and perhaps not without them.

This bill passed, and these and other similar undertakings completed, we may indulge the patriotic hope that our Union will be bound by ties and interests that render it indissoluble. As the general Government withholds all direct agency from these truly national works, and from all new objects of internal improvement, ought it not to yield to the States, what is their own, the amount received from the public lands? It would thus but execute faithfully a trust expressly created by the original deeds of cession, or resulting from the treaties of acquisition. With this ample resource, every desirable object of improvement, in every part of our extensive country, may, in due time, be accomplished. Placing this exhaustless fund in the hands of the several members of the confederacy, their common federal head may address them in the glowing language of the British bard, and

" Bid harbors open, public ways extend,
Bid temples worthy of the God ascend.
Bid the broad arch the dangerous flood contain,

The mole, projecting, break the roaring main.
Back to his bounds their subject sea command,
And roll obedient rivers through the land."

The affair of the public lands was forced upon me. In the session 1831-'2 a motion from a quarter politically unfriendly to me was made to refer it to the Committee of Manufactures, of which I was a member. I strenuously opposed the reference. I remonstrated, I protested, I entreated, I implored. It was in vain that I insisted that the Committee on the Public Lands was the regular standing committee to which the reference should be made. It was in vain that I contended that the public lands and domestic manufactures were subjects absolutely incongruous. The unnatural alliance was ordered by the vote of a majority of the Senate. I felt that a personal embarrassment was intended me. I felt that the design was to place in my hands a many-edged instrument, which I could not touch without being wounded. Nevertheless, I subdued all my repugnance, and I engaged assiduously in the task which had been so unkindly assigned me. This, or a similar bill, was the offspring of my deliberations. When reported, the report accompanying it was referred by the same majority of the Senate to the very Committee on the Public Lands to which I had unsuccessfully sought to have the subject originally assigned, for the avowed purpose of obtaining a counteracting report. But, in spite of all opposition, it passed the Senate at that session. At the next, both Houses of Congress.

I confess I feel anxious for the fate of this measure, less on account of any agency I have had in proposing it, as I hope and believe, than from a firm, sincere, and thorough conviction that no one measure ever presented to the councils of the nation was fraught with so much unmixed good, and could exert such powerful and enduring influence in the preservation of the Union itself, and upon some of its highest interests. If I can be instrumental, in any degree, in the adoption of it, I shall enjoy, in that retirement into which I hope shortly to enter, a heart-feeling satisfaction and a lasting consolation. I shall carry there no regrets, no complaints, no reproaches, on my own account. When I look back upon my humble origin, left an orphan too young to have been conscious of a father's smiles and caresses, with a widowed mother, surrounded by a numerous offspring, in the midst of pecuniary embarrassments, without a regular education, without fortune, without friends, without patrons, I have reason to be satisfied with my public career. I ought to be thankful for the high places and honors to which I have been called by the favor and partiality of my countrymen, and I am thankful and grateful. And I shall take with me the pleasing consciousness that, in whatever station I have been placed, I have earnestly and honestly labored to justify their confidence by a faithful, fearless, and zealous discharge of my public duties. Pardon these personal allusions. I make the motion of which notice has been given.

Leave was then granted, and the bill was introduced, read twice, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE PATRONAGE, &c.

Mr. CALHOUN, pursuant to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill to repeal the first and second sections of the act limiting the terms of service of certain officers therein named, &c.

A bill to regulate the public depositories.

Also, a joint resolution to amend the constitution, so as to provide for a distribution of the surplus revenue.

REDUCTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. CALHOUN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary of the

[SENATE.]

Treasury of the 15th instant, relative to the duties that may be reduced or repealed, be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, with instructions to report a bill providing for the reduction or repeal of all duties which, in their opinion, may be reduced or repealed consistently with a due regard to the manufacturing interest.

Mr. CALHOUN, on offering this resolution, adverted to the immense surplus which was daily accruing in the public treasury, to which we must look for an immense increase of power in the hands of the executive Government, and the overspreading of the country with corruption and subversivity. This was not a proper occasion to discuss the actual condition of the treasury; but, if it were, it would not be difficult to show that the actual surplus in the treasury was now from twenty-one to twenty-two millions; and that in the coming year it would be scarcely short of thirty millions. With this immense revenue at the disposal of the President, in banks under his control, and subject to be withdrawn at his discretion, it would be in vain, all our efforts would be impotent, to oppose the executive will. On this point, therefore, the battle would have to be fought between power and liberty. All other measures which could be devised would fall short of correcting the danger to be apprehended from the march of power. But if all those who were opposed to the usurpations of the Government could be brought zealously to unite in arresting the funds arising out of the revenue, as far as they could, in their passage to the public treasury, and would snatch from the grasp of the Executive the funds which have already accumulated in his hands, there would be still ground for the hope that the course of power would be stayed. Every dollar we can prevent from coming into the treasury, or every dollar thrown back into the hands of the people, will tend to strengthen the cause of liberty, and unnerve the arm of power. He hoped that the Committee on Manufactures would take up the report with an earnest desire to repeal and reduce all those duties that can be reduced or repealed without injury to the manufacturing interest. In doing this they will then feel that they are not only aiding in the cause of reform, as far as it can be assisted by these means, but that they are also contributing to the prosperity of that particular interest of which they are the special guardians; since every reduction of duty, and every tax removed, while it cheapens the cost of production at home, and thus benefits our own manufacturer, will open the prospect of securing the foreign market. As there will be the two interests thus concurring to favor reduction, he hoped the Committee on Manufactures would consider the subject, and report, at as early a period as possible, all the reductions which can be made without injury to the manufacturing interest.

Mr. DAVIS said he was not quite prepared to vote at once for the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina. It had come upon him suddenly, and he was not prepared to understand the exact extent of the proposition, as he had not in his mind the precise propositions of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject. Therefore, he was rather unwilling to vote for an instruction to the committee; for it would seem that this was not in the shape of an inquiry, but a peremptory instruction, touching an interest of the first magnitude, and a measure of a very important character which was adopted a few years since. He hoped the Senate would not be called on to vote an instruction of this importance before they had time to examine its character. He had only risen to express the hope that the Senator from South Carolina would not press his resolution at this moment.

Mr. CALHOUN replied that there could be no difficulty on the subject. The Committee on Manufactures would have to examine and ascertain what duties might be reduced or repealed. The Secretary of the Treasury had recommended some, and given a list of others, and it was for the committee to investigate the subject. He would not wish to touch a single article that could injure the manufacturer.

Mr. DAVIS suggested that he might probably concur in all the views of the Senator from South Carolina, if he had time to look into the report; but at present he would only ask that the resolution be permitted to lie on the table until to-morrow.

Mr. CALHOUN assented to the request, and the resolution was laid on the table.

NEWSPAPERS TO MEMBERS.

The resolution to supply the Senators with the usual newspapers was read a third time, and, on the question of its passage, Mr. KING, of Georgia, after a few remarks in opposition, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. KNIGHT, in consequence of the absence of Mr. ROBBINS, the mover, moved to lay the resolution on the table; but the motion was negatived: Ayes 15, noes 22.

The question was then taken on the passage of the resolution, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Moore, Naudain, Niles, Preston, Prentiss, Porter, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Morris, Ruggles, Shepley, White—7.

Several bills were introduced and ordered to a second reading; when,

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 30.

REDUCTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. DAVIS moved that the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] (to instruct the Committee on Manufactures to report a bill to reduce certain duties on imports,) which was yesterday laid on the table on his motion, be taken up. Mr. D. said that, having given the resolution a careful examination, he found that it was not so extensive in its bearings as he had supposed—that its object was merely financial—and that, consequently, he had no objection whatever to its passage.

Mr. CLAY said that, in the room of making it a matter of positive instruction, he would rather that it should be sent to the committee as a subject of inquiry. He did not suppose that the Senator from South Carolina and himself would finally disagree. It would be very easily discovered by any one who took the trouble of looking, that the two principal objects of duty were wine and silks—they could very well bear the collection of such duty—still, if there was no necessity for its collection, arising out of the wants of the Government, neither of these articles should bear it. He merely wished for an opportunity to examine and judge for himself; and, so long as there was a certain and abundant supply in the public exchequer, the resolution would meet with no opposition from him. It was his desire, as, in the event of the passage of the bill which he introduced yesterday, it might be necessary to retain the duties on wines and silks, to make some further examination. He would move that the usual words should be inserted, "to inquire into the expediency," &c.

Mr. CALHOUN said that was already done. The resolution directed the committee first to inquire and then to report. If, continued Mr. C., the land bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky should pass, there would still remain a large surplus in the public treasury. The amount there already was twenty-one or twenty-two millions, and by the end of the first quarter of the coming year that amount will have swelled to thirty millions. If, as the Secretary of the Treasury had stated, the expenditures can be reduced to thirteen millions, there would be ample funds in the treasury, unless the reductions of duty should go far beyond what he had imagined.

He wished to impress upon the Senate the importance of two considerations: first, that there was an immense surplus in the public exchequer, which might be employed for the degrading purposes of bribery and corruption; and, secondly, that, by a timely and liberal reduction, all conflicting interests might be reconciled before the crisis which might be expected in 1842-'3. Every cent removed from the hands of Government is so much added to the wealth of the whole people. It cheapens production, and thus, by allowing a field for competition, it opens the foreign market at a shorter period.

Mr. CLAY said that the difference between himself and the honorable Senator was very trifling. Like him, he (Mr. C.) had looked a little into the subject of our finances. He believed with him that there were twenty-one millions in the treasury, and that at the end of the first quarter of the ensuing year, with the seven millions coming from the Bank of the United States, the surplus revenue would amount to thirty millions. He perfectly concurred with him in the propriety of repealing all duties, so far as it could be done consistently with the interests of the manufacturer. But, sir, (said Mr. C.,) how many of the forty-five or forty-eight Senators here have looked into the matter as the Senator from South Carolina has done, and arrived with him at the same conclusion. They should not be called upon by a resolution, presented in either an unusual form and at an early period of the session, to vote at once, without reflection or examination, for the repeal of every duty. He did not wish so to commit himself.

Mr. CALHOUN said that if any doubt of the ability of the treasury to meet all demands upon it should arise during the progress of this bill, he would then move to lay it upon the table, or to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAY said that, with these pledges, he certainly should not oppose the motion.

The resolution was then agreed to.

JOINT LIBRARY COMMITTEE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, stating that the House had passed a joint resolution for the appointment of a Committee on the Library; and that the House had appointed Messrs. LOYAL, MCKEAN, and WADDY THOMPSON, as the committee on their part.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, the resolution was concurred in; and Messrs. PRESTON, PORTER, and ROBBINS, were chosen, by ballot, as the committee on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE PATRONAGE.

The bill to repeal the 1st and 2d second sections of an act to limit the terms of office of certain officers therein named was read a second time, and made the special order for the second Monday in January.

The bill to regulate the deposits of the public money was read a second time, and made the special order for the second Monday in January.

The joint resolution proposing to amend the constitution was read a second time, and made the special order for the third Monday in January.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

A bill supplementary to the act to amend the judicial system was taken up as in Committee of the Whole; when

Mr. LEIGH, suggesting that the gentleman who had introduced the bill [Mr. BLACK] was not in his seat, and as the bill was an important one, and it was proper that the Western Senators should have an opportunity to examine it, moved to postpone its further consideration, and make it the special order for Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

When some other business had been disposed of,

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after a short time the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 31.

HOSPITALS ON THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, on the subject of hospitals within that State for the relief of sick and disabled persons employed in navigating the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. He said that, in this memorial, the Legislature represented the strong necessity, as well as the humanity, of providing these receptacles for the sick and disabled navigators of the Western waters. The necessity for this measure (Mr. H. said) was peculiarly strong and pressing. For this class of men, it could scarcely be affirmed that there was any provision at all in existence, while the protecting arm and the fostering care of the Government had always been extended in aid of the sick and disabled seamen both of the navy and of our commercial marine. It was true that the boatmen and raftmen of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers were properly entitled to the benefits of the several acts of Congress for the relief of sick and disabled seamen engaged in foreign commerce and in the coasting trade; but so defectively supplied were the Western waters with hospitals and asylums for the sick, that these benefits had seldom been felt. In the foreign commerce and in the coasting trade, although there may be scanty provision made in hospitals on shore, yet these men are almost always afloat. The vessels in which they are employed are receptacles for them, and their shipmates are companions around them. They have generally society and comfort to some extent. But often it is not so with the boatmen of the West. The very boat in which they have descended, when at the termination of their voyage, if a flat boat, has to be abandoned, no matter where that may be, or in what condition they are. Anxiety to return home generally deprives them of all their companions. These men are constantly landed and left destitute on the banks of those rivers, often amongst a population unable, and sometimes unwilling, to take care of them; for, however humane and hospitable the people of the West are, (and there are none more so,) the frequent repetition of these acts of kindness becomes a burden insupportable.

These men so left are generally destitute of medical aid, and frequently of the most ordinary attentions and comforts of life. They go from high and healthful latitudes to southern and sickly climates. The change of their habits, as well as of climate, was generally greater than that of seamen; the trade in which they were engaged was that of transporting their own produce and that of the country to the lower markets, and this was necessarily carried on in the spring and summer seasons of the year, when they were most susceptible of the diseases which prevail on the waters of the Mississippi and the South. The people of the West engaged in this river trade were exposed to more and perhaps greater casualties than any other in the world; and there was no class whose occupation and business contributed more largely to the prosperity of the Union, and especially of the West, than this class of our citizens. Not only were they exposed to sickness and death, without the usual comforts of the last hour, but they were subjected also to an almost innumerable train of evils, exposures, and casualties; boats getting aground; running upon snags and sawyers; sinking, from these and various other causes, when the greatest danger and exposure of health for the preservation of property takes place; and if this be hopeless, there is the still greater peril of life. In addition to these, there are the casualties by steam, the bursting of boilers, the crushing of boats against each other by night, and the more terrible and appalling disasters of fire and storm. These are some of the evils and dangers to which this whole class of men are exposed, and which many of them suffer.

And how numerous is this class? And how large a population and extent of country are closely identified with their prosperity and business? This class of men are the bone and sinew of more than four millions of people. They are the farmers and farmers' sons of the whole valley of the Mississippi, engaged in the laudable and valuable business of transporting their own produce to market, and in the transportation of the entire commerce of the West. They are closely and intimately identified with a country of great extent; the whole country beyond the mountains; a country much larger than the residue of the United States; a country perhaps unequalled in resources; in the fertility of its soil; the navigation of its rivers; the internal commerce which it creates and sustains; the rapidly increasing magnitude of its population, and the maximum of which it is susceptible; unequalled in these particulars, in all probability, by any other region of the earth of the same extent. I take this occasion (said Mr. H.) to say to the Committee of Commerce, to which I wish this memorial referred, that this is an important interest of the Western country; one in the hands, and especially so, of the federal Government. I tell the committee and the Senate that its importance within the last few years has increased into a ratio far beyond the increase of the population and the commerce of the country.

The cholera, so prevalent on the Mississippi and its tributary streams, has given this subject of late years an importance and a magnitude almost indescribable. The want of these hospitals scatters the cholera, and distributes it in the neighborhoods and villages of these rivers; whereas, if erected, they would aid in concentrating and extinguishing it, by collecting its patients together, and preventing their intercourse with society. A man known to a boat's crew to have the cholera is put on shore wheresoever he can, by persuasion or stratagem, he deposited. He produces consternation wherever left, is neglected or abandoned, and dies. Thus the cholera is spread upon these rivers among the citizens on shore, and its fatality is greatly increased among the river-faring men themselves. The Committee of Commerce cannot be engaged in a work of patriotism and devotion to the best interests of the country of more importance, in a work of benevolence and humanity more broad and expansive. This subject has been greatly neglected.

He did not stand alone in these opinions. The Secretary of the Treasury had pressed this matter upon the attention of the last session of Congress. He tell us, in his report, that the laws for the relief of sick and disabled seamen should be revised; that hospitals should be built, and that the fund should be made more productive; that, instead of yielding about $30,000 a year, it ought to produce $180,000. A fair dividend of these operations of philanthropy on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers would be productive of the most beneficial results. It would produce sanitary regulations which would be the means of saving thousands of lives perhaps every year, and of checking and controlling, in some measure, the cholera—that minister of desolation—amongst us.

On this subject (continued Mr. H.) efforts had been unceasing for several years past. This was the third time it had been placed before the Senate by himself: last session by the same memorial which he now presented, and the previous session by a resolution, which, on his motion, had been adopted by the Senate. He hoped that the Legislatures and the Representatives of the Western States would not cease to importune Congress until they obtained on this subject some beneficial regulation. It had been referred to the Committee of Commerce of the Senate at the last and previous sessions. A bill was reported last winter in the other House. It was, however, insufficient in its provisions. It did not contain any appropriation for hospitals above the mouth of the Ohio. It was his intention to have proposed an amendment to it in the Senate, if not amended in the House, but it never reached this body. The practice of the Committee of Commerce for years past, in waiting for bills from the other House, had, as it seemed to him, been deleterious to much useful business; he hoped it would not be so at the present session, but that this subject would at least be taken up and acted on by the committee of the Senate. The want of money was not at this time a consideration. We had enough, and more than we knew what to do with; and there was surely no object more deserving the appropriation of a few thousand dollars than that of erecting hospitals for the relief of sick and disabled seamen and river-faring men.

He moved the reference of the memorial to the Committee of Commerce; and it was so referred.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, it was Resolved, That when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The resolutions on the table were severally considered and adopted.

Agreeably to the resolution offered on Wednesday last in relation to the Patent Office, Messrs. RUGGLES, PRENTISS, and HILL, were chosen members, on the part of the Senate, of the joint committee ordered by said resolution.

Mr. PRESTON being absent, the resolution in regard to the regulation of the Senate chamber was, on motion of Mr. TIPTON, laid on the table.

The bill concerning writs of error and judgments arising under the revenue laws was read a third time; when

Mr. WEBSTER made a few observations on the character of the measure, approving of the general tendency, but desiring some explanations which rendered him desirous, as Mr. PRESTON was absent, to have the bill laid over for the present.

The bill was then, on his motion, laid on the table until Monday.

A bill for the relief of Commodore Isaac Hull was considered as in Committee of Whole, and, after a few remarks from Messrs. SHEPLEY and SOUTHARD, was, on motion of the latter, laid on the table.

Several other bills were taken up in the course of the day, and appropriately disposed of; after which praying for a recharter, and refer it to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BENTON said he should to-morrow submit a resolution to refer the memorials of all these banks to a select committee. He wished an inquiry instituted into the affairs of these banks: the manner in which their business had been conducted, the amount of capital employed, and if necessary for the commercial wants of the District. He preferred that the memorial should lie on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. KENT expressed the hope that the gentleman would permit the memorial to take the usual course.

Mr. BENTON said that, in order that the Senate might not be taken by surprise, he would inform the Senate that he intended to-morrow to make a motion to go into an investigation of the concerns of these banks. He should move for a pretty extensive committee. He would not repeat in the Senate the charges he had heard against these banks. But if a titling of what he had heard concerning them was true, those petitioners ought to have leave to withdraw their petitions.

The petition was then referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

The bill supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States was taken up as the special order of the day.

Mr. CLAYTON said this bill had passed the Senate at the last session, by a vote of thirty-one to five. The plan adopted in the bill, he thought, was not the best possible plan that might have been adopted; and he was one of the five that had voted against it at the last session. But the subject had been before Congress a number of years, and the action upon it had been greatly procrastinated. He was, under existing circumstances, at present disposed to acquiesce in its provisions and vote for the bill. It was not necessary, as the bill had been acted on at the last session, to go into a discussion of the merits of it.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH suggested an amendment as to the day of holding the courts, so as to make the "first of May" read "the first Monday of May," &c.

Mr. CLAYTON said it had been intended by the committee that it should read as the gentleman [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] had suggested, and that its not reading so was perhaps a clerical error. Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK moved an amendment, by striking out "Natchez," and inserting "Jackson;" and made some remarks in favor of it.

Mr. CLAYTON stated he had no objection to it.

Mr. PORTER thought the increase of travelling by the judges, which would be caused by the amendment offered by the gentleman, [Mr. BLACK,] would make the performance of their duty very heavy on them.

Mr. BLACK said it was only forty-five miles from Pittsburg to Jackson, and a daily mail was now running between those places; also, that a railroad would soon be completed on that route, which he thought would meet the objection of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. PORTER.]

Mr. BUCHANAN, for one, would be willing to take the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BLACK.] But he would suggest, himself, that a good deal of commercial and maritime business accrued at Natchez; many matters of small amount were litigated there, and he thought it would be burdensome to the parties to oblige them to follow their small claims to Jackson.

Mr. BLACK's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said, of the district of Pennsylvania and other districts one circuit had been formed in the bill, as he understood it.

As the law now stood they were divided into several districts. He wished to know whether the same judge was to hold courts in the two districts in Pennsylvania. There was a clause in the bill which gave a direct appeal from the circuit to the district courts. He would like to know, also, whether Pennsylvania was included in that provision; and spoke of Mobile as an eligible point for a circuit court to be established in Alabama.

Mr. PORTER said, if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. KING] could show the Senate that the one judge could not perform the duties in his district, he (Mr. P.) would be willing to modify the bill to meet his views.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, did not wish to throw any obstacles in the way of the passage of the bill. He thought a point somewhere between the northern and southern division in his district would best accommodate the State he represented. Business would naturally go to the central point, and it would be a saving in the mileage of witnesses, &c. He would like the modification.

Mr. LEIGH said he understood there were two district courts in Alabama. His purpose was to extend the jurisdiction of the circuit courts over the whole State. He would suggest an amendment, which he thought would meet the views of the gentleman, [Mr. KING, of Alabama,] which was to strike out "southern district" and insert the "several districts." That would place Alabama in the same situation with North Carolina. He would therefore move to amend it; which was agreed to.

Mr. L. suggested another amendment, to make the bill correspond with North Carolina and Virginia; which was to make it read "the district of Maryland, the eastern district of Virginia, and the district of North Carolina."

Mr. PORTER moved to insert, after the word "Delaware," the words "eastern district of Pennsylvania;" which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON moved to make Delaware read "the district of Delaware;" which was agreed to.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, moved to strike out the word "southern," in the third section; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT felt as if he and his colleague would be very inexcusable were they to let the bill pass in its present shape. Mr. W. set forth, at some length, the particular objections to the bill, as related to New York. He would not propose an amendment now; but before the bill was ordered to be engrossed, he wished to reserve the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. PORTER said that, as this bill had progressed so far towards its final passage, he would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] the propriety of bringing in another bill embracing his object. In the Western country, they thought this bill had been much delayed. He felt anxious for the early passage of it.

Mr. CLAYTON suggested another amendment, to correspond with the amendment already made in relation to Alabama.

Some conversation between Mr. LEIGH and Mr. CLAYTON, respecting the amendment of Mr. CLAYTON, took place, when

Mr. CLAYTON said he would take occasion to state he was willing to co-operate with the gentleman from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] in a separate bill for the regulation of the western district of New York, and thought he (Mr. W.) had better let this bill pass.

Mr. WRIGHT could not comply with the request of the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON.] The bill had come up before he had anticipated it. He would, however, convince the Senate of the propriety of the amendment he would offer. He would venture to say that the judge would never pass through his circuit without passing through Albany, either going or returning. He spoke of the vast amount of business that originated in the city of New York, for the United States court. He objected to a separate bill. His constituents would complain, and ask why they were taxed with a separate bill, when a general bill had passed. The amendment he should propose would adopt the feelings of his constituents. He did not say so by way of threat, but by way of persuasion. Mr. W. then moved to insert after the word "hereafter," in the ninth line of the first section, the words "the districts of Vermont, Connecticut, and New York, shall constitute the second district."

Mr. CLAYTON observed that, as this amendment was pressed by the Senator from New York, he would not oppose it. He would, however, ask the honorable Senator if he had sufficiently considered the details of the bill, and how far the amendment would interfere with them. He should regret if the bill was retarded by the amendment. He would also ask whether the judge who is to perform the duties contemplated by the amendment would be willing to encounter the additional labor, and whether he had not already as much business as he could attend to. He was willing, however, to take the amendment as offered by the gentleman from New York, leaving it to him to make such other amendment as the details of the bill rendered necessary.

Mr. WRIGHT was aware that some additional amendment, as to the time and place of holding the court, would be necessary; and if the amendment should be adopted, he or his colleague would submit the proper motion.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, observed that, as the Senator from New York had thought proper to introduce this amendment, other Senators coming from States where there was no more than one district judge might be induced to offer a similar amendment. Why, he asked, was not this inconvenience as regards New York thought of before? He asked the Senator if it was right at this time to throw obstacles in the way of a bill so important to the new States—a bill fraught with a measure which he conceived they had a constitutional right to, which they had been so long contending for, and which they were now about to obtain? He hoped the amendment would not be pressed at this time. If, hereafter, the gentleman, on finding that the judge can perform the additional duties required, chooses to introduce the measure in the shape of a separate bill, he would most readily extend to him the helping hand. But he trusted that a bill which was to render the judiciary system uniform throughout the Union, which the new States had endeavored year after year to get through, would not be embarrassed by obstacles thrown in its way, when it was about to pass. He should vote against the amendment, though he hoped it would be withdrawn.

Mr. PORTER said he felt very much embarrassed at the situation in which he had been placed by the amendment. He was favorably disposed towards the objects it contemplated, though he feared it might somewhat embarrass the important measure before them. He did hope that the gentleman from New York would not press the amendment at this stage of the business; that he would not throw obstacles in the way of an important measure, by tacking to it objects that might be accomplished in a separate bill. This bill had been before the Senate at the last session, and if the claims of New York were so very strong, and the inconveniences under which she suffered were so great, surely they ought to have occurred to the gentleman then. He felt, however, that, in opposing the amendment, his hand was on the lion's mane. There were forty-two members from New York in the other House, and he feared that if the bill passed without the amendment, it would be greatly embarrassed there. He was confident that the gentleman did not intend this, but he feared that such would be the effect. The bill was lost the last year in consequence of the amendments that delayed it. Perhaps the Senator from Pennsylvania might be enlightened, and think that a similar amendment was necessary for his State, and, in moving it, occasion further embarrassment to the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT said that there was one remark he was compelled to make in reply to the Senator from Louisiana. He understood that gentleman as saying that he had attacked the bill by throwing obstacles in its way.

[Mr. PORTER explained. He said tacked, not attacked. He had expressed the hope that the gentleman would not throw obstacles in the way of the bill, by tacking other objects to it.]

Mr. WRIGHT said he was glad he had misunderstood the gentleman, who was himself mistaken as to the time of the introduction of the measure contemplated by the amendment. Long before any effort had been made to extend to Alabama the circuit system, an effort had been earnestly, though respectfully, made to extend it to the northern portion of New York. The gentleman did not seem to appreciate the geographical situation of New York, nor consider the great extent of its frontier requiring this system. He and his colleague had been asked not to press their amendment at this stage of the bill. But did the gentlemen from Alabama and Louisiana suppose that they could do their duty without pressing this measure? As to the details, he confessed he had not sufficiently examined them to conform his amendment to them at this time. But gentlemen must see that this was a mere matter of form, and the gentlemen from Connecticut and Vermont, and himself and colleague, could not differ with regard to them. The gentleman from Louisiana had asked him not to press this amendment, and thus bring down on the bill the numerical force of the New York members in the other House. Now, it was to make the bill acceptable to this numerical force, that he had introduced the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had been too long following the same lights on this subject to be enlightened at this time, as the Senator from Louisiana supposed he might be. He had been endeavoring for many years to extend the circuit system to the new States, and should continue his exertions until that object was accomplished. What was the single proposition before the Senate? It was to extend this system to two of the new States who were justly entitled to it, and who had so long been deprived of it. That was the sole proposition. It was so considered when the bill was introduced, and was so considered by the Judiciary Committee, who had it under examination and reported on it. It was admitted that it was desirable to extend this system to New York; but suppose it was done by the amendment, what then would be the duty of the Senators from Pennsylvania? The western district of Pennsylvania was not entirely inland. It had considerable maritime frontier, and he understood to-day, for the first time, that there was a petition, numerously signed, from the western part of Pennsylvania, for the establishment of a circuit court for their benefit. Could he and his colleague, then, sit still, and not ask this for Pennsylvania, when they saw the same favor granted to New York? He would prefer, however, that the circuit system should be extended both in Pennsylvania and New York by a separate bill; and he would advise gentlemen from New York to wait, and go pari passu with Pennsylvania in accomplishing an object so desirable to both. We want, said Mr. B., the same advantages for the western district of Pennsylvania, that they want for the northern district of New York; but we shall give no vote that will embarrass the passage of the bill.

Mr. NILES said there were two district courts in Connecticut. The business in them was merely nominal.

The court was sometimes one and sometimes two days in session. He thought the difficulty suggested of performing the tour not a formidable objection. So far as the constituents he had the honor to represent in part were concerned, he had no doubt they would be in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT.] He felt anxious for the passage of the bill. But he would ask how the bill was to be embarrassed? Certainly not by making it more acceptable to a large portion of the country. By making it more acceptable, a better feeling would exist towards it, which would be more likely to secure its passage.

Mr. CLAYTON said, on the whole, he felt disposed to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] and also for the amendment mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] if that gentleman should offer it. All he asked of gentlemen was to make the bill to-day as perfect as possible, in order that it might be passed to-morrow. The Senator from New York might, on the third reading of the bill, by general consent, offer such amendments as would render the details perfect.

After some further remarks from Messrs. DAVIS, BLACK, TALLMADGE, MOORE, SHEPLEY, PRENTISS, and KING of Alabama, the question was taken, and Mr. WRIGHT's amendment was adopted: Yeas 28, nays 12, as follows:

After some verbal amendments were agreed to, submitted by Messrs. CLAYTON and LEIGH,

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the bill was laid on the table, and

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. LEIGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject had been referred, made a report on the legacy of the late James Smithson, of London, for a university in the District of Columbia, accompanied by a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to appoint an agent or agents to take the necessary steps to secure said legacy for the purposes mentioned and specified in the will. Read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. BENTON offered the following resolution, which lies one day for consideration:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be raised, to act jointly with any committee raised for similar purposes by the House of Representatives, to whom shall be referred all the petitions now presented to the Senate for the renewal of bank charters in the District of Columbia, with authority to examine into the conduct and condition of said banks; and for that purpose to have authority to send for persons and papers, to inspect books, and to examine witnesses on oath; also, to examine into the condition of the currency in the District of Columbia, and the means of improving it, and approximating it to the currency of the constitution; also, to inquire into the necessity, if any, for banks of circulation in the District of Columbia, in contradistinction to banks of discount and deposit, and for dealing in bullion and exchange; to inquire how far banks of any kind are wanted for the uses of the federal Government in this District; and wherefore the Treasurer of the United States may not act as keeper and payer of the public moneys within the District of Columbia, and drawer of checks and drafts in favor of those who choose to receive their money elsewhere. The said committee to have leave to employ a clerk, and to report by bill or otherwise.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill in addition to the act to amend the judiciary system of the United States.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved an amendment in the second section, after the word "annually," in the twentieth line, by inserting the words "in the northern district of New York, at Albany, on the first Tuesday in June and the second Tuesday in October;" which was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved an amendment in the tenth line of the first section, to make it read "the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania." Also, in the second section, fifteenth line, by inserting the words "in the western district, in the city of Pittsburg, on the 17th day of March;" which was agreed to.

Mr. B. also introduced an amendment to prevent the bill in its operation from interfering with the holding of the courts in Utica, in the State of New York, and Williamsport, in the State of Pennsylvania; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON moved an amendment in the fourth section, after the word "Alabama," in the eighth line, by inserting the words "the northern district of New York, and western district of Pennsylvania;" which was agreed to.

After some further verbal amendments,

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Several bills were severally read the third time, and passed; when,

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and when the doors were opened,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6.

DISTRICT BANKS.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the consideration of the resolution on the District banks, offered by Mr. BENTON, was postponed till Monday next.

Several other resolutions on the table were severally considered and agreed to.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

The bill to amend the judicial system of the United States, (adding one to the number of judges of the Supreme Court, and altering the judicial districts, &c.,) was read a third time.

Mr. BLACK called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were accordingly ordered.

Mr. BENTON observed that he would not have said one word relating to this bill, if the yeas and nays had not been called; and, as they were called, he would not say more than a dozen. He should vote for this bill, because it suited the section of country from which he came, and because it was also desirable to several States that it should pass. He had, however, objections to it, which he should not then trouble the Senate with a detail of; and before he gave his vote he wished it distinctly understood that he had objections, and if ever he was called on to state them, either there or elsewhere, he was ready to do so. One word, while he was up, in reference to a remark of the chairman of the committee the other day. He (Mr. B.) also objected to seeing the judges a debating body, though he should wish to see as many judges as twelve. He meant as many as twelve on paper, for he did not believe that if the number of the bench consisted by law of so many, they would ever be all present on the bench at one time.

Mr. CLAYTON said his objections were the very opposite of the objections of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] He (Mr. C.) was opposed to increasing the number of judges to twelve. He hoped the passage of this bill would put that question for ever at rest, and that the number of judges never would exceed nine, at most.

Mr. PORTER rose briefly to remark that it was rather strange to hear a gentleman say he was about to vote for a bill, but had some objections to it. That occurred with regard to almost every bill that came before the Senate. Members had some small objections to important measures, but waived them on account of the greater good to be obtained. He should regret that the bill went to the other House under the disadvantage that there were serious objections to it. With respect to the number of judges on the bench, he should much regret to see more than twelve; for although twelve men might be stronger than six, he never could believe that they were wiser.

The question was then taken, and the bill was passed: Yeas 38, nay 1, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Niles, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—38.

REGULATIONS OF THE SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. PRESTON moved the consideration of the resolution offered by him some days ago, and which in his absence had, on motion of Mr. TITTON, been laid on the table.

The resolution reads thus:

Resolved, That the regulations in relation to the Senate chamber and galleries, adopted at the present session, be rescinded, except so much as relates to the reporters.

Mr. PRESTON said the object of the resolution was to establish things as they were before the adoption of the resolution now in force in the Senate, except as regarded the reporters, who were excepted in the resolution he had offered—seats having been provided for them, by the existing resolution, on the floor of the Senate. It was a privilege which, like others, might be abused; but inconvenience might, by proper circumspection in future, be avoided. It was very desirable to have persons in the lobby who had business, without going out during the session to speak with them. The lobby might, on extraordinary occasions, be crowded to some extent, but he thought it might be restricted on any occasion within proper bounds. He thought so grave, so dignified, and so aged a body, might safely be trusted with the privilege of keeping open doors. The supposed necessity of such a provision would induce a circumspection that would guard against the inconveniences heretofore experienced.

Mr. PORTER understood the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] to regard the rule adopted as an innovation upon the rules of the Senate. Until with in a very few years back the regulation was precisely the same as it is now. The resolution adopted for the regulation of the Senate chamber, and now in force, was the same, verbatim et literatim et punctuatim, as the one adopted by the House of Representatives. Until the adoption of the present regulation, the Senate had experienced great inconvenience. He would like the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] to point out some means of prevention against the intrusion of a crowd: Would the inducements to the collection of a crowd be any less than heretofore? Would any Senator refuse the admission of any one who would ask him? Persons were much exposed in crowds. On one occasion an honorable gentleman had had his pocket picked in a crowd in the gallery. The attraction of an audience was great. There were occasions on which gentlemen would withdraw their attention from the business before the Senate, and turn round to more attractive objects in the gallery. He was willing to afford further facilities to spectators by making some additional exceptions to the rule prohibiting them, but he was opposed to any measure calculated to disturb the public business.

Mr. PRESTON said that, under the late rule, as far as his experience went, and he believed his and the gentleman's [Mr. PORTER's] was about the same, he thought the business of the Senate had been as well conducted as at any time. The presence of an audience evidently excited them to a more faithful discharge of their duty. It was a privilege incident to all deliberative bodies, and one that ought not to be withheld. He flattered himself that he was not more susceptible of those attractions alluded to by the gentleman [Mr. PORTER] than the gentleman himself; and he was very certain they had never hindered him [Mr. PRESTON] in the discharge of his duties. He had experienced much inconvenience under the present rule. He had at times, in the press of important business, been called three or four times at the door to persons who wished to see him. The rescinding of the rule would not be attended with so much inconvenience in the Senate as in the House of Representatives, where the throng was more general. It seemed to him that the whole organization of the Senate had fallen upon a very limited number of members.

It did not seem to him that there would be any difficulty in vesting the Senate with the power to say what number of spectators should be admitted. He did not believe it would be indiscriminately exercised. He had himself refused admission to persons applying to him on certain occasions, and he believed other Senators would exercise a reasonable discretion also. The gentleman [Mr. PORTER] had alluded to the circumstance of a gentleman having his pockets picked. He trusted the pocket that was picked belonged to the honorable gentleman who had introduced the person who did it. The privilege of witnessing the proceedings of the British Parliament was not denied the public. It had been stated that the presence of an audience was apt to divert the discussion of subjects before the Senate into other channels. He was not averse to the Senate exercising a proper influence upon popular opinion, and he could see no reason why the Senate should not have the same liberty in that respect that other bodies had. They had all firmness enough to secure the Senate from the inconveniences growing out of the extension of the privilege. He would be glad to see the resolution pass, or modified so as to suit the gentleman.

Mr. PORTER wished to exclude the idea that he was opposed to the proceedings of the Senate being made public. There are professional persons here, said he, whose business it is to take an account of the proceedings of the Senate; and others, who are connected with newspaper establishments, have access to us. He would be sorry any Senator should be so unfortunate as to have his pockets picked. The gentleman who had had his pocket picked, no doubt, was deceived in the character of the person whom he had introduced.

He thought the gentleman [Mr. PAXSON] was not so old as to be impervious to the attractions of the ladies. No doubt, the animating motive was the country's good; but he would ask the gentleman if the splendid figures of speech the Senate had witnessed on certain occasions, were not stimulated in some degree by the smiles of the ladies? Some part of the gallery had been appropriated to the members of the other branch, and the adoption of this rule would tend to exclude them.

Mr. CALHOUN was disposed to put this question upon different grounds from what either of the gentlemen who had spoken upon it had. Our Government was a popular Government, and he was disposed to accommodate as much as possible the people that belonged to it. Those galleries were made for the accommodation of the public, and the public had a right to the use of them. The smaller gallery had been thrown open, but the more commodious one had been closed against aged persons and others, unless they had females under their charge. And shall we (said Mr. C.) keep that gallery (turning to the circular gallery) continually shut against the people of this Union? He had higher objects in view than some of the gentlemen who advocated the passage of the resolution. He looked to the great struggle they were going to have in that body (the Senate) with one branch of the Government; and it was plainly to be seen, by the course pursued in relation to this resolution, who were the advocates of power, and by whom secrecy was desired. In a struggle between power and the people, between power and liberty, an audience was materially necessary. In the great struggle for liberty the galleries were thrown open. The reports were thrown coldly on the world, and could not be relied on. He would suggest that a certain number of tickets should be given out, in order to prevent the gallery from being crowded to excess. He would hold that the generous-minded ladies themselves would fully accord with his views. Mr. C. concluded his remarks by demanding the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAYTON moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting "That the circular gallery of the Senate chamber be open for the admission of spectators, and that each Senator be allowed to admit any number not exceeding three into the lobby of the Senate in front of the chair."

Mr. MANGUM thought it to be very desirable that the Senate should throw open its galleries entirely, and that the restrictions should apply to the number of persons to be admitted on the floor of the Senate. He had witnessed, under the change of the rule, in his own person, decided inconvenience, yet he should be willing to agree to any modifications of the resolution the gentleman might choose to propose, provided the galleries were thrown open to spectators. Under the old rule, spectators were not permitted to come within the bar of the Senate, nor to go behind the pillars, therefore no very great inconvenience was occasioned by their admission. He, himself, though occupying a seat of the outer range, had experienced no inconvenience from the spectators. He would agree to the resolution, if the restrictions were confined to the floor of the Senate, but he would never agree that the galleries should be closed. There would be one inconvenience, however, in the restrictions, as to the floor of the Senate. We have, said he, strangers here from all parts of the Union, and we have, in our intercourse with them, to go out of the chamber, thus incurring the risk of being absent when a vote is taken; while, under the old rule, we could still have the necessary intercourse with our friends and constituents, without losing any part of the business going on. He felt that there was much force in the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, that the public eye should not be shut on the proceedings of that body. He wished for himself, and for those with whom he acted, to have a fair chance on that floor; for he believed that, if a fair chance was to be had, it would only be had on that side of the Capitol. Again, he was not willing to incur the risk of the imputation that might be cast on them, in consequence of restricting the admissions into the chamber, that the Senate did not wish to give the utmost publicity to its proceedings. As to the galleries, they should be thrown freely open to all. It was what the public had a right to expect, and he hoped the Senator from Delaware would modify his resolution so as to meet their just expectation.

Mr. CLAYTON was perfectly willing to take the suggestions of the gentleman from North Carolina. His only object was to admit as many as possible in the circular gallery, without excluding the ladies. He thought the restrictions as to the floor of the Senate should still be continued.

Mr. PRESTON regretted that his friend from Delaware should persist in giving the same effect to his amendment. He was inclined to think that the inconveniences under the old rule had been much exaggerated. No deliberative body had ever conducted its business in a more orderly manner than the Senate, and in none had there been less interruption to the proceedings. As for accidents such as had been alluded to by the Senator from Louisiana, they were unavoidable, and might occur any where; for he had heard that a gentleman had been robbed at a private party in Washington. But he put it to gentlemen, if the business of the Senate had not always been conducted in the most orderly manner, and whether they would continue these restrictions on account of the slight inconveniences that had attended the operations of the old rule. On what occasions, he asked, had such great crowds been collected there? Why, on occasions of great excitement, when subjects of deep and absorbing interest were debated, and he was very willing on such occasions to submit to slight inconvenience, rather than exclude any who could by possibility be admitted. He had witnessed, for many years past, the occasional throngs which debates of great interest and importance had collected there, and, although almost suffocated by the crowds, yet there had been no interruption to their proceedings. If any were excluded, he did not hesitate to say that it should be the ladies rather than those who came from different parts of the Union, to hear and report what passed in that body. He was not disposed to give to the ladies more than their sex deserved; it was not desirable that they should be there at all. It was man, thinking man, for whom they acted, who should superintend their proceedings. He again repeated the belief that the inconveniences under the old rule had been greatly exaggerated—he had never seen the business in any manner interrupted. He laid down this general proposition, that it was the bounden duty of that body to give to the public, to the utmost extent, the proper accommodation. He objected to the limitation proposed by the Senator from Delaware. They had already closed more than half of their house to spectators; the small gallery was daily crowded almost to suffocation, while the circular gallery seldom contained more than a dozen ladies. He believed that no serious inconvenience had resulted from the old rule, and he hoped that his resolution would be permitted to pass without limitation.

Mr. CALHOUN said he should vote for the resolution of his colleague, with the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, because he wished to take the question as to opening the galleries. If, hereafter, it should be found that the lobby could contain more than the amendment proposed to admit, without inconvenience, it might be further opened; but he was of opinion that the galleries ought to be opened. It was the nature of power to shut its doors, and hide its proceedings from the public eye; but those who resisted power had an interest in giving to their efforts the utmost publicity. He wished the whole people of the United States to have an opportunity of witnessing what passed in that chamber. As he desired to have the question essentially on the opening of the galleries, he should vote for the amendment.

JAN. 6, 1836.]

Regulations of the Senate Chamber.

[SENATE.]

Mr. BENTON had but one word to say, and that was drawn from him by what he had heard of the hardship of those who were almost suffocated in the crowds attending the little gallery, while so few occupied the large one. Whoever encountered that hardship, he would undertake to say, had brought it on himself, because he could easily be relieved of it, by taking a lady under his arm, and going into the other gallery; and if he had such an antipathy to the ladies as to prefer the crowds of the little gallery to their society, he (Mr. B.) had no sympathy for him. The circular gallery was freely open to all, under the rule as it then stood. Every gentleman could go there if he pleased; and if he did not know how, he (Mr. B.) would tell him. He had simply to get a young lady, or an old one, or any lady he pleased, to go with him, and he would find the doors open.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] and if the amendment of that gentleman did not succeed, he would then offer an amendment to admit a certain number in the circular gallery. He was willing to give to each Senator the privilege of admitting a certain number of persons in that gallery. He had no objection to affording every facility to spectators; but owing to the inconvenience mentioned by some of the gentlemen, growing out of an unlimited privilege, he would prefer extending the convenience to the circular gallery.

Mr. SHEPLEY suggested to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] to submit his views in the form of an amendment to the amendment. The resolution, thus amended, would accomplish the object the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had in view.

Mr. TALLMADGE then submitted the following amendment to the amendment:

"That each Senator have the privilege of admitting into the circular gallery — number of gentlemen."

Mr. WEBSTER said the public had a right themselves to the use of the galleries until they were filled. He was opposed to granting tickets, and was for opening the galleries to all, without distinction of persons. It was preferable that fathers and brothers should meet and sit together in the same gallery, to having them forced into separate galleries, merely because some of them happened not to have ladies in their charge.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New York did not answer his purpose at all. He did not wish to be troubled with applications for admission there, nor did he wish to put the people to the trouble of asking for admission. They had a right to be there, to come there, and stay there, whenever the Senate was in session. It was impossible to look at that debate without seeing the nature of it, and from what quarter the opposition to the resolution came. Those who had got power were not willing that the truth should be heard boldly and openly. We, said he, who are on the opposite side, and who oppose power, ought to desire to give the utmost publicity to our proceedings. No, sir, said he, no modification of the amendment will answer my purpose; nothing which will exclude a single individual, will ever meet my consent.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had not expected this debate could possibly assume the character which it had now taken. The change of the rules of the Senate, in regard to the use of the lobby and galleries, had been made by common consent. It was not the work of any political party in this body. The change was made, as he had supposed, for the accommodation of all parties in the Senate, as well as for that of the people.

Under these circumstances, he could not but feel surprised when the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] very broadly insinuated that there was a struggle in this body between two parties—the one the advocates of liberty, the other of power, and that the advocates of power desired secrecy.

[Mr. CALHOUN here said that he had affirmed it.]

The Senator, then, has affirmed it. Sir, said Mr. B., if the gentleman intends to assert that the friends of the administration on this floor desire to envelop the proceedings of this body in mystery and darkness, the assertion is wholly unfounded. In saying so, I mean no personal offence. We are not the advocates of power against liberty, and our conduct has never shown that we were. It is easy for the Senator to make general charges of this kind, but he will find it very difficult to place his hand upon any single fact to support them.

Mr. B. said he was neither ashamed nor afraid to speak, and to vote, and to act, openly, and fearlessly, and directly, upon every question which may come before the Senate. He did not shun, but courted, publicity. Neither his political friends nor himself had any thing to conceal. He had never been consulted in respect to the existing rule. He should now vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] He was willing that the upper gallery should be thrown open to all visitors who might think proper to attend. Although our convenience might be sacrificed by again crowding the lobby behind the seats of the members, he could endure this inconvenience as well as any other Senator. On this subject he would go as far as he who should go farthest. Let all the American people who can be accommodated be received into this chamber.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that he was much gratified at what had been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and hoped that every gentleman on the same side would concur with him. It was not for him or that gentleman to decide which of them were on the side of liberty in the contest between liberty and power—that must be left to time and to posterity for a fair decision. He was not called on then to show the many arbitrary acts of the present administration; but, on a proper occasion, he would be ready to go into the subject. He did hope that this session would show that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and those with whom he acted, were not the advocates of power. He did hope that when that great measure, the expunging resolutions, came up, it would be seen that those gentlemen will be found on the side of liberty in its contest with power.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Senator from South Carolina had acted very wisely in referring the great questions now before this body and the country to time and to posterity. If he had submitted them to the people of the present generation, they are already decided against him.

In relation to his future course, Mr. B. said he would wait for the proper occasions to present themselves, and should express his opinions on subjects as they came before the Senate. "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." He had no hesitation, however, in now declaring his opinion upon the expunging resolution, as the Senator had introduced it into this debate. On that question he should be found in direct opposition to the gentleman.

YEAS—Messrs. Prentiss, Shepley, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Niles, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wall, Webster, White—34.

The question then being on Mr. CLAYTON'S amendment,

Mr. NILES moved to divide it so as to take the question first on the first clause, as to opening the galleries.

Mr. BENTON suggested that this division was not sufficiently explicit. To say "open the galleries," implied that they were closed; whereas one was already entirely open, and the other open to gentlemen accompanied by ladies. The division ought to be more explicit, otherwise those who voted against the first clause might seem to vote against admitting spectators.

Mr. NILES then moved to amend the resolution by inserting the word "circular," so as to apply the amendment to the opening of the circular gallery; which modification being accepted by Mr. CLAYTON, the division of the question was ordered, and it was accordingly taken on the first clause of the amendment, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 35, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wall, Webster, White—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Hendricks, Porter, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—7.

The question was next taken on the second clause of the amendment, allowing each Senator to admit number of spectators into the lobby, and decided in the negative: Yeas 18, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, Goldsborough, Leigh, Mangum, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wall, Webster—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Niles, Porter, Prentiss, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright—24.

The question being on the resolution, as amended, Mr. BENTON asked the Secretary to read the resolution of the present session, by which the old rule was changed, and it was accordingly read.

Mr. BENTON remarked that he only wished to make sure of the words of the resolution, as it applied to the circular gallery, and he now held that gallery to be open, and that all that had been said in relation to it had been misapplied. He did not wish to give a vote which was to be understood, there or elsewhere, as intending to shut up either of the galleries; nor did he wish to give any vote admitting, what every body knew to be untrue, that the galleries were closed. He wished in the most emphatic manner to declare that the circular gallery, instead of being closed, was open to every gentleman who could get a lady to accompany him; and by lady he meant each respectable female in the United States. It might be that some few strangers here would not be sufficiently acquainted in Washington to get ladies to accompany them; those few, he thought, could always be accommodated in the small gallery; but the great mass could easily find female acquaintances, and if they did not take the trouble to wait on a lady, they might encounter the inconvenience (if any) of the smaller gallery. The point, however, he wished to bring out, was, that his friend from Louisiana, [Mr. PORTER,] who had introduced the resolution now in force, who had been put forward by the general understanding of the inconveniences of the old rule, and who had since been abandoned by so many, never contemplated by his resolution to shut the galleries against the public. He wished to give that gentleman his support, by assisting him in bearing the brunt in defence of a resolution which was introduced and adopted by general consent of the Senate.

There was one gallery [pointing to the small one] open to every body, and there was the other [pointing to the circular gallery] equally open to all, save those whose limited acquaintance with females prevented them from being accompanied by a lady. Certain he was that there were more who could get ladies willing to accompany them, by hundreds upon hundreds, than the gallery would hold. Were they, then, under these circumstances, to vote so as to admit the fact that the galleries were closed. Were they on an occasion like that to call for testimony. If they did, the doorkeeper would tell them that once already this session hundreds had to go away from that very gallery, because it was already crowded almost to suffocation. He had made these few observations, because he wished to avoid, if possible, the imputation that this gallery had been shut up by the resolution of his friend from Louisiana, [Mr. PORTER,] and he should go with that gentleman in support of the rule as it stood.

Mr. CLAYTON did not consider the adoption of the resolution, or the amendment he had offered, as any attempt at censuring the committee by whom the resolution now in force was proposed for adoption. He had adopted the rule as a matter of experiment, but it had failed. He had observed the gallery into which gentlemen were admitted crowded, while the circular gallery had been occasionally vacant. True, the circular gallery was not directly, but it was virtually, shut against any gentleman, who had come even five hundred miles, who had not a lady under his charge.

The question was then taken on the resolution as amended, and it was adopted: Yeas 31, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, Goldsborough, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Shepley, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wall, Webster, White—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Linn, Porter, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—11.

The resolution was thereupon adopted in the following form:

"Resolved, That the circular gallery of the Senate be opened for the admission of spectators."

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS,
The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MORRIS presented two petitions from Ohio, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALHOUN demanded that the petitions should be read.

The Secretary having read the petitions,

Mr. CALHOUN demanded the question on receiving them; which was a preliminary question, which any member had a right to make. He demanded it on behalf of the State which he represented; he demanded it, because the petitions were in themselves a foul slander on nearly one half of the States of the Union; he demanded it, because the question involved was one over which neither this nor the House had any power whatever; and that a stop might be put to that agitation which prevailed in so large a section of the country, and which, unless checked, would endanger the existence of the Union. That the petitions just read contained a gross, false, and malicious slander, on eleven States represented on this floor, there was no man who in his heart could deny. This was, in itself, not only good, but the highest cause why these petitions should not be received. Had it not been the practice of the Senate to reject petitions which reflected on any individual member of their body; and should they who were the representatives of sovereign States permit petitions to be brought there, wilfully, maliciously, almost wickedly, slandering so many sovereign States of this Union? Were the States to be less protected than individual members on that floor? He demanded the question on receiving the petitions, because they asked for what was a violation of the constitution. The question of emancipation exclusively belonged to the several States. Congress had no jurisdiction on the subject, no more in this District than the State of South Carolina: it was a question for the individual State to determine, and not to be touched by Congress. He himself well understood, and the people of his State should understand, that this was an emancipation movement. Those who have moved in it regard this District as the weak point through which the first movement should be made upon the States. We (said Mr. C.) of the South are bound to resist it. We will meet this question as firmly as if it were the direct question of emancipation in the States. It is a movement which ought to, which must be, arrested, in limine, or the guards of the constitution will give way and be destroyed. He demanded the question on receiving the petitions, because of the agitation which would result from discussing the subject. The danger to be apprehended was from the agitation of the question on that floor. He did not fear those incendiary publications which were circulated abroad, and which could easily be counteracted. But he dreaded the agitation which would rise out of the discussion in Congress on the subject. Every man knew that there existed a body of men in the Northern States who were ready to second any insurrectionary movement of the blacks; and that these men would be on the alert to turn these discussions to their advantage. He dreaded the discussion in another sense. It would have a tendency to break asunder this Union. What effect could be brought about by the interference of these petitioners? Could they expect to produce a change of mind in the Southern people? No; the effect would be directly the opposite. The more they were assailed on this point, the more closely would they cling to their institutions. And what would be the effect on the rising generation, but to inspire it with odium against those whose mistaken views and misdirected zeal menaced the peace and security of the Southern States. The effect must be to bring our institutions into odium. As a lover of the Union, he dreaded this discussion; and asked for some decided measure to arrest the course of the evil. There must, there shall be some decided step, or the Southern people never will submit. And how are we to treat the subject? By receiving these petitions one after another, and thus tampering, trifling, sporting with the feelings of the South? No, no, no! The abolitionists well understand the effect of such a course of proceeding. It will give importance to their movements, and accelerate the ends they propose. Nothing can, nothing will, stop these petitions but a prompt and stern rejection of them. We must turn them away from our doors, regardless of what may be done or said. If the issue must be, let it come, and let us meet it, as, I hope, we shall be prepared to do.

Mr. HILL moved to lay the question on the table.

Mr. MORRIS asked leave to present other petitions which he had received on the same subject, that they might be all disposed of together.

Mr. PORTER. One at a time.

The CHAIR decided that the petitions under consideration must be first disposed of.

Mr. MORRIS. In presenting these petitions he would say, on the part of the State of Ohio, that she went to the entire extent of the opinions of the Senator from South Carolina on one point. We deny, said he, the power of Congress to legislate concerning local institutions, or to meddle in any way with slavery in any of the States; but we have always entertained the opinion that Congress has primary and exclusive legislation over this District; under this impression, these petitioners have come to the Senate to present their petitions. The doctrine that Congress have no power over the subject of slavery in this District is to me a new one; and it is one that will not meet with credence in the State in which I reside. I believe these petitioners have the right to present themselves here, placing their feet on the constitution of their country, when they come to ask of Congress to exercise those powers which they can legitimately exercise. I believe they have a right to be heard in their petitions, and that Congress may afterwards dispose of these petitions as in their wisdom they may think proper. Under these impressions, these petitioners come to be heard, and they have a right to be heard. Is not the right of petition a fundamental right? I believe it is a sacred and fundamental right, belonging to the people, to petition Congress for the redress of their grievances. While this right is secured by the constitution, it is incompetent to any legislative body to prescribe how the right is to be exercised, or when, or on what subject; or else this right becomes a mere mockery. If you are to tell the people that they are only to petition on this or that subject, or in this or that manner, the right of petition is but a mockery. It is true we have a right to say that no petition which is couched in disrespectful language shall be received; but I presume there is a sufficient check provided against this in the responsibility under which every Senator presents a petition. Any petition conveyed in such language would always meet with his decided disapprobation. But if we deny the right of the people to petition in this instance, I would ask how far they have the right. While they believe they possess the right, no denial of it by Congress will prevent them from exercising it.

Mr. MORRIS concluded by asking that the question be taken by yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HILL moved to lay the whole subject on the table, but afterwards remarked that, as he understood this might be considered as a rejection of the petition, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. PORTER, of Louisiana, said he could scarcely agree with any thing that had fallen from the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] save that the petitioners came here with their feet on the constitution. Certainly nothing could more forcibly convey an idea of their position. They did come here with their feet on the constitution. But if, instead of placing themselves in that attitude, they had that instrument in their eye, and the great principles on which it was established in their hearts, they would not to-day be found throwing firebrands on this floor. The constitution was established, not merely in spirit, but in letter, in reference to this great interest of the South. The right to the property which the petitioners sought to impair was solemnly recognised by that instrument; and it was a violation of the compact to seek, either directly or indirectly, to shake the security which the slaveholding States had a right to look for under it. It was melancholy, Mr. P. said, to reflect how soon the wisdom and enlightened policy of the framers of the constitution were forgotten. Fanaticism and ignorance were about to take the place of the knowledge and deep-searching views of human prosperity which enlightened and directed the measures of the fathers of their country; and no one could look at the prospect before him without dismay, if these sinister influences were not removed. It was in vain, Mr. P. said, to disguise the fact; the public mind was becoming morbidly excited in one quarter of the Union on this subject, and most painfully in another. Things have come to such a pass that it behooved all good and patriotic men to consult together, and devise some mode by which an end could be put to the dangerous agitation of this question.

Abolition of Slavery.

There were, said Mr. P., some who thought this object could be best attained by consigning all applications of this kind to a committee, where they were permitted to sleep, and were soon forgotten. Such, he believed, had been the general, though not the uniform course, and he would willingly suffer these petitions to take the same direction, if experience had shown him that any good resulted from it. But what, said Mr. P., is the fact? Why, that the boldness and illiberality of those who claim the right to interfere with other men's property was increasing by the forbearance which had been exhibited towards them. Year after year has the national Legislature, by its votes, told them how unwise it was to agitate this subject. They continue still to agitate it; and each year they increase in audacity. This winter we have seen the protest; yes, Mr. President, the protest of the anti-slavery society against that portion of the President's message which touches on the attempts made to emancipate the slaves at the South! and this protest has been forwarded here by Senators, as a public document from a public body, of which it is important we should have a knowledge. In this precious document they speak of the purity of their motives, their exemplary lives, and their increasing numbers, and deny to the Chief Magistrate of the Union the right to speak of their incendiary character, unless he gives them, in the first instance, what they call a fair trial! It was clear, therefore, that nothing had been obtained by dealing gently with these people. If any other evidence was wanted of this truth, it would be found in the petition now offered, in which one half of the free citizens of this country are denounced as tyrants, oppressors, and murderers.

Sir, said Mr. P., it is evident, from the tone lately assumed by these people, that they are laboring under the impression that we are afraid to meet this question. They have worked themselves up to the belief that the South is ashamed of its position, and that it seeks to stifle or evade what it dares not defend. It is more than time, said Mr. P., that they should be undeceived. They must be taught at once that, on this subject, we are determined, and will neither take nor give quarter.

He did not, Mr. P. said, know whether any declaration which Congress could make would stop the wicked men who prompted these movements, but he thought it would have a great effect on the honest but misguided persons who were their dupes and their instruments. A clear, decided expression of the determination on this subject of the national Legislature, he could not help thinking, would have a most beneficial influence. The continued efforts of these persons were nourished by the hope of success. Take that away, and we should hear no more from them. We have lately had a striking example of the influence of such a step on the part of the legislative authority in another country. I allude, said Mr. P., to what has lately occurred in England in regard to an agitation got up there and in Ireland for a repeal of the union between the two islands. It began to take possession of the public mind, and was rapidly spreading, when Parliament at once put an end to it by a solemn declaration, nearly unanimously made, that, under no circumstances whatever, would they consent to the measure. From that day, sir, nothing more has been heard of it; and the great mover of the agitation has given his turbulent passions another direction. What I wish, said Mr. P., is a similar declaration of determined purpose from the American Congress on this question. I do not know any mode in which it can be more significantly expressed than by a decision that no petitions on this matter will be taken into consideration.

But, sir, said Mr. P., we are met by an objection from the honorable Senator from Ohio, that we are infringing on the sacred right of petition. No one, sir, values that right more highly than I do, nor would guard it more scrupulously. I hold that the people have a right to petition and to remonstrate on any subject they please. But just as that right is unlimited, and should be free as air, so do I hold the right of those to whom memorials are addressed to sustain or reject them, and that they have perfect freedom to mark their disapprobation of their purpose or tendency. This disapprobation, I hold, sir, may be conveyed by a refusal to consider the petition at all, as well as by a denial of the prayer of it after it is considered. Why go through the mockery of examining that which we have examined fifty times already, and on which we have so often come to a conclusion? I call on any honorable Senator to show the difference between rejecting a petition at once, or refusing its prayer after deliberation—to show me how the first mode of disposing of the demand any more affects or impairs the right of petition than the last. No, sir, said Mr. P., there is no difference. It is only a question of terms, and more or less perfect conviction on the subject.

But it is said, though you may reject at once, you must receive. Sir, said Mr. P., I consider the difference merely verbal. It is a dispute about terms, and wholly overlooks the substance. We must receive it, if it can be called a reception, to learn from it to what subject it relates. But if he who presents it does (as I understand, by the rules of this body, he must do) state what is its object, I hold, sir, that the right exists in the Senate to refuse its consideration. It is only another mode in which our refusal of the prayer of the petition, and our strong disapprobation of its purport, are more distinctly marked.

And, sir, I shall vote against the reception of this petition, because I am anxious to mark my abhorrence of its purposes, and my irrevocable determination to meet those persons, here and elsewhere, with the most uncompromising opposition. There are subjects, sir, (said Mr. P.,) which we cannot stop to consider at all. If I were to go before the Legislature of any of the free States, and ask of them to dispossess the owners of land within their limits of their inheritance, or acquisition by purchase, because, according to my opinions, all laws which secure exclusive right to property were a violation of the intentions of Providence, who created all things for the use of all men, that the soil they tread should be as free for common use as the air they breathe, would that petition, sir, receive consideration any where? Would any public body consent to receive it for consideration? Would it not be considered the ravings of a maniac, or something worse? Sir, (said Mr. P.,) these are propositions so revolting that we cannot approach them for the purposes of investigation, and such, I consider, are those contained in the petition.

There is another objection to receiving this petition. Sir, the language is most indecorous and insulting to a large portion of the members of this body. It does not, indeed, in direct terms, accuse them of being robbers and tyrants, but, by a strong implication, it does make that accusation. For if slavery includes all the crimes which the petition enumerates, these slaveholders must be criminals. I am clear, (said Mr. P.,) that no men in this country have a right to come here, and, in the form of petition, accuse this body or any of its members of offences against the laws of God or the laws of man. It is not quite two years, sir, since the Senate refused to receive a petition which accused a majority of it of violating the constitution. If (said Mr. P.) I could consent to waive this indignity, so far as I was personally concerned, the duty I owe to the people whom I have the honor to represent warns me of the course I ought to pursue. I never will be so false to the allegiance I bear to them as to consent to receive any petition which, speaking of the institutions that prevail among them as tyrannical, cruel, and murderous, necessarily charges them with being tyrants and murderers. The accusation, sir, (said Mr. P.,) is as false as it is calumnious. They are neither tyrants nor murderers. They found relations existing in their country, either at the time of their birth or of their emigration to it, which they in no way contributed to establish, and for which they are not responsible. They feel that they cannot abolish them without utter ruin to themselves. So circumstanced, they have comforted themselves in a manner which gives them no cause to blush. I wish, sir, (said Mr. P.,) that those who denounce them would visit their country before they poured out these effusions of ignorance and malignity. They would find these men imbued with as lofty and disinterested patriotism as the world can exhibit, and the love of the union of these States so entwined with every fibre of their heart as to constitute, as it were, a part of their being. They would see women as pure and as gentle as the earth holds or the sun looks at; and they would behold homes and hearths consecrated by the practice of every domestic and Christian virtue. Instead of oppression and tyranny displayed to slaves, they would see kindness practised to those whom Providence has placed under the care of the inhabitants of this region; and they would receive readily at the hands of these very men, if they were in want or suffering, a full measure of that charity which they now so cruelly refuse to extend to them.

Such a people should not, and with God's blessing they shall not, with impunity, be made the objects of vituperation. Year after year have they quietly heard themselves, their wives, and daughters, denounced by miserable wretches who are animated only by a sickly love of notoriety, and who hate the virtues which they cannot practice. Aware of the danger which hangs over our glorious Union by agitating this subject, they have practised forbearance until it has ceased to be a virtue. But I warn our estimable brethren in the non-slaveholding States that another feeling than that of patient endurance is rising rapidly among the people of the South, and that, unless provocation ceases, no man can contemplate without dismay the point to which that feeling rapidly tends.

Men who think justly, but who have never permitted themselves to enter into our condition, tell us we should treat this matter calmly. But it is not, sir, (said Mr. P.,) in human nature to treat such a matter calmly. How, I ask, would any of our friends feel if associations were formed among them to disturb their quiet, to rob them of their property, to wrap their dwellings in flames, and to deliver their untainted wives and daughters to the lust of brutal slaves? I venture to say, sir, they would feel quite as strongly as we do; and I also venture to assert that their indignation would not be the least diminished on being told that no such enormities were contemplated by their assailants. Whatever they might think of their motives, they would look to the tendency of the means employed against them.

There was another reason (Mr. P. said) why he would not receive the petition. It was a wanton attack on the right of property of the slaveholders of this District. It surely (said Mr. P.) can require no time or deliberation to enable us to decide whether A has a right to take what belongs to B, because A does not wish B should hold such property.

Mr. P. said he had insensibly, and contrary to his intention, been drawn somewhat from the argument which strictly belonged to the question. The subject was pregnant with observation, which at this moment he refrained from making. He firmly asserted, because he honestly believed, that so far the domestic institutions of the South had worked no injury either to the white man or the black; and, if the occasion was a proper one, he thought he could demonstrate that he was not in error. He thought, too, he knew the motives of the abolitionists, and he believed he saw the plan by which they hoped to accomplish their objects. They had taken for their model men in another hemisphere, and they imagined that the same success, by the use of the same means, awaited their efforts, which had followed those of the persons they imitated. He could, however, inform them that, in this case, they counted without their host. They had left out of their calculation an important element, which was, that in this country they had to convince not others of the impropriety of slavery, but the slaveholders themselves. I have no doubt (said Mr. P.) but they can find many and ready converts in those who look at the institution from a distance, and have no interest in the question save that which may be derived from the wish to carry out their abstract opinions. But they never did, they never will, convince any man who lives amidst these institutions, who sees their practical operation, and whose rights, social and political, are involved in their existence. They might, if their heated zeal gave the smallest chance for any exercise of their judgment, learn, from what took place in other countries, how vain and futile all their efforts must be. For twenty-five years this subject was the matter of debate in Great Britain. Year after year the halls of its Legislature rung with the sounds of eloquence which has never been surpassed. Constant appeals were made through the press during the same time, and the preachers in the pulpit aided to extend and enforce the delusion. What was the consequence? The end of a quarter of a century's discussion left the slaveholder in the West Indies just where it found him—left him totally unconvinced either of the justice or the practicability of the measure. And if the decision of the question had been left to him, he would have so remained to the end of time. I think the agitators here should take warning by this example. They can never accomplish their object. He knows little of human nature who expects it. They may (said Mr. P.) excite partial insurrections, render the condition of the slave worse, alienate the affections of their Southern brethren, and endanger our Union. But all, and ten times more, will only tend to perpetuate that condition of society which they seek to change.

Mr. PRESTON. I must confess that I am somewhat surprised at the introduction of petitions of this character, after the occurrences of the last summer, which must naturally have made the Southern people extremely sensitive on this subject. I am aware that similar petitions have been presented, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia; and, as was stated by the chairman of that committee two years ago, without the chance of provoking any action of that committee. To use his language, "the committee-room was to them the lion's den, from which there were no foot-prints to mark their return."

Abolition of Slavery.

But, sir, this course is not the proper one to pursue now. There is in it neither justice nor expediency. We have a right to demand that some other remedy should be applied, and we do demand it. When I consider the extraordinary excitement which has been produced throughout the country; the combustible material, in the shape of incendiary pamphlets, which has been accumulated and spread abroad; the vast multitudes which have assembled; the apostles who have addressed them; their acts and their menaces; though I am but little disposed to allude to them, yet a regard to the honor and interests of the South calls upon me to do so, and that, too, in language which she has a right to expect and demand.

Sir, the Southern mind has been already filled with agitation and alarm. Their property, their domestic relations, their altars, their lives, are in danger; and, as if this were not sufficient, we have now these agitators and incendiaries calling upon Congress to act upon the slaveholding States, either directly or indirectly, through the medium of this District. And are we, sir, to sit still and see it? Are we to behold our rights and privileges trampled upon? All upon which the permanence and security of our prosperity depends assailed by these blood-thirsty fanatics, and Government called upon to participate in the wanton and malicious movement, without lifting a hand, without raising a voice, without acting as a due regard to the honor, dignity, and happiness, of our constituents calls upon us to act?

Sir, I, for one, do not fear the action of Government. There exists no right, either in law, in the constitution, or in morals, for such action; and if there did, thank God, the physical power is still wanting. We are prepared for resistance; and we shall resist with all the means that God and nature has placed at our disposal. Our determination is firm and steadfast, and ought not to be concealed or misunderstood. Let me, therefore, implore and conjure the Senate to manifest at once, and without delay, their friendship and fidelity to the constitution and the union of the States. Let me conjure and implore them to look at the blessings which these corrupt and unprincipled men are laboring to destroy. Let me beseech them to weigh well the consequences which will follow the success of their mad and misguided efforts—insurrection and rebellion. A servile, not a civil war. A war upon women and children. A war that spares no sex, respects no age, pities no suffering; that consigns our hearths and altars to flame and blood, and fills our fields and woods with a foe at once savage, bloody, and remorseless.

There is another important truth which we would urge upon your consideration. We demand peace and repose. We require you to say, in language express and distinct, that this Government neither will nor can interfere with the constitutional rights of the slaveholder. We ask you to raise a barrier between us and these hot-headed and cold-hearted men, women, and children. We may well calculate, indeed, sir, I am confident, that the virtue and patriotism of the Senate will lead them to do both the one and the other. In a country free as this, thank God, the fanatical cant, the Quixotic feeling, the cheap charity, the unexpensive humanity, of these miserable fanatics, can perhaps be neither allayed nor interfered with by Congress.

But, sir, on the great question here at issue, Congress can interpose decidedly, distinctly, and at once. She can stay the desperate efforts of these stirrers up of bloodshed and murder. She can interpose the shield, not merely of reason and argument, but of the constitution and the law. She can send back the Representatives of the South and West, to say to their constituents that she will in no manner countenance or encourage this mistaken philanthropy; that she will be no agent of this paltry Quixotism; that she will not be instrumental to a result which cannot be contemplated by the most callous without emotions at once painful and overwhelming.

Sir, I fear that unless this be done—unless the plans and operations of the abolitionists are thus put down—unless Government stands as an impassable barrier between us and them—unless some prompt and immediate action is had—I fear, I say, sir, that no adequate conception can be formed of the tremendous consequences which will follow. I wish not to menace or threaten. I speak from the deepest, fullest, firmest conviction. We exist under a necessity which cannot be touched or tampered with. Our property and lives may be in jeopardy. Let but the crisis come, and no feeling of the heart, no ratiocination of the head, can hold the Union together for a single moment. Why not then, sir, act in this exigency as we ask you to act? Why not silence in this hall, at once and for ever, these enemies of our peace? Why not, as friends of liberty and union, drive from your doors whatever is likely to jeopard either, and enable us to approach the necessary business of the country—the conscientious discharge of our duty—with minds and hearts untrammelled and undisturbed.

Sir, we are obliged to act in this matter; we have been compelled to do so by an imperious sense of duty. We abhor the idea of mixing it up with party—of making it part and parcel of any political intrigue—of gathering about it measures or modes of policy to which it stands in no relation. Our sole object is to protect our lives and property; to allay this exacerbated and enkindled feeling; to put down this spirit of fanaticism, this domineering insolence, which may prove destructive to our happiness and prosperity. It is of the first importance to crush and extinguish the efforts of these individuals at once. They are not only dangerous in themselves, but it may be in their power to mislead the majority of a people who have no direct interest in the matter at issue. The question will then become political, and the country be revolutionized at once. To prevent it, you must secure us from agitation here—here, if not elsewhere. This, at least, must be neutral ground.

Sir, we ask for such legislation upon this petition as will close the doors, once and for all, upon others of similar import; we ask to be relieved from the consternation in which we and our constituents are thrown; we ask that the motion of my honorable friend and colleague may prevail, and that whatever language these petitioners, these calumniators, and disorganizers, may hold elsewhere, they shall not be permitted to hold it here. The gentleman from Ohio acts under a misconception; he is not warranted, by any precedent, in supposing that the question, whether this petition shall or shall not be received, cannot be put. Sir, that is the preliminary question, and, if carried in the affirmative, there is an end of the matter. The right of petitioning is not at all prejudiced by such a course; nor has it been so considered by any previous Congress; for I have a case before me in which a petition from York county, Pennsylvania, was rejected, the vote on receiving it being yeas 20, nays 24.

No, sir, this motion is a far milder one than the people of the South have a right to demand; they have the right to ask an express renunciation on the part of Congress of any shadow of power to interfere between the planter and his slaves. The constitution justifies them in such a demand; and yet they only require you to say that you will not, and cannot, entertain these petitions. Has Congress prohibited itself from doing so? Not at all, sir. Does it, in so doing, abridge the right to assemble peaceably and petition for redress of grievances? Nothing of the kind. What petitions is it bound to receive? Not surely those which are violent, disrespectful, and insolent in language, which would visit with a moral contagion the whole body politic; which degrades the character of our mothers and sisters; which impugns the honor and outrages the feelings of the South and West! Grievances! For what grievances do these petitioners seek redress? Does slavery in this District interfere with them? Have they any local or general interest in the matter? Or are you to elect this Government into an ethical college? If so, sir, I plead to the jurisdiction. It is not a tribunal before which we can be brought. Has the constitution guaranteed to these people, having neither a general nor local interest in the matter, the right to come here and require me to weaken and abolish the very institution which I represent? Am I, acting for three fifths of the slave population of South Carolina, to impugn the very principle upon which I hold my seat? Shall I, sir, bound by ties that will cleave to me through life, to protect and defend the character of my constituents, submit to this insolent dictation, and lend a helping hand to cover that character with insult and opprobrium? Let me suppose a case. Suppose that you were called upon to establish a general national religion, would you consider the proposition for one moment? Certainly you would not. Why, then, consider this proposition? What right have these petitioners to interfere between the District of Columbia and its slaves? The constitution authorizes the taking of private property for public uses: but the use of property supposes its continuance. From what funds is this property to be purchased? From those of the United States? from my funds? from the funds of South Carolina? Am I to furnish a torch for my own dwelling, a knife for my own throat?

Sir, the Government has the same power over this District that it has over a State, and it has no more. There is no adjudicated case, no dictum, admitting any further jurisdiction. Maryland and Virginia, slaveholding States, ceded these ten miles square to the general Government; and for what? That an unlimited despotism might be exercised in it? No, sir; they gave it in trust. There was an implied understanding that nothing injurious to their interests should be transacted within its borders; that here, at least, the cause of agitation and rebellion should find no material for its purpose; that here the wild frenzy of the abolitionists should neither be confirmed nor promoted; that here the mad and odious, the rash, stormy, and uncompromising doctrines of these rancorous fanatics, should not gravitate as to a common centre. Why, sir, if one of the free States—if Pennsylvania, for instance—should cede to you her metropolis, you might, with the same propriety, place the nest egg of slavery there, as attempt to interfere with the mature development of that institution here. There is no distinction whatever—not the slightest; the cases are parallel. You are invested with no power to meddle or make; you are estopped by the constitution; and your fidelity to that instrument, your full and ready appreciation of it, is only to be shown by obeying its injunctions.

Looking, then, sir, all around at the plighted faith, the federal compact, existing between us and our Northern brethren, and at the friendship, and confidence, and sympathy, which should exist between us; looking at the letter and spirit of our glorious constitution, and cherishing an abiding trust in the virtue and patriotism of this Senate, we do hope (and no man who has character enough to come here, or, at any rate, to deserve to be here, can hope otherwise) that the portcullis of the constitution may be dropped between these men and our lives and property.

Sir, let me call upon you for the strongest possible action; let me ask you to restore a spirit of peace and harmony to members of the same confederacy, to brethren of the same family, to human beings speaking the same language, practising the same religion, having the same deep and solemn interest in the happiness and prosperity of our beloved country. Such action, consequent upon moderation, firmness, and good sense, will be at once honorable to you and satisfactory to the South. Instead of sweeping away our laws and institutions, our rights and property, it will go abroad with healing on its wings. Instead of the fruits of bitterness, blood-thirsty tumults, house-burning, and massacre, the whole strength and fury of this excitement will be at once stifled and dissipated; and, instead of the confidence of the slaveholding States being withdrawn from the Government, never more to be restored, they will look upon it with yet more of honor, gratitude, and affection.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, for two or three weeks past, there had been in his possession a memorial from the Caln Quarterly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends, in the State of Pennsylvania, requesting Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade within the District of Columbia. This memorial was not a printed form; its language was not that in established use for such documents. It did not proceed from those desperate fanatics who have been endeavoring to disturb the security and peace of society in the Southern States, by the distribution of incendiary pamphlets and papers. Far different is the truth. It emanates from a society of Christians, whose object had always been to promote peace and good-will among men, and who have been the efficient and persevering friends of humanity in every clime. To their untiring efforts, more than to those of any other denomination of Christians, we owe the progress which has been made in abolishing the African slave trade throughout the world. This memorial was their testimony against the existence of slavery. This testimony they had borne for more than a century. Of the purity of their motives there can be no question.

He had omitted to present this memorial at an earlier day, because he had thought that, on its presentation at the proper time, much good might be done. He had believed that, by private consultations, some resolution might be devised upon this exciting subject, which would obtain the unanimous vote of the Senate. If there was one man in that body not willing to adopt any proper measure to calm the troubled spirit of the South, he did not know him. This, in his judgment, would be the best mode of accomplishing the object which we all desire to accomplish. The proper course to attain this result was, in his opinion, to refer the subject, either to a select committee, or to the Committee for the District of Columbia. They would examine it in all its bearings; they would ascertain the views and feelings of individual Senators, and he had no doubt they would be able to recommend some measure to the Senate on which they could all unite. This would have a most happy effect upon the country. He had intended, upon presenting the memorial which he had in charge, to have suggested this mode of proceeding. He regretted, therefore, that he had not known that his friend from Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] was in possession of memorials having a similar object in view. If he had been informed of it, he should have endeavored to persuade him to wait until Monday next, when he (Mr. B.) would have been prepared to pursue the course he had indicated. But the question has now been forced upon us. No, (said Mr. B.,) it has not been forced upon me, because I am glad to have a suitable occasion of expressing my opinions upon the subject.

The memorial which I have in my possession is entitled to the utmost respect, from the character of the memorialists. As I entirely dissent from the opinion which they express, that we ought to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, I feel it to be due to them, to myself, and to the Senate, respectfully, but firmly, to state the reasons why I cannot advocate their views or acquiesce in their conclusions.

If any one principle of constitutional law can, at this day, be considered as settled, it is, that Congress have no right, no power, over the question of slavery within those States where it exists. The property of the master in his slave existed in full force before the federal constitution was adopted. It was a subject which then belonged, as it still belongs, to the exclusive jurisdiction of the several States. These States, by the adoption of the constitution, never yielded to the general Government any right to interfere with the question. It remains where it was previous to the establishment of our confederacy.

The constitution has, in the clearest terms, recognised the right of property in slaves. It prohibits any State into which a slave may have fled from passing any law to discharge him from slavery, and declares that he shall be delivered up by the authorities of such State to his master. Nay, more; it makes the existence of slavery the foundation of political power, by giving to those States within which it exists, Representatives in Congress, not only in proportion to the whole number of free persons, but also in proportion to three fifths of the number of slaves.

An occasion very fortunately arose in the first Congress to settle this question for ever. The society for the abolition of slavery in Pennsylvania brought it before that Congress by a memorial, which was presented on the 11th day of February, 1790. After the subject had been discussed for several days, and after solemn deliberation, the House of Representatives, in Committee of the Whole, on the 23d day of March, 1790, resolved "That Congress have no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them, within any of the States; it remaining with the several States alone to provide any regulations therein which humanity and true policy may require."

I have thought it would be proper to present this decision, which was made almost half a century ago, distinctly to the view of the American people. The language of the resolution is clear, precise, and definite. It leaves the question where the constitution left it, and where, so far as I am concerned, it ever shall remain. The constitution of the United States never would have been called into existence; instead of the innumerable blessings which have flowed from our happy Union, we should have had anarchy, jealousy, and civil war, among the sister republics of which our confederacy is composed, had not the free States abandoned all control over this question. For one, whatever may be my opinions upon the abstract question of slavery, (and I am free to confess they are those of the people of Pennsylvania,) I shall never attempt to violate this fundamental compact. The Union will be dissolved, and incalculable evils will rise from its ashes, the moment any such attempt is seriously made by the free States in Congress.

What, then, are the circumstances under which these memorials are now presented? A number of fanatics, led on by foreign incendiaries, have been scattering "arrows, firebrands, and death," throughout the Southern States. The natural tendency of their publications is to produce dissatisfaction and revolt among the slaves, and to incite their wild passions to vengeance. All history, as well as the present condition of the slaves, proves that there can be no danger of the final result of a servile war. But, in the mean time, what dreadful scenes may be enacted, before such an insurrection, which would spare neither age nor sex, could be suppressed! What agony of mind must be suffered, especially by the gentler sex, in consequence of these publications! Many a mother clasps her infant to her bosom when she retires to rest, under dreadful apprehensions that she may be aroused from her slumbers by the savage yells of the slaves by whom she is surrounded. These are the works of the abolitionist. That their motives may be honest I do not doubt; but their zeal is without knowledge. The history of the human race presents numerous examples of ignorant enthusiasts, the purity of whose intentions cannot be doubted, who have spread devastation and bloodshed over the face of the earth.

These fanatics, instead of benefiting the slaves who are the objects of their regard, have inflicted serious injuries upon them. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. The masters, for the sake of their wives and children, for the sake of all that is near and dear to them on earth, must tighten the reins of authority over their slaves. They must thus counteract the efforts of the abolitionists. The slaves are denied many indulgences which their masters would otherwise cheerfully grant. They must be kept in such a state of bondage as effectually to prevent their rising. These are the injurious effects produced by the abolitionists upon the slave himself. Whilst, on the one hand, they render his condition miserable, by presenting to his mind vague notions of freedom never to be realized, on the other, they make it doubly miserable, by compelling the master to be severe, in order to prevent any attempts at insurrection. They thus render it impossible for the master to treat his slave according to the dictates of his heart and his feelings.

Besides, do not the abolitionists perceive that the spirit which is thus roused must protract to an indefinite period the emancipation of the slave? The necessary effect of their efforts is to render desperate those to whom the power of emancipation exclusively belongs. I believe most conscientiously, in whatever light this subject can be viewed, that the best interests of the slave require that the question should be left, where the constitution has left it, to the slaveholding States themselves, without foreign interference.

This being a true statement of the case, as applied to the States where slavery exists, what is now asked by these memorialists? That in this District of ten miles square—a District carved out of two slaveholding States, and surrounded by them on all sides—slavery shall be abolished. What would be the effects of granting their request? You would thus erect a citadel in the very heart of these States, upon a territory which they have ceded to you for a far different purpose, from which abolitionists and incendiaries could securely attack the peace and safety of their citizens. You establish a spot within the slaveholding States which would be a city of refuge for runaway slaves. You create by law a central point from which trains of gunpowder may be securely laid, extending into the surrounding States, which may at any moment produce a fearful and destructive explosion. By passing such a law, you introduce the enemy into the very bosom of these two States, and afford him every opportunity to produce a servile insurrection. Is there any reasonable man who can for one moment suppose that Virginia and Maryland would have ceded the District of Columbia to the United States, if they had entertained the slightest idea that Congress would ever use it for any such purpose? They ceded it for your use, for your convenience, and not for their own destruction. When slavery ceases to exist under the laws of Virginia and Maryland, then, and not till then, ought it to be abolished in the District of Columbia.

Mr. B. said that, notwithstanding these were his opinions, he could not vote for the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] not to receive these memorials. He would not at present proceed to state his reasons, still hoping the Senate could yet agree upon some course which would prove satisfactory to all. With this view, he moved that the whole subject be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. BENTON rose to express his concurrence in the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] that the consideration of this subject be postponed until Monday. It had come up suddenly and unexpectedly to-day, and the postponement would give an opportunity for Senators to reflect, and to confer together, and to conclude what was best to be done where all were united in wishing the same end, namely, to allay, and not to produce, excitement. He had risen for this purpose; but, being on his feet, he would say a few words on the general subject, which the presentation of these petitions had so suddenly and unexpectedly brought up. With respect to the petitioners, and those with whom they acted, he had no doubt but that many of them were good people, aiming at benevolent objects, and endeavoring to ameliorate the condition of one part of the human race, without inflicting calamities on another part; but they were mistaken in their mode of proceeding, and so far from accomplishing any part of their object, the whole effect of their interposition was to aggravate the condition of those in whose behalf they were interfering. But there was another part, and he meant to speak of the abolitionists generally, as the body containing the part of which he spoke; there was another part whom he could not qualify as good people seeking benevolent ends by mistaken means, but as incendiaries and agitators, with diabolical objects in view, to be accomplished by wicked and deplorable means. He did not go into the proofs now to establish the correctness of his opinion of this latter class, but he presumed it would be admitted that every attempt to work upon the passions of the slaves, and to excite them to murder their owners, was a wicked and diabolical attempt, and the work of a midnight incendiary. Pictures of slave degradation and misery, and of the white man's luxury and cruelty, were attempts of this kind; for they were appeals to the vengeance of slaves, and not to the intelligence or reason of those who legislated for them. He (Mr. B.) had had many pictures of this kind, as well as many diabolical publications, sent to him on this subject, during the last summer, the whole of which he had cast into the fire, and should not have thought of referring to the circumstance at this time, as displaying the character of the incendiary part of the abolitionists, had he not within these few days past, and while abolition petitions were pouring into the other end of the Capitol, received one of these pictures, the design of which could be nothing but mischief of the blackest dye. It was a print from an engraving, (and Mr. B. exhibited it, and handed it to Senators near him,) representing a large and spreading tree of liberty, beneath whose ample shade a slave owner was at one time luxuriously reposing, with slaves fanning him; at another carried forth in a palanquin, to view the half-naked laborers in the cotton field, whom drivers, with whips, were scourging to the task. The print was evidently from the abolition mint, and came to him by some other conveyance than that of the mail, for there was no post mark, or mark of any kind, to identify its origin and to indicate its line of march. For what purpose could such a picture be intended, unless to inflame the passions of slaves? And why engrave it, except to multiply copies for extensive distribution? But it was not pictures alone that operated upon the passions of the slaves, but speeches, publications, petitions presented in Congress, and the whole machinery of abolition societies. None of these things went to the understandings of the slaves, but to their passions, all imperfectly understood, and inspiring vague hopes, and stimulating abortive and fatal insurrections. Societies, especially, were the foundation of the greatest mischiefs. Whatever might be their objects, the slaves never did, and never can, understand them but in one way: as allies organized for action, and ready to march to their aid on the first signal of insurrection! It was thus that the massacre of San Domingo was made. The society in Paris, Les Amis des Noirs, Friends of the Blacks, with its affiliated societies throughout France and in London, made that massacre. And who composed that society? In the beginning, it comprised the extremes of virtue and of vice; it contained the best and the basest of human kind! Lafayette and the abbe Gregoire, those purest of philanthropists; and Marat and Anacharsis Clootz, thoseimps of hell in human shape. In the end, for all such societies run the same career of degeneration, the good men, disgusted with their associates, retired from the scene, and the wicked ruled at pleasure. Declamations against slavery, publications in gazettes, pictures, petitions to the constituent assembly, were the mode of proceeding; and the fish women of Paris—he said it with humiliation, because American females had signed the petitions now before us—the fish women of Paris, the very poissardes from the quays of the Seine, became the obstreperous clampions of West India emancipation. The effect upon the French islands is known to the world; but what is not known to the world, or not sufficiently known to it, is that the same societies which wrapt in flames and drenched in blood the beautiful island, which was then a garden and now a wilderness, were the means of exciting an insurrection upon our own continent; in Louisiana, where a French slave population existed, and where the language of Les Amis des Noirs could be understood, and where their emissaries could glide. The knowledge of this event (Mr. B. said) ought to be better known, both to show the danger of these societies, however distant, and though oceans may roll between them and their victims, and the fate of the slaves who may be excited to insurrection by them on any part of the American continent. He would read the notice of the event from the work of Mr. Charles Gayarre, lately elected by his native State to a seat on this floor, and whose resignation of that honor he sincerely regretted, and particularly for the cause which occasioned it, and which abstracted talent from a station that it would have adorned. Mr. B. read from the work, "Essai Historique Sur la Louisiane." "The white population of Louisiana was not the only part of the population which was agitated by the French revolution. The blacks, encouraged without doubt by the success which their race had obtained in San Domingo, dreamed of liberty and sought to shake off the yoke. The insurrection was planned at Pointe Coupee, which was then an isolated parish, and in which the number of slaves was considerable. The conspiracy took birth on the plantation of Mr. Julien Poydras, a rich planter, who was then travelling in the United States, and spread itself rapidly throughout the parish. The death of all the whites was resolved. Happily the conspirators could not agree upon the day for the massacre, and from this disagreement resulted a quarrel, which led to the discovery of the plot. The militia of the parish immediately took arms, and the Baron de Carondelet caused them to be supported by the troops of the line. It was resolved to arrest, and to punish the principal conspirators. The slaves opposed it; but they were quickly dispersed, with the loss of twenty of their number killed on the spot. Fifty of the insurgents were condemned to death. Sixteen were executed in different parts of the parish; the rest were put on board a galley and hung at intervals, all along the river, as far as New Orleans, (a distance of one hundred and fifty miles.) The severity of the chastisement intimidated the blacks, and all returned to perfect order."

Resuming his remarks, Mr. B. said he had read this passage to show that our white population had a right to dread, nay, were bound to dread, the mischievous influence of these societies, even when an ocean intervened, and much more when they stood upon the same hemisphere, and within the bosom of the same country. He had also read it to show the miserable fate of their victims, and to warn all that were good and virtuous—all that were honest, but mistaken—in the three hundred and fifty affiliated societies, vaunted by the individuals who style themselves their executive committee, and who date, from the commercial emporium of this Union, their high manifesto against the President; to warn them at once to secede from associations which, whatever may be their designs, can have no other effect than to revive in the Southern States the tragedy, not of San Domingo, but of the parish of Pointe Coupee.

Mr. B. went on to say that these societies had already perpetrated more mischief than the joint remainder of all their lives spent in prayers of contrition, and in works of retribution, could ever atone for. They had thrown the state of the emancipation question fifty years back. They had subjected every traveller, and every emigrant, from the non-slaveholding States, to be received with coldness, and viewed with suspicion and jealousy, in the slaveholding States. They had occasioned many slaves to lose their lives. They had caused the deportation of many ten thousands from the grain-growing to the planting States. They had caused the privileges of all slaves to be curtailed, and their bonds to be more tightly drawn. Nor was the mischief of their conduct confined to slaves; it reached the free colored people, and opened a sudden gulf of misery to that population. In all the slave States, this population has paid the forfeit of their intermediate position, and suffered proscription as the instruments, real or suspected, of the abolition societies. In all these States, their exodus had either been enforced or was impending. In Missouri there was a clause in the constitution which prohibited their emigration to the State; but that clause had remained a dead letter in the book until the agitation produced among the slaves by the distant rumbling of the abolition thunder, led to the knowledge in some instances, and to the belief in others, that these people were the antennæ of the abolitionists, and their medium for communicating with the slaves, and for exciting them to desertion first, and to insurrection eventually. Then ensued a painful scene. The people met, resolved, and prescribed thirty days for the exodus of the obnoxious caste. Under that decree a general emigration had to take place at the commencement of winter. Many worthy and industrious people had to quit their business and their homes, and to go forth under circumstances which rendered them objects of suspicion wherever they went, and sealed the door against the acquisition of new friends while depriving them of the protection of old ones. He (Mr. B.) had witnessed many instances of this kind, and had given certificates to several, to show that they were banished, not for their offences, but for their misfortunes; for the misfortune of being allied to the race which the abolition societies had made the object of their gratuitous philanthropy.

Having said thus much of the abolition societies in the non-slaveholding States, Mr. B. turned, with pride and exultation, to a different theme—the conduct of the great body of the people in all these States. Before he saw that conduct, and while the black question, like a portentous cloud was gathering and darkening on the Northeastern horizon, he trembled, not for the South, but for the Union. He feared that he saw the fatal work of dissolution about to begin, and the bonds of this glorious confederacy about to snap; but the conduct of the great body of the people in all the non-slaveholding States quickly dispelled that fear, and in its place planted deep the strongest assurance of the harmony and indivisibility of the Union which he had felt for many years. Their conduct was above all praise, above all thanks, above all gratitude. They had chased off the foreign emissaries, silenced the gabbling tongues of female dupes, and dispersed the assemblages, whether fanatical, visionary, or incendiary, of all that congregated to preach against evils which afflicted others, not them, and to propose remedies to aggravate the disease which they pretended to cure. They had acted with a noble spirit. They had exerted a vigor beyond all law. They had obeyed the enactments, not of the statute book, but of the heart; and while that spirit was in the heart, he cared nothing for laws written in a book. He would rely upon that spirit to complete the good work it has begun; to dry up these societies; to separate the mistaken philanthropist from the reckless fanatic and the wicked incendiary, and put an end to publications and petitions which, whatever may be their design, can have no other effect than to impede the object which they invoke, and to aggravate the evil which they deplore.

Turning to the immediate question before the Senate, that of the rejection of the petitions, Mr. B. said his wish was to give that vote which would have the greatest effect in putting down these societies. He thought the vote to be given to be rather one of expediency than of constitutional obligation. The clause in the constitution so often quoted in favor of the right of petitioning for a redress of grievances would seem to him to apply rather to the grievances felt by ourselves than to those felt by others, and which others might think an advantage, what we thought a grievance. The petitioners from Ohio think it a grievance that the people of the District of Columbia should suffer the institution of slavery, and pray for the redress of that grievance; the people of the District think the institution an advantage, and want no redress; now, which has the right of petitioning? Looking to the past action of the Senate, Mr. B. saw that, about thirty years ago, a petition against slavery, and that in the States, was presented to this body by the society of Quakers in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and that the same question upon its reception was made, and decided by yeas and nays, 19 to 9, in favor of receiving it. He read the names, to show that the Senators from the slave and non-slaveholding States voted some for and some against the reception, according to each one's opinion, and not according to the position or the character of the State from which he came. Mr. B. repeated that he thought this question to be one of expediency, and that it was expedient to give the vote which would go furthest towards quieting the public mind. The quieting the South depended upon quieting the North; for when the abolitionists were put down in the former place, the latter would be at ease. It seemed to him, then, that the gentlemen of the non-slaveholding States were the proper persons to speak first. They knew the temper of their own constituents best, and what might have a good or an ill effect upon them, either to increase the abolition fever, or to allay it. He knew that the feeling of the Senate was general; that all wished for the same end; and the gentlemen of the North as cordially as those of the South. He wished the subject to lie over till Monday, and then to hear the opinions of those gentlemen after they had had time to consider and to confer together.

Mr. TYLER rose and stated that he should have somewhat preferred a different course. With the most profound respect for the Senator from South Carolina, and his general course, still he did not think that his proposition on this subject was one which fully met the case. The right to receive or reject a petition is exercised on ordinary occasions, (said Mr. T.,) and the grounds on which motions of this kind are justified are numerous. A mere motion to reject is not adapted to a case like this, and is not such as should come from Senators whose State has been so grossly and wantonly libelled. Would the rejection of these petitions be so satisfactory to the State which the honorable Senator represents, as some other course which may be pointed out? It may be inferred that they were rejected solely on account of the disrespectful character of the language employed. The motion is one which does not touch the question of the competency of Congress. I want to see something more emphatic, more pointed; a positive disclaimer, on the part of Congress, of all competence to act on the subject; and I think that, from the spirit which I see manifested around me, we may succeed in obtaining a positive and actual disclaimer. The Senator from Ohio has referred to the exclusive power of Congress over the District of Columbia. From this doctrine, which I now hear the Senator advocate, and for which I have never before heard him contend, I fear he will not be inclined to go the whole length of my proposition. The object of the Senator from South Carolina and mine are the same—to put an end to the disquietude and insecurity which prevail in the South; and the only difference between us is as to the mode in which this can most effectually be done. What is the proposition which is made? Does it reach the subject? I think we ought to adopt a distinct and positive resolution, disclaiming any power in Congress to legislate on this subject. How is such a resolution to be obtained? In the usual manner in which resolutions are brought into this body. I would make no war with this petition, but would suffer it to go to the Committee for the District of Columbia, as others before it have gone. Not that, as chairman of that committee, I court the labor which it would impose; but because, from the construction of that committee, I believe a resolution would have been reported, declaring that the Senate had not the power to meddle with the subject. I believe the course we are taking is giving to these petitions too much consequence. Let them go to the lion's den, and there will be no footprints to show their return. The committee will meet them with a declaration that there is no power in Congress to do what the petitioners ask. I believe, also, that, with the exception of the Senator from Ohio, there would be no dissonance in the tone of the Senate on this subject. This, however, I only give as an opinion.

This is a question on which I cannot differ with the gentleman from South Carolina. I do not mean to rant about it here, nor to manifest any particular feelings, nor to ask the sympathies of Pennsylvania. The South is stronger than many believe her to be. It is true, no man's dwelling is safe from the midnight incendiary; but the incendiary is not to be found when the day breaks; he finds his only safety in skulking into obscurity, or flying to some distant spot. The efforts of these incendiaries have a tendency to the destruction of the whole of the black population. The incendiary walks abroad at night, and vanishes by day. Virginia fears no servile war; she fears only the midnight assassin. In the face of the broad day, her strength is sufficient to put down every thing like insurrection. She scorns to ask the commiseration of her sister States. All she asks of the North is, that her Senators will sustain the slaveholding States by adopting a resolution disclaiming any power in Congress to aid the views of wild and fanatic abolitionists, by interfering with the question of slavery. I feel that I am addressing men who are identified with our system of Government; and I frankly confess that I have no fear of this body. I verily believe that the Senate will be true to their oaths, and will be ready to defend every State of the Union. If we shall find, notwithstanding, that I am mistaken in this belief, we can then stand on our rights. If I find any movement can be made, which may be satisfactory to the Southern States, and which will obtain the unanimous sanction of the North, I shall not be found to stand on any minor point which may create a division.

Mr. BROWN felt himself constrained, by a sense of duty to the State from which he came, deeply and vitally interested as she was in every thing connected with the agitating question which had unexpectedly been brought into discussion that morning, to present, in a few words, his views as to the proper direction which should be given to that and all other petitions relating to slavery in the District of Columbia. He felt himself more especially called on to do so from the aspect which the question had assumed, in consequence of the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] to refuse to receive the petition. He had believed from the first time he had reflected on this subject, and subsequent events had but strengthened that conviction, that the most proper disposition of all such petitions was to lay them on the table without printing. This course, while it indicated to the fanatics that Congress will yield no countenance to their designs, at the same time marks them with decided reprobation by a refusal to print. But, in his estimation, another reason gave to the motion to lay them on the table a decided preference over any other proceedings by which they should be met. The peculiar merit of this motion, as applicable to this question, is, that it precludes all debate, and would thus prevent the agitation of a subject in Congress which all should deprecate as fraught with mischief to every portion of this happy and flourishing confederacy.

Mr. B. said that honorable gentlemen who advocated this motion had disclaimed all intention to produce agitation on this question. He did not pretend to question the sincerity of their declarations, and, while willing to do every justice to their motives, he must be allowed to say that no method could be devised better calculated, in his judgment, to produce such a result.

He (Mr. B.) most sincerely believed that the best interests of the Southern States would be most consulted by pursuing such a course here as would harmonize the feelings of every section, and avoid opening for discussion so dangerous and delicate a question. He believed all the Senators who were present a few days since, when a petition of similar character had been presented by an honorable Senator, had, by their votes to lay it on the table, sanctioned the course which he now suggested.

[Mr. CALHOUN, in explanation, said that himself and his colleague were absent from the Senate on the occasion alluded to.]

Mr. B. resumed his remarks, and said that he had made no reference to the votes of any particular members of that body, but what he had said was, that a similar petition had been laid on the table without objection from any one, and consequently by a unanimous vote of the Senators present. Here, then, was a most emphatic declaration, by gentlemen representing the Northern States as well as those from other parts of the Union, by this vote, that they will entertain no attempt at legislation on the question of slavery in the District of Columbia. Why, then, asked Mr. B., should we now adopt a mode of proceeding calculated to disturb the harmonious action of the Senate, which had been produced by the former vote? Why (he would respectfully ask of honorable gentlemen who press the motion to refuse to receive the petition) and for what beneficial purpose do they press it? By persisting in such a course it would, beyond all doubt, open a wide range of discussion; it would not fail to call forth a great diversity of opinion in relation to the extent of the right to petition under the constitution. Nor would it be confined to that question alone, judging from an expression which had fallen from an honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TYLER] in the course of this debate. That gentleman had declared his preference for a direct negative vote by the Senate, as to the constitutional power of Congress to emancipate slaves in the District of Columbia. He, for one, protested, politically speaking, against opening this Pandora's box in the halls of Congress. For all beneficial and practical purposes, an overwhelming majority of the members representing the Northern States were, with the South, in opposition to any interference with slavery in the District of Columbia. If there was half a dozen in both branches of Congress who did not stand in entire opposition to any interference with slavery, in this District or elsewhere, he had yet to learn it. Was it wise, was it prudent, was it manganimous, in gentlemen representing the Southern States, to urge this matter still further, and say to our Northern friends in Congress, "Gentlemen, we all agree in the general conclusion, that Congress should not interfere in this question, but we wish to know your reasons for arriving at this conclusion; we wish you to declare, by your votes, whether you arrive at this result because you think it unconstitutional or not?" Mr. B. said that he would yield to none in zeal in sustaining and supporting, to the extent of his ability, what he believed to be the true interest of the South; but he should take leave to say that, when the almost united will of both branches of Congress, for all practical purposes, was with us, against all interference on this subject, he should not hazard the peace and quiet of the country by going on a Quixotic expedition in pursuit of abstract constitutional questions. He would not quarrel with gentlemen so long as they continued in the determination not to interfere in this question, even if they did not come to that determination by precisely the same mode of reasoning with himself. Mr. B. said it appeared to him that the true course of those representing the South here was to occupy a defensive position, so long as others were disposed not to discuss it, and Congress refused to exert any legislative authority over the subject. When that attempt was made, if it ever should be, he should say the time for discussion had passed, and a period had arrived which called for other and more vigorous means of self-defence.

Another, and not the least weighty, reason had operated on his mind in bringing it to the conclusion that the motion to reject the petition was injudicious. If successful, nothing would perhaps be more agreeable to the fanatics (he thought they should be more properly called fiends in human shape, who would endeavor to lay waste the happiness and liberties of this country) than the intelligence that they had received this mark of notice, and to them, of consequence, from the Congress of the United States. Mr. B. said, in his judgment, that man was but little skilled in the passions of the human breast, who did not know that there was no error, however great, nor any heresy, however abominable, either in religion or politics, which might not be aided by the cry of persecution, however unfounded it might be in fact. Fanaticism would seize on it, to enlist the sympathies of the weak and ignorant in their behalf. Wicked and fanatical men had done this, in all ages, and he doubted not but the malignant spirits who had been laboring in this detestable vocation would cunningly seek to avail themselves of any means to further their diabolical designs. Another, and, with him, equally decisive reason against any course calculated to throw the subject open to discussion here, was the almost universal manifestation at the North, during the past summer and fall, of that fraternal and patriotic feeling towards the South, which he trusted would continue to exert its happy effect in preserving, unimpaired, the bonds of the union of these States. He rejoiced at this strong development of feeling, not only because it had contributed to repress the movements of dangerous enemies to the peace and happiness of our country in that quarter, but because it had dispelled the insidious misrepresentations in regard to the sentiments of the great body of the Northern people, which certain presses had, as he believed, both in the North and South, most industriously used, for the most sinister purposes. What were the facts, as to the public opinion of the North, on this subject? But a short time had passed by since most of the active leaders of this fanatical band were contemptible fugitives, in different parts of the North, where they had attempted to exhibit, from the insulted and generous indignation of a patriotic people, who wished to preserve the peace of the country and their obligations to us as members of the same confederacy. That an active and daring band of these incendiaries existed none could doubt, but that they formed a very small portion of the great mass of the Northern people, we not only had the assurances of public meetings, which had assembled almost throughout that quarter, attended by the most respectable and distinguished citizens, but we had here, but a short time since, the declarations of many of the Senators from the non-slaveholding States, that this class of individuals was but small, and that they were countenanced by no respectable portion of those States. He had been assured, since his arrival here, by gentlemen representing the Northern States, that an abolition discourse could not be delivered among those whom they represented, without endangering the safety of the person attempting it. In addition to this, he would say, that the action of the federal Government, through the Post Office Department, was protective of the rights of the South against incendiary publications. If Postmasters to the North and South did their duty, as sanctioned by the head of that Department, these enemies of our Government and of the human race were cut off from circulating, through that medium, their firebrands of mischief. Under these circumstances, was this a time for us to throw open the door to discussion on this subject, and thus assist in exacerbating feelings which had already been enough excited. He thought it only necessary to contrast the proceedings of the Senate on the petition to which he had before alluded, and which had been laid on the table by the unanimous vote of the Senators present, with the proceedings of to-day, to show the decided wisdom of taking the same course in relation to the present and all similar petitions. The petition which had been quietly inurned by the motion to lay on the table, had scarcely been thought of or heard of since, consigned as it had been to the insignificance and contempt of mortifying neglect and want of notice. What was the fact, in relation to the proposed mode of proceeding, as to the present petition? The Senate had already found itself engaged in a debate, which no one could foresee the direction of, thus producing agitation and dignifying with undeserved, and, no doubt, gratifying notoriety to the fanatics, a miserable effusion, which, but for this proceeding, would have fallen into obscurity and contempt. He (Mr. B.) had nothing to ask from the North, as one of the representatives of a Southern State, more than we were entitled to under the compact with our sister States, and from that feeling of fraternal regard which, for many purposes, made us the same people. He, however, was disposed to act upon this, as upon all other occasions, in that spirit of conciliation in which our federal Government had originated, and without which it could not survive. He would not quarrel with gentlemen, so long as they took decided ground against any interference on this question, even if they should differ as to some abstract questions in relation to it. He believed, most sincerely, that the almost universal sentiment of the intelligent and respectable portion of the North was against any interference, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, on this delicate subject. In this feeling of confidence, he was in favor of clinging to the union of the States, as the great source of our safety, happiness, and liberty. He would not for a moment believe that either of the great sections of this country would so far forget its just obligations to the other, by such an outrage upon its constitutional rights as would end in the overthrow of a Government won by the united valor and patriotism of their ancestors.

Mr. LEIGH. As a motion had been made to postpone this discussion until Monday, I shall not now trouble the Senate with the remarks which I had intended to make; but whenever the question shall again come up, I shall consider it my duty to make some observations, that my views of the constitutional question may not be mistaken. I said the other day that I had never conversed with a single Northern gentleman whose opinions on this subject gave me any dissatisfaction. I then thought it my duty to make this declaration. Since I made that remark, a pamphlet has been sent to me, being a review of another pamphlet written by a Northern gentleman, for whose character and piety and talents I have ever felt the most unbounded respect and veneration; and there are, in the review which has been sent to me, extracts from the pamphlet of this gentleman, which are peculiarly fitted to operate on the feelings of the representatives of the State of Virginia on this floor. If these extracts be true—but I have not yet seen the original pamphlet—this reverend gentleman, who appears to have been for some time in Virginia, although now a resident of Massachusetts, received some impressions as to the moral condition of Virginia, which have poisoned his mind so completely on this subject, that, if any of the intelligent persons who compose his congregation shall imbibe his opinions, I cannot but think we are approaching a very fearful crisis.

When the gentleman from North Carolina speaks of contemptible fanatics, if by contemptible he means incapable of mischief, I must dissent from the correctness of the expression. In every sentiment of allegiance to this Government, allegiance of the heart as well as the understanding, I concur with that gentleman. I will say nothing more at present. But when the subject shall again come before the Senate, I shall feel myself bound to offer my views at large; and if there should be any thing in my language which may appear to have a tendency to cause agitation, or to wound the feelings of any individual, I must leave it to the result to justify the purity of my motives, and to show that the tendency of all I shall utter is to conciliation.

Mr. PRESTON. I was not in my seat, sir, when a petition similar to this was a few days since laid upon the table. Had I been, it would not have gone there sub silentio.—Sir, I must express my astonishment at the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina. Has this discussion been brought on by the Southern States? No, sir. Is discussion of any kind unnecessary?

Is there nothing peculiar in the aspect of affairs; no extraordinary efforts making at the North; nothing unusual in public sentiment and feeling to authorize this discussion? Sir, why has not North Carolina taken up this matter and in this way before?

Every Governor of every slaveholding State has called the attention of its Legislature to this subject; the whole public mind has been convulsed; all men of all parties are shaken and excited; and lo! the Senator from North Carolina exhorts us to be quiet. An enemy, savage, remorseless, and indignant, is thundering at our gates, and the gentleman tells us to fold our arms. Our hearths and altars are running with blood and in flames; be quiet, says the gentleman. The storm is bursting upon us that is to sweep away the bulwarks of our freedom and union, and fill the land with convulsion and anarchy; but sit still, says the honorable Senator. He sees no danger, no cause of alarm; no, not the slightest. Petitioners, the mad instruments for accomplishing this unhallowed work, are thronging here by thousands; incendiary pamphlets are circulated; incendiary meetings held; insult, threats, and denunciations, are heaped upon us; but we are not to lift a voice or raise a finger. Oh! no, sir; keep quiet; all around is a profound calm. Sir, we whose lives and property are at stake, we who have every motive to move, are we alone to be quiet? It may be that there is some object in this. It may be that wicked and designing men have mixed up this matter with others foreign to it. I trust not, sir; I trust that all parties will act in harmony with each other on a point which so immediately affects the public weal. The South, sir, has not produced this excitement. She has not sought this discussion. It has been accomplished by other men and other means. By these selfish and morose fanatics—these wild disturbers, whose schemes will involve this country and the world in confusion and calamity. This is the child of agitation—of that agitation which drives our very women from the decencies and duties of their sex.

Do we demand any thing here, sir, that we are not entitled to? There is not a Senator present, unless it is the gentleman from Ohio, that so believes. Sir, I feel, with the Senator from Missouri, the most profound respect for the talent and integrity, the ability, boldness, and zeal, of the leading men of the North during the last summer. I thank them for checking the excitement there as far as they were able. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania also, that he is found side by side with us in this crisis. That while the Senator from a slaveholding State sees no cause of unnecessary agitation—while he would have us be quiet, nor place our foot on the torch that is about to consume our dwellings, the Senator from the great and free State of Pennsylvania identifies himself with our feelings and interests, and sees, as we do, all around, the materials of discord, disunion, and destruction.

Sir, I invoke him, and all who think with him, to extinguish the fire which will wrap this country in flames. The Southern country is filled with alarm and discontent; let us, by the rejection of this petition, remove instead of increasing it. Let us check this wild crusade while yet we may; and, for God's sake, let us meet with no political opposition in so doing. Adopt some measure by which we can obtain the security we are entitled to. Reject this petition. Public good and abstract right both call upon you to do so. Prevent this swollen and turbid torrent of fanaticism from overwhelming these halls. One pigmy rill has found its way here—let it be the last. I, at least, sir, will not aid in undermining our institutions; I will not fan the flame of fanaticism, and aid that fanaticism in producing the worst of consequences. Should I do so, I should prove recreant to my trust.

Abolition of Slavery.

Mr. BROWN begged leave to say one word more before the question was taken. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had asked, in a very emphatic manner, if, when the burning torch was thrown into the House, he, as a Southern man, would not be ready to extinguish it. He would answer that he was ready, but he would also say that he was not ready to pour oil on the torch and increase the flame into a conflagration which might destroy the Union. The honorable gentleman had said he would not have discharged his duty to the South had he not exposed and proclaimed the danger, and seemed to think him not vigilant enough because he did not take the same course. He was, perhaps, not gifted with the keen perspicacity of the gentleman from South Carolina; he admitted that he was unable to discover the benefit that would result to the South, or any other portion of the country, from pursuing a course which would lead to the discussion and agitation of this subject here. Sir, the time has been when the high-minded members from the Southern States assumed an attitude highly honorable on this subject. What was it? Why, they declared that it was a subject on which they would not tolerate the slightest discussion. That was once the course of honorable gentlemen from the South on that floor. But that time had gone by; it appeared that new lights had sprung up, new discoveries had been made, and gentlemen were ready to go into the discussion of a subject that once was not permitted to be discussed at all. He, as one of the representatives of the Southern States, objected to any discussion which went to call in question the rights of the South. He was ready to go with Southern gentlemen in any measure that would prevent such discussion. He would go further. Whenever, said Mr. B., our Northern friends shall attempt in the slightest degree to interfere, by legislative action, with the rights of the South, (and he could with pleasure say that they had shown every disposition to repress such interferences,) let us, said he, depart from them—depart peaceably. The gentleman had asked, why should they in the Senate not express their opinions on this subject, when the Governors and Legislatures of the Southern States had done so? It was true that the Executives of the Southern States had recommended this subject to the consideration of their respective Legislatures. This it was their right and their duty to do; but he denied the right of Congress to discuss, or in any manner to interfere with, the subject. The gentleman from South Carolina would at once perceive the distinction between any action on this subject by the Legislatures of the States specially interested in it, and a discussion by Congress which had nothing to do with it. That was his answer to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBSTER said it could not have been expected by the Senate that a question of such deep interest would come up for discussion to-day. As a motion had been made to postpone the further discussion until Monday, and as it was now late, a motion to adjourn would have the effect of postponing the subject until Monday, assuming that the Senate would adjourn over to Monday. He would therefore ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he could have no objection to the motion to postpone, as he was desirous that every Senator should have ample time to deliberate before he was called on to record his vote; but as the opinion of some of the Senators might be more or less influenced by the course which he might think proper to pursue in relation to the question, he deemed it proper to declare that no consideration could induce him to withdraw the demand which he had made for the question on the reception of the petition. He had made it on full deliberation, and it was impossible that he could be induced to change his opinion. He desired the question to be put to the vote; and were there no other reason, there is one, to him imperious, why he should not forego this desire—the insolent, the false, and calumnious language which the petitions held towards the slaveholding States and every slaveholder in the Union. This body (said Mr. C.) presented to him a portentous, an amazing spectacle. Here are assembled the representatives of twenty four confederated States, to deliberate on their common interest and prosperity, seriously discussing the question, whether they shall or shall not receive petitions which basely calumniate the institutions of eleven of those States, which denounce their citizens as pirates, kidnappers, and dealers in human flesh! That a single individual from the States thus slandered should avow a determination to vote to receive so base a libel on the State he represents, as well as the entire South, was to him truly wonderful; and yet more wonderful, if possible, were the arguments he advanced in support of his intention. But more of this in its proper place.

Why, said Mr. C., should there be any hesitation to reject these petitions in any quarter? Is it from a feeling of delicacy to the petitioners? If such be the feelings of regard on the part of the Senators from the non-slaveholding States towards these mischievous agitators, what ought to be our feelings, to behold the entire South, by whose confidence we have been selected and placed here to guard their interest and honor, basely vilified in the face of the world? Is the hesitation because there are feelings diffused throughout the non-slaveholding States in relation to the subject of these petitions, so strong and so general, that, for political reasons, it is not thought desirable to disturb them? Are the two great parties who divide those States afraid to come into conflict with those opinions? If so, it is a decided reason why we of the South should insist on taking the question. It is important to our constituents that the fact should be known. He, said Mr. C., wished to be perfectly explicit on a point where our interest is so deeply concerned. He, with others, felt, as ought to be felt, for the open, manly, and decided course of a large portion of our Northern brethren during the last summer, against the criminal conduct of the fanatics; but he feared it has not checked the disease. He feared the true reason why there should be the least hesitation in rejecting these vile and libellous attacks on nearly half of the members of this Union was, that both parties are afraid to incur the displeasure of a party so strong as the incendiaries. He could not doubt but all who heard him reprobated the language of these petitions; and with such feelings he could not discover any other reason that was even plausible, but the one he apprehended. There were other reasons which induced him to fear the motive to which he referred was the true one. He had received, a few days since, a printed copy of a protest, signed by Arthur Tappan and several of his associates, remonstrating against the language used in the President's message against the fanatics, in which it is stated, boastingly, that, so far from being repressed by the proceedings against them to the North during the last summer, the number of their societies had increased from (if my memory be accurate) 250 to 350. In addition to this, he regarded the fact to which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. LEXEN] referred as proof but too strong that the fanatical spirit at the North was strong and increasing. He had not seen Dr. Channing's book; but that a divine of his eminence, and one of the most eloquent and polished writers of the country, should publish such a book at this time, was a matter for serious reflection to those he represented, as well as all who had similar interests. If he might judge of the whole from some of its extracts, it might be well compared with the incendiary publications of Garrison himself. It is a sad omen of the times, that he should lend the aid of his talents and character to criminal designs, the direct tendency of which is to work asunder the Union and subvert the constitution. But, said Mr. C., though the false and slanderous language of these petitions are to him imperious reasons for their rejection, there were others of a character not less decisive. The parties, as he stated when he was first up, call on Congress to abolish slavery in this District. He again repeated that Congress had no such power, no more than it has to abolish slavery in the States.

The fifth amendment of the constitution offers an insuperable barrier, which provides, among other things, that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public uses without just compensation." Are not slaves property? and if so, how can Congress any more take away the property of a master in his slave, in this District, than it could his life and liberty? They stand on the same ground. The one, in the eye of the constitution, is as sacred as the other. He would pass over the latter part of the sentence cited, on which his colleague had touched, and conclusively show that the proviso which it contained also opposed impassable barriers to emancipation by Congress in this District.

He, said Mr. C., felt the profoundest gratitude and respect to those watchful and jealous patriots who, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, would not agree to its ratification without proposing these amended articles, which were subsequently agreed to, and which contain those great limitations on power, of the importance of which he daily became more sensible. But it is said that Congress has, by the constitution, the exclusive right of legislation in this District. Grant it; and what then? Does the constitution mean that it has absolute power of legislation here? Certainly not. There are many important limitations on its powers in the District as well as in the States. Congress cannot, in the District, abridge the liberty of the press; it cannot establish a religion by law; it cannot abolish jury trial. In granting exclusive right of legislation, the constitution only intended to exclude all other legislative authority within the District, and not to create an absolute and despotic power in Congress over the lives and property of its citizens. Nor was the opinion less erroneous that Congress has the same unlimited power here that the States had within their respective limits. The two powers are wholly different. The latter was original, inherent, and sovereign; while the former was a derivative and delegated trust-power, given by the States for special purposes, and subject to be altered and rescinded at their pleasure.

But it is said that it would be a violation of the constitution not to receive these petitions. He denied that there was any provision in that instrument that made it their duty to receive them. He had again and again read the constitution, and could find none such, nor any thing like it. It is true that there is a provision that "Congress should pass no law to abridge the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." Is a refusal to receive these slanderous petitions a passage of a law for the purpose forbidden in the constitution? Is there any man of sense, who has for a moment reflected on the subject, who can have the assurance to say so? How, then, can the refusal to receive be construed into a violation of the constitution?

He, said Mr. C., could not but be struck with one remarkable fact. When the question is as to the right of these fanatics to attack the character and property of the slaveholding States, there are Senators on this floor who give a latitude to the constitution wider than the words can possibly mean; but when the object is to defend the rights and property of these States, they give the most rigid and narrow construction to the instrument.

But (said Mr. C.) the Senator from North Carolina objects to a refusal to receive these slanderous and abusive petitions, for fear it should cause excitement and agitation. To avoid this, he recommends that they should be received and laid on the table, there to slumber quietly. He (said Mr. C.) well knew that there were two modes to prevent agitation, which, according to the difference of temperament and character, were resorted to: the one to receive and quietly pocket the insult, and the other by repelling it promptly and decisively. Now, he would ask the Senator whether, if one should petition him, and pronounce him in his petition to be a robber, kidnapper, pirate, with all the other abusive terms used in these petitions, to which of the two modes would he resort? Would he quietly take the petition and put it in his pocket, (lay it on the table,) or would he knock the scoundrel down? I am sure I need not wait an answer. Will, then, he, representing a sovereign State, whose confidence has placed him here to guard her honor and interest, agree to receive a paper, and place it, by his vote, on the permanent records of the Senate, which he would indignantly repel, if offered to himself personally? Is he prepared to show himself less jealous of the honor of his State than his own? As vigilant as we may be to guard our honor and interest, let us be still more watchful in guarding the honor and interest of those we represent. To meet these studied attacks, which come here in the shape of petitions, in that spirit, is the mode, and only safe and effectual mode, to put down agitation—the only mode to preserve our peace and security at home, and the union and institutions of the country generally. Show these fanatics, by a decided refusal, by shutting the door in their face, that they have nothing to hope by agitation, and they will soon cease to agitate.

An objection of a different character is made (said Mr. C.) by the Senator from Virginia near me, [Mr. TYLER.] He objects that, to refuse to receive the petitions is not strong enough; is not, to use his expression, up to the occasion; and thinks that the proper course is to refer them to the Committee for the District of Columbia, which, he assures us, would be united in denying to Congress any constitutional power to touch the question of emancipation in this District. He also expressed his conviction that the Senate would unanimously sustain the committee, with, perhaps, the exception of the Senator who presented these petitions. He was (said Mr. C.) at a loss to see how the course he had adopted fell short of the occasion. What was the occasion? Petitions basely slandering the States, which he and all the other Senators from the same section represented, were presented by the Senator from Ohio. This was the occasion. By the parliamentary rules, the question is, shall they be received? Shall we who represent the States, thus openly and in our own presence insulted, pocket the insult? or shall we indignantly repel it? Did he fall short of the occasion in demanding the question on the reception, and in calling on the Senate to join him in repelling the indignity?

But (said Mr. C.) I am rejoiced to learn from the Senator that he is in favor of stronger measures; in favor of a direct declaration by the Senate, denying the right to touch the question of emancipation in the District; doubly rejoiced that the Committee for the District was unanimous on this important point; and trebly so to hear from the Senator that there were just grounds to expect almost perfect unanimity in the Senate itself. I trust he is not mistaken, and I am happy to inform him that there is not the slightest incompatibility between the course he (Mr. C.) had pursued, and the one the Senator recommends. A reference of these petitions is not necessary to give jurisdiction to the Committee for the District, in order to bring out their opinion and that of the Senate on the highly important point on which the Senator anticipated so much unanimity. A resolution may be moved expressly denying the power of Congress, and referred to the committee; and, if no other should move it, he (Mr. C.) would, if acceptable to the Senator from Virginia. So far from the two courses being incompatible, they were, in his opinion, in perfect harmony, and, together, formed the true course. Let the Senate, by a unanimous rejection of these vile slanders on the slaveholding States, show a just indignation at the insult offered them; and let it be followed by the passage of a resolution, with like unanimity, denying the power of Congress to touch the subject of emancipation in this District; and much, very much, would be done to put down agitation, to restore confidence to the South, and preserve harmony to the Union.

The question of postponement till Monday was then determined in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 11.

The honorable A. CUTHBERT, from Georgia, appeared and took his seat.

CALM QUARTERLY MEETING MEMORIAL.

After the reception of sundry executive communications and memorials,

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was now about to present the memorial of the Calm quarterly meeting of the religious society of Friends in Pennsylvania, requesting Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. On this subject he had expressed his opinions to the Senate on Thursday last, and he had no disposition to repeat them at present. He would say, however, that, on a review of these opinions, he was perfectly satisfied with them. All he should now say was, that the memorial which he was about to present was perfectly respectful in its language. Indeed, it could not possibly be otherwise, considering the respectable source from which it emanated.

It would become his duty to make some motion in regard to this memorial. On Thursday last he had suggested that, in his judgment, the best course to pursue was to refer these memorials to a select committee, or to the Committee for the District of Columbia. He still thought so; but he now found that insurmountable obstacles presented themselves to such a reference.

In presenting this memorial, and in exerting himself, so far as in him lay, to secure for it that respectable reception by the Senate which it deserved, he should do his duty to the memorialists. After it should obtain this reception, he should have a duty to perform to himself and to his country. He was clearly of opinion, for the reasons he had stated on Thursday last, that Congress ought not, at this time, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and that it was our duty promptly to place this exciting question at rest. He should therefore move that the memorial be read, and that the prayer of the memorialists be rejected.

Mr. PRESTON said that the question was already raised by his colleague, and he trusted that the Senator from Pennsylvania would not urge any action on this petition until some disposition was made of the one presented on Thursday by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, could see no difference between discussing the question on this or on the former petition. The language of this memorial, indeed, being more respectful, there seemed to be a propriety to confine the debate to it, rather than to extend it on the other, the words of which were calculated to produce so much bitterness and excitement.

Mr. WEBSTER hoped that the Senator from Pennsylvania would not take a course by which all the ordinary business of the morning would be obstructed, and that the consideration of this memorial would be deferred until the other petitions had been received.

Mr. CALHOUN thought the debate which commenced on Thursday ought to be resumed and continued. He saw no reason why this memorial should take priority over the one presented from Ohio; why we should break away from that petition to receive this, merely because the language in which it was couched was respectful; that is, as respectful as could be expected. For, however temperate it might seem, the same principle was embodied in it; and the innuendoes conveyed were as far from being acceptable as the barefaced insolence of the other. He hoped the debate would go on on the first petition; that the question would be met manfully; and that, at the same time, we should not encroach upon the hour which ought to be devoted to other business.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said his object was to avoid excitement. The object of the petitioners in both memorials was the same. It intends the abolition of slavery and of the traffic in slaves in the District of Columbia. He had no wish to shrink from the question; on the contrary, he was desirous of giving a direct vote. Let the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania prevail, and certainly the object of the gentleman from South Carolina would be attained. It would say to all who hold the same sentiments with these petitioners, that no further action would be had on any similar memorials, except merely to read and to reject them. He had hoped that this session would pass away without any additional excitement. But the legislation here upon the subject had produced tenfold agitation. Suppose you reject the petition from Ohio because the language is disrespectful, will that put an end to this excitement? Any man must be blind not to see that an impression, and a well-founded one, would go abroad that it was not received on that account merely, and that legislation was had on it in reference only to the language in which it was couched. The course pointed out by the Senator from Pennsylvania puts an end to all this. It says distinctly, we will reject what we will not, cannot, ought not to receive. He had no disposition and no intention to take any part in the debate. He should give a silent vote.

Mr. CLAY said that he had not risen to take a part in the principal question. He did not think, however, that these petitioners ought to have any monopoly of the time and attention of the Senate. He could not consent to it. He had a motion himself which he wished to present, and to which he attached much importance. He should therefore move that this whole matter be laid on the table, at least until the necessary business of the morning be got through with.

The question being taken, the memorial, &c., was ordered to lie on the table.

SPECULATION IN INDIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. BLACK said he had received, and would take this occasion to present, a memorial from a number of the citizens of Mississippi, residing in the northern part of that State, on an important subject. It related to extensive frauds said to be about to be practised on the Government in relation to the public lands, involving, as the memorialists suppose, at least the quantity of upwards of two millions of acres of public land. He was informed that there was much excitement on the subject in that State, and that other memorials would be forwarded, numerously signed. It appears by the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, that, to each Choctaw head of a family desirous of remaining and becoming citizens of Alabama or Mississippi, a reservation was made of six hundred and forty acres of land, to include improvements, and to each child a less quantity, adjoining the improvement of the parent; the land to be patented to claimants after a residence thereon of five years. It was made necessary, under the 14th article, which contains this provision, that all intending to avail themselves of this advantage should record their names with the Indian agent within six months after the making of the treaty. This register was kept by the agent at that time, (Colonel Ward,) but it appears that, by mistake, some names were omitted, or, if recorded, the register has been mutilated. The memorialists state that some speculators, seizing upon the advantage which this circumstance afforded, have gone to the Indians who have removed beyond the Mississippi river, and have procured, for a trifling consideration, very numerous claims, to be preferred, sufficient to cover all, or nearly all, the good land remaining. He was informed that some of these gentlemen, speculating on these claims, no doubt from "patriotic motives," had sold out their chances for immense sums. He was also informed that, seizing upon the advantage of the fact that these lands had been reserved from the late sales, they were endeavoring to exact large amounts from the settlers to quiet their possessions, and secure their homes, under the apprehension that these claims will finally be made good. Mr. B. said he had no doubt there were some few cases in which individuals among the Choctaws had suffered detriment by their names not appearing in the register kept by the agent, who have conformed to the requisitions of the treaty; but he had no doubt that those cases were very few indeed, and those should meet, when presented, with the favorable attention of Congress. What he desired at present was, to put all on their guard against these claims, and to prevent the innocent settlers from being taken in by them. They must come into the action of Congress; and while he was ready to do justice to the meritorious claims, he would at the same time say it was his firm conviction that few, very few, will be found to be of that character. He would advise the settlers, therefore, against caustless apprehension, and all especially against dealing in such improbable chances. Mr. B. said he had been informed that one hundred sections had been reserved at a single land office, without any power so to reserve. The land should, after having been proclaimed, have been sold.

As to the direction which this memorial shall take, he remarked that he was not altogether sure that it properly belonged to the Committee on Private Land Claims. He did not desire the investigation in which these claims would probably involve the committee; yet, if the Senate thought that the proper direction, he was ready to undertake it, and they should be subjected to the strictest scrutiny. They cannot be passed without legislative action, and none of them shall pass until, after the fullest investigation, they shall be found to be just.

After a few words from Mr. KING, of Alabama, inaudible to the reporters, from the loud conversation in the privileged seats,

Mr. CLAY expressed his gratification that the Senator from Mississippi had brought forward this subject; and stated that he had received accounts of extensive frauds said to have been committed under the Choctaw treaty. It had even been said that the extent of these frauds would amount to ten millions of dollars out of the public lands. It was said these frauds had been the result of misconception of the President's language, and he wished it may turn out so. But he hoped, to whatever committee the subject might be referred, that every effort would be used to bring these nefarious culprits before the world, and to hold them up to the indignation they deserve for having attempted to commit so outrageous a robbery on the public property. From what he had gathered, there had been no project since the famous Yazoo business, which had been so nefarious as the schemes which had been carried on in Mississippi, and he hoped every pains would be taken to ferret out the abuse.

Mr. WHITE, of Tennessee, made a few remarks on the subject. He said he was led to believe, from information which had reached him, chiefly through the newspapers, that a plan had been laid for an immense speculation, under cover of the Indian treaty referred to; in pursuance of which, the claims that might be allowed to certain Indians under the treaty, to a very large amount, had been bought up by individuals. His belief was, that claims of this kind had been purchased up, by using the names of the Indians, but entirely for the benefit of other persons. The Government, (Mr. W. said,) in his opinion, lay under a high responsibility to protect the Indians in the rights reserved by the treaty. By this speculation in the contingent claims of the Indians, if sanctioned by Congress, great injustice would be done to them. He hoped, he said, that not a claim of this description would be allowed until it was ascertained that the whole amount of it would enure solely and exclusively to the benefit of the Indian entitled to it. So far as he was concerned, as a member of the committee to whom it was proposed to refer this subject, he wished to be understood that he would not consent that any man but an Indian should enjoy the benefit of any one of these claims. No white man should, with his consent, enrich himself by the beggary of those people, whom he considered peculiarly under the guardianship of the United States.

Mr. WEBSTER remarked that the fame of these speculations had reached the State in which he resided. These reservations had been made in the expectation that they would be productive of substantial benefits to the Indians. It seemed, however, that the substantial benefits had been in another quarter. He wished to know if he had understood that these grants, obtained by the speculators, would require the sanction of Congress to make them valid. If so, he was very glad to hear it.

Mr. BLACK, in explanation, stated that some of the grants were registered in the proper manner, and belonged to the Indians, and he hoped these would not be prejudiced. Others would require the sanction of Congress.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, stated (as well as he could be heard) that, owing to the negligence of the agent, or by some means, some of those who were regularly registered had not received their lands. The evidence of their claims was ordered to be presented to Congress at the last session, but was not sent; and as the acting agent had gone on to render the sales, he hoped none of those who had legally availed themselves of the provisions of the treaty would be injured. The claim of a white citizen ought not to be disallowed, if it should be found that the Indians received all the advantages guaranteed to them by the treaty.

Mr. WHITE briefly explained that, under the fourteenth article of the treaty, no Indian was to receive a patent for his land unless he had resided on it for five years. He wished it to be understood that he did not intend to give any opinion on these claims in advance. There were none presented to be relied on, on which to found an opinion. But, as one of the Committee on Indian Affairs, he was determined not to permit any location of a white citizen unless he was satisfied that the full benefit of the reservation had resulted to the Indian.

The petition was then referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York; which was read twice.

Mr. W. stated that he should ask the Senate to act on this bill at an early day, perhaps to-morrow.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill making appropriation for suppressing the hostilities with the Seminole Indians, with an amendment.

Mr. W. explained briefly the necessity for acting on this bill at once, and stated that the amendment increased the appropriation from 80,000 to 120,000 dollars.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE.

Mr. CLAY rose and said it must be obvious to every observer of passing events, that our affairs with France are becoming every day more and more serious in their character, and are rapidly tending to a crisis. Mutual irritations are daily occurring, from the animadversions of the public press, and among individuals, in and out of office, in both countries; and a state of feeling, greatly to be deprecated, if we are to preserve the relations of peace, must certainly be the consequence.

According to the theory of our constitution, our diplomatic concerns with foreign countries are intrusted to the President of the United States, until they reach a certain point involving the question of peace or war, and then Congress is to determine on that momentous question. In other words, the President conducts our foreign intercourse; Congress alone can change that intercourse from a peaceable to a belligerent one. This right to decide the question of war carries along with it the right to know whatever has passed between our own Executive and the Government of any foreign Power. No matter what may be the nature of the correspondence—whether official or not—whether formal or informal—Congress has the right to any and all information whatever which may be in the possession of the other branch of the Government. No Senator here could have failed to have been acquainted with the fact that the contents of a most important despatch or document has been discussed, and a most important overture canvassed in the different newspapers—in private and political circles—by individuals: every body, in fact, knows what has taken place, except the Congress of the United States. The papers friendly to the administration—indeed, the whole circle of the American press—are in possession of the contents of a paper which this body has not been yet allowed to see; and I have one journal, a Southern administration journal, before me, which states a new and important fact in reference to it. I have said that our situation with France grows every day more embarrassing—the aspect of our relations with her more and more dark and threatening. I could not, therefore, longer delay in making the following motion. I should have done so before, but for a prevalent rumor that the President would soon make a communication to Congress, which would do away the necessity of the resolutions which I now submit, by laying before Congress the information which is the object of my motion. He has not, however, done so; and probably will not, without a call from the Senate.

Mr. C. then offered the following resolutions, which lie upon the table for one day:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate (if it be not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest) whether, since the termination of the last Congress, any overture, formal or informal, official or unofficial, has been made by the French Government to the Executive of the United States, to accommodate the difficulties between the two Governments respecting the execution of the convention of the 4th day of July, 1831; and, particularly, whether a despatch from the Duc de Broglie, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the French chargé de affaires at Washington, was read, and the original or a copy of it furnished by him to the Secretary of State, for the purpose of indicating a mode in which those difficulties might be removed.

Resolved, also, (under the restriction above mentioned,) in the event of any such overture having been made, that the President be requested to inform the Senate what answer was given to it; and if the original or a copy of any such despatch were received, that he be further requested to communicate a copy of it to the Senate.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. BENTON's resolution to appoint a special committee on the banks of the District of Columbia was taken up; when

Mr. SOUTHWARD made some observations in opposition to a special committee, intimating that the Committee for the District of Columbia might be instructed to make the inquiries.

After a few words from Mr. BENTON, in reply,

Mr. SOUTHWARD stated that he wished to prepare an amendment, and moved to lay, for the present, the resolution on the table; which motion was agreed to.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The motion of Mr. CALHOUN, not to receive the petitions from Ohio, coming up in order,

Mr. LEIGH said he proposed to make some remarks, and moved to postpone the subject until to-morrow; which was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE PATRONAGE.

The special order, being the bill to repeal the 1st and 2d sections of an act to limit the terms of office of certain officers therein named, was taken up; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and reported without amendment, after some remarks from Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. CUTHBERT.

Mr. WRIGHT asked for the yeas and nays on the question of the engrossment of the bill, and they were ordered accordingly.

The question was then taken on the engrossment of the bill for a third reading, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing, Goldsborough, Kent, King of Georgia, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Webster, White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Morris, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Wall, Wright—18.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 12.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York.

JAN. 12, 1836.]

The United States and France, &c.—Surplus Revenue, &c.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WEBSTER stated the character of the bill, of which the following is a copy:

A BILL for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York.

Be it enacted, &c., That the collector of the port of New York be, and he is hereby, authorized, as he may deem best calculated to secure the interests of the United States, to cause to be extended (with the assent of the securities thereon) to all persons who have suffered loss of property by the conflagration at that place, on the sixteenth day of December last, by the burning of their buildings or merchandise, the time of payment of all bonds heretofore given by them for duties, to periods not exceeding three, four, and five years, in equal instalments, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds; or to allow the said bonds to be cancelled, upon giving to said collector new bonds, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the said collector, for the sums of the former bonds, respectively, payable in equal instalments, in three, four, and five years from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds to be taken and cancelled as aforesaid; and the said collector is hereby authorized and directed to give up, or cancel, all such bonds, upon the receipt of others described in this section; which last-mentioned bonds shall be proceeded with, in all respects, like other bonds which are taken by collectors for duties due to the United States, and shall have the same force and validity: Provided, That those who are within the provision of this section, but who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the late fire, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid, and said payments refunded. And provided, also, That the benefits of this section shall not be extended to any person whose loss shall not be proved, to the satisfaction of the collector, to have exceeded the sum of one thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the collector of the port of New York is hereby authorized and directed to extend the payment, in the manner prescribed in the first section of this act, of all other bonds given for duties at the port of New York, prior to the late fire, and not provided for in the first section, as aforesaid, for six, nine, and twelve months from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the seventeenth day of December last.

Mr. CLAY made some objection to the bill in its present shape, but wished it to lie for examination; which was assented to; and, after a few words from Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. WEBSTER, was for the present laid on the table.

THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE, &c.

The resolutions offered yesterday by Mr. CLAY, calling on the Executive for information concerning our relations with France, having been taken up, as follows:

“Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate (if it be not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest) whether, since the termination of the last Congress, any overture, formal or informal, official or unofficial, has been made by the French Government to the Executive of the United States, to accommodate the difficulties between the two Governments respecting the execution of the convention of the 4th day of July, 1831; and, particularly, whether a despatch from the Duc de Broglie, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the French chargé de affaires at Washington, was read, and the original or a copy of it furnished by him to the Secretary of State, for the purpose of indicating a mode in which those difficulties might be removed.

Mr. LEIGH moved to amend the resolutions by adding the following:

Resolved, also, (under the restriction before mentioned,) That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the note of M. Serurier, mentioned in his message of the 25th February, 1835, and not then communicated, for reasons stated in the report of the Secretary of State to the President, of the same date.

The amendment was adopted, and the resolutions, as amended, were agreed to.

SURPLUS REVENUE, BANK STOCK, AND NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. BENTON, was taken up for consideration:

“Resolved, That the surplus revenue of the United States, and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States, ought to be set apart, and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the country. That the President be requested to cause the Senate to be informed—

“1. The probable amount that would be necessary for fortifying the lake, maritime, and gulf frontier of the United States, and such points of the land frontier as may require permanent fortifications.

“2. The probable amount that would be necessary to construct an adequate number of armories and arsenals in the United States, and to supply the States with field artillery, especially brass field pieces, for their militia, and with side arms and pistols for their cavalry.

“3. The probable amount that would be necessary to supply the United States with the ordnance, arms, and munitions of war, which a proper regard to self-defence would require to be always on hand.

“4. The probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam or floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and to the welfare of the Union.”

The resolution having been read,

Mr. BENTON rose and said that the objects contemplated by it were of a general and permanent nature, and required attention, without regard to existing circumstances. To place itself in a state of defence was the duty of all countries which desired to preserve their independence or to live with honor. The United States were not in a state of defence, and it was their duty to attend to that object. The present time was the proper time. The public debt was paid, a large surplus revenue was accumulating, and the country was every way prosperous. Projects were devised to distribute these surpluses among the States; but he was in favor of setting them apart, and dedicating them to the defence of the Union. Formerly, and by a law as old as the republic, these surpluses were all set apart, and constituted a separate fund, called the sinking fund, and invariably applied to the sacred purpose of extinguishing the national debt. By this means the debt has been paid. He was for reviving and continuing this policy, with a change of object, from the debt to the defences of the Union, and would wish to see all the surplus revenue take that direction, until the country was as secure from receiving, as it is averse from offering, offence. It would require all the surpluses, and many years of exertion, to accomplish the object.

Mr. B. repeated, his motion was for objects of a general and permanent character, and he felt it to be his duty to make it, without regard to impending events or to extrinsic circumstances. But there were events and circumstances which should give emphasis to his motion, and stimulate its immediate adoption. A French fleet of sixty vessels of war, to be followed by sixty more, now in commission, approaches our coast; and approaches it for the avowed purpose of observing our conduct in relation to France. It is styled in the French papers a squadron of observation; and we are sufficiently acquainted with the military vocabulary of France to know what that phrase means. In the days of the great Emperor, we were accustomed to see the armies which demolished empires at a blow wear that pacific title up to the moment that the blow was ready to be struck. These grand armies assembled on the frontiers of empires, gave emphasis to negotiation, and crushed what resisted. A squadron of observation, then, is a squadron of intimidation first, and of attack eventually; and nothing could be more palpable than that such was the character of the squadron in question. It leaves the French coast contemporaneously with the departure of our diplomatic agent, and the assembling of our Congress; it arrives upon our coast at the very moment that we shall have to vote upon French affairs; and it takes a position upon our Southern border—that border, above all others, on which we are, at this time, peculiarly sensitive to hostile approach.

What have we done, continued Mr. B., to draw this squadron upon us? We have done no wrong to France; we are making no preparations against her; and not even ordinary preparations for general and permanent security. We have treaties, and are executing them, even the treaty that she does not execute? We have been executing that treaty for five years, and may say that we have paid France as much under it as we have in vain demanded from her, as the first instalment of the indemnity; not, in fact, by taking money out of our treasury and delivering to her, but, what is better for her, namely, leaving her own money in her own hands, in the shape of diminished duties upon her wines, as provided for in this same treaty, which we execute, and which she does not. In this way France has gained one or two millions of dollars from us, besides the encouragement to her wine trade. On the article of silks she is also gaining money from us in the same way, not by treaty, but by law. Our discriminating duties in favor of silks from this side the Cape of Good Hope, operate almost entirely in her favor. Our great supplies of silks are from France, England, and China. In ten years, and under the operation of this discriminating duty, our imports of French silks have risen from two millions of dollars per annum to six millions and a half; from England, they have risen from a quarter of a million to three quarters; from China, they have sunk from three millions and a quarter to one million, and a quarter. This discriminating duty has left between one and two millions of dollars in the pockets of Frenchmen, besides the encouragement to the silk manufacture and trade. Why, then, has she sent this squadron, to observe us first, and to strike us eventually? She knows our pacific disposition towards her, not only from our own words and actions, but from the official report of her own officers; from the very officer sent out last spring, in a brig, to carry back the recalled minister. Here is his report, made to the Minister of Marine, and communicated to the Chamber of Deputies in the month of April last. Listen to it, and see how fully it establishes, not only our pacific dispositions towards France, but the affection of our citizens for her, and the solitude of our officers to honor her flag and gratify her feeling.

"BREST, April 4, 1835.

"I have the honor to inform you that the brig d'Assas sailed from New York on the 11th of March last, at the same time with the American packet ship Albany, in which M. Serurier and his family are returning to France, and arrived in the roads of Brest on the 14th of this month, after a passage of twenty-four days. I remained in the United States until the 11th of March, as the chargé d'affaires of France, at whose disposition your excellency placed me, did not wish to despatch me back until the rising of Congress, which took place on the 4th of that month. During my stay at New York, I found among the richest and best educated persons the greatest affection and sympathy for France; this they expressed to us by every possible attention and every delicate kindness which their hospitable dispositions could suggest. Half an hour after my leaving the East river, an American schooner of war, knowing the time at which I was to depart, got under sail; she crossed my way about a league from the place of anchorage, and when about two cables' length from us, she hoisted the French flag on her mizzen mast, and fired seven guns, which were immediately returned; she kept the tri-color flag flying as long as we were in sight. I then saw the American frigate Constitution, towed by two steamboats, on her way to New York; as soon as I crossed her, I saluted her commodore with thirteen guns, which he immediately returned, gun for gun."

Mr. B., resuming, said this was the report made to the French Government by a French officer, after the rise of the last session of Congress, and after the departure of M. Serurier; and how was it received in the Chamber of Deputies, to which it was communicated? He (Mr. B.) would show one example of the manner in which it was received, and for that purpose would read a paragraph from the speech of the deputy M. de Rance.

"Gentlemen, we should put on one side of the tribune the twenty-five millions, on the other the sword of France. When the Americans see this good long sword, this very long sword, gentlemen, (for it struck down every thing from Lisbon to Moscow,) they will perhaps recollect what it did for the independence of their country; they will, perhaps, too, reflect upon what it could do to support and avenge the honor and dignity of France, when outraged by an ungrateful people. [Cries of, well said!] Believe me, gentlemen, they would sooner touch your money than dare to touch your sword; and for your twenty-five millions they will bring you back the satisfactory receipt, which it is your duty to exact. [Great approbation from the extremities.]"

Another deputy, M. Fleury de Chabaulon, allowed himself to discourse thus:

"The insult of President Jackson comes from himself only. This is more evident, from the refusal of the American Congress to concur with him in it. The French Chamber, by interfering, would render the affair more serious, and make its arrangement more difficult, and even dangerous. Let us put the case to ourselves. Suppose the United States had taken part with General Jackson, we should have had to demand satisfaction not from him, but from the United States; and instead of now talking about negotiation, we should have had to make appropriations for a war, and to intrust to our heroes of Navarino and Algiers the task of teaching the Americans that France knows the way to Washington as well as England."

This was the language of the deputies, and it was thus received with applauses, and that six weeks after the rise of our Congress, which had shown itself pacific, and two weeks after the report of the captain of the brig

Surplus Revenue, &c.

d'Assas, attesting the friendship of our feelings, and the readiness of our officers to salute, with honor, the flag of France. And this language was not only received with applause in the Chamber, but it has been acted upon by the French Government. Two royal ordinances have appeared in the Moniteur, under date of the 2d of December last; and, under these ordinances, Admiral Mackau is to take command of the "squadron of observation," which was immediately to proceed to the West Indies; and the Constitutionnel, which is the demi-official paper of the Government, and nearly equal in authority to the Moniteur, after stating that this measure was warranted by the actual state of the difficulties with the United States, goes on to "applaud the Government for thus preparing, long beforehand, and concentrating the power in the hands of one who is firm, and capable of using it to advantage when necessary." Thus, "the language of the deputies and the conduct of the Government correspond; and the fleet must now be approaching our coast, which bears that long sword, at the sight of which our terrified hearts and faltering tongues must deliver the satisfactory answer which French chivalry exacts.

Mr. B. said he had never spoken unkindly of the French nation, neither in his place here as a Senator, nor in his private capacity elsewhere. Born since the American Revolution, bred up in habitual affection for the French name, coming upon the stage of life when the glories of the republic and of the empire were filling the world and dazzling the imagination, politically connected with the party which, a few years ago, was called French, his bosom had glowed with admiration for that people, and youthful affection had ripened into manly friendship. He would not now permit himself to speak unkindly, much less to use epithets; but he could not avoid fixing his attention upon the reason assigned in the Constitutionnel for the present advance of the French squadron upon us. That reason is this: "America will have no force capable of being opposed to it." This is the reason. Our nakedness, our destitution, has drawn upon us the honor of this visit; and we are now to speak, and vote, and so to demean ourselves, as men standing in the presence of a force which they cannot resist, and which had taught the lesson of submission to the Turk and the Arab! And here I change the theme; I turn from French intimidation to American legislation; and I ask how it comes that we have no force to oppose to this squadron which comes here to take a position upon our borders, and to show us that it knows the way to Washington as well as the English? This is my future theme; and I have to present the American Senate as the responsible party for leaving our country in this wretched condition. First, there is the three million appropriation which was lost by the opposition of the Senate, and which carried down with it the whole fortification bill, to which it was attached. That bill, besides the three millions, contained thirteen specific appropriations for works of defence, part originating in the House of Representatives, and part in the Senate, and the particulars of which he would read:

For the fort on George's island,	-	$15,000
For the repairs of Fort Independence,	-	8,000
For Fort Adams,	-	100,000

All these specific appropriations, continued Mr. B., were lost in the bill which was sunk by the opposition of the Senate to the three millions, which were attached to it by the House of Representatives. He (Mr. B.) was not a member of the conference committee which had the disagreement of the two Houses committed to its charge, and could go into no detail as to what happened in that conference; he took his stand upon the palpable ground that the opposition which the Senate made to the three million appropriation, the speeches which denounced it, and the prolonged invectives against the President, which inflamed the passions and consumed the precious time at the last moment of the session, were the true causes of the loss of that bill; and so leaves the responsibility for the loss on the shoulders of the Senate.

Of this three million appropriation, Mr. B. said, the country had heard much; but there was another material appropriation lost in the Senate, of which nothing had been said: he alluded to the sum of $500,000, which originated in the Senate's Committee on Military Affairs, and which, as the chairman of that committee, and under its direction, he had recommended in a report, and proposed as an amendment to the same fortification bill, which was afterwards sunk under the three millions. The report was made on the 18th of February, and he would read it.

"The Senate's Committee on Military Affairs, which has had the subject under consideration, report;

"That it is expedient to increase the appropriations heretofore made for the national defence; and that, in addition to the sums now contained in that bill for fortifications, and in addition to the two sums of $100,000, each heretofore recommended by this committee to be inserted in the said bill for fortifications, and the armament thereof, the further sum of five hundred thousand dollars be recommended to be inserted therein, for the repair, completion, and construction, of fortifications, and to provide the necessary armament therefor. And the committee have directed their chairman to move an amendment accordingly, at the proper time, to the fortification appropriation bill."

The motion was made in the Senate to insert this appropriation of $500,000. The sense of the Senate was so clearly against it, that he (Mr. B.) did not press it, nor call for a division. It was rejected when offered; and thus the Senate, some days before they objected to the three millions as being too large and general, had rejected a much smaller appropriation, and one that was specific.

The third act of the Senate which Mr. B. brought forward to establish the responsibility of the Senate for the present condition of the country, and the consequent visit of the French fleet, was the fact of laying on the table, and refusing even to consider, a resolution which he brought forward about the middle of February, calling on the President for plans and estimates for the general and permanent defence of the country by sea and land. It was a call for plans and estimates and probable amounts of surplus revenue, with the sole view to the defence of the country; yet it was laid upon the table by the vote of the majority, and upon the motion of an opposition Senator; and, of all the acts of the Senate, it seemed to him to be the one which went farthest in showing the indisposition of this body to provide for the defence of the country. It was not merely a refusal to apply money, but a refusal to have information by which money could be applied, and that while making it a standing topic of reproach that the President had not furnished plans and estimates.

The fourth circumstance on which Mr. B. relied to show that the Senate was responsible for the present naked and defenceless condition of the country, and for the humiliation to which we were now subjected in being superintended by the heroes of Algiers and Navarino, the project of certain Senators to apply the public moneys in a different direction, namely, to divide them among the States, and which required them to keep the sum for distribution as large as possible, in order to present captivating dividends to each distributee. The plan of putting the country in a posture of defence was incompatible with these plans of distributing the revenues. The two plans cannot go on together; one or the other must give away, and he had purposely drawn the resolution under consideration to make an issue between them, and to draw the line between those who will put their country in a state of defence, and those who will leave it naked and helpless.

Surplus Revenue, &c.

Mr. B. had felt it his duty to bring to the notice of the Senate the approach of the French squadron of observation, and to show that it came because "America had no force capable of being opposed to it." It was a subsidiary argument, and a fair illustration of the dangers and humiliations of a defenceless position. It should stimulate us to instant and vigorous action; to the concentration of all our money, and all our hands, to the sacred task of national defence. For himself, he did not believe there would be war, because he knew that there ought not to be war; but that belief would have no effect upon his conduct. He went for national defence, because that policy was right in itself, without regard to times and circumstances. He went for it now, because it was the response, and the only response, which American honor could give to the visit of Admiral Mackau. Above all, he went for it because it was the way, and the only manly way, of letting France know that she had committed a mistake in sending this fleet upon us. In conclusion, he would call for the yeas and nays, and remark that our votes would have to be given under the guns of France, and under the eyes of Europe.

Mr. WEBSTER said his duty was to take care that neither in nor out of the Senate there should be any mistake, the effect of which should be to produce an impression unfavorable or reproachful to the character and patriotism of the American people. He remembered the progress of that bill, (the bill alluded to by Mr. BENTON,) the incidents of its history, and the real cause of its loss. And he would satisfy any man that the loss of it was not attributable to any member or officer of the Senate. He would not, however, do so until the Senate should again have been in session on executive business. As soon as that took place, he should undertake to show that it was not to any dereliction of duty on the part of the Senate that the loss of that bill was to be attributed.

Mr. LEIGH said there was one or two facts in relation to this matter to which he would call the particular attention of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] Mr. L. referred to a report of the Committee on Military Affairs, at the last session, on the expediency of providing for fortifications. He did not understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] to say that that specific report was rejected. He (Mr. L.) understood it was rejected with other appropriations.

[Mr. BENTON explained.]

Mr. L. continued. I have, said he, a particular recollection. My mind was attracted to the subject by the quarrel going on between France and the United States. He expected some means to be resorted to in order to strengthen the national arm. The bill to strengthen the fortifications of the country had passed the House of Representatives on the 24th day of February, and so anxious was his mind on the subject, that he went to the Secretary's table to examine whether particular appropriations were in the bill. He found none. The Committee on Finance reported a series of amendments to the bill, in no case diminishing appropriations, in some cases increasing them, and in some instances making entirely new appropriations. All the gentlemen of the Senate with whom he had familiar conversations, would remember his frequent expression of anxiety on the subject of this bill. It was sent back by the other House with agreements and disagreements to the Senate's amendments. He did not now recollect to which. After five o'clock in the evening of the 3d of March, this bill was reported to the Senate. They had joint conferences with the different Departments on those new appropriations, and came to the conclusion to retain all the new appropriations. An amendment containing an appropriation of $3,000,000, to be used under the direction of the President of the United States, provided such expense was necessary to the defence of the country, was in it after it was returned from the House of Representatives. The objection to the appropriation was not on account of any distrust to the President. No, sir, said he, it was merely as to the constitutionality of it. The Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House; the House insisted, and refused to recede. He alluded to a practice of changing the time of the clock on the last night of the session, and not relying upon it, he took out his watch and ascertained by it, if it did not deceive him, that the committee of conference on the part of the Senate went out before eleven o'clock; and, said he, here we sat until twelve o'clock at night, waiting for their report. They sent a messenger to keep the House in mind of the appropriation bill. For what reason the House did not take up the report of the committee of conference, it would be improper, indecent, and disorderly, in him to state. He had stated the facts, and every member who was present would remember them as stated.

Mr. PRESTON said the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LEIGH] had given a very clear view of the facts. He (Mr. P.) did not feel called upon to explain, because he had voted for the rejection of a bill containing an undefined appropriation of $3,000,000. It was enough for him to know that it was an unconstitutional and indefinite appropriation, and dangerous to be put into the hands of the Executive. He would go further. If, instead of these vague rumors about the movements of the French fleet, the whole frontier had been laid in ruins, he would have voted against it. How was it that this appropriation had been sprung upon them? They were not called upon for it by the proper department, and he did not feel called upon without the department, whose business it was to make the recommendations requiring such appropriations. He was not then disposed to take the responsibility for what belonged to the proper departments, and he was not now disposed to do it. Under the better opportunities of the Executive to acquire information, it was the duty of the department to keep the Senate informed of the necessity and object of appropriations, and until that was done, the Senate was not bound to act. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had introduced a resolution for the distribution of the surplus revenue, arising from the sales of the public lands, and his colleague, the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, had reported a bill for the appropriation of the balance of the surplus revenue, for purposes that were defined. But, in this case, the appropriation is first made, and then the Executive is to be asked how much is necessary. You appropriate thirty millions, and the Executive says five millions is all that is wanted, what becomes of the rest? From these vague rumors, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had taken occasion to remark that he desired the exterior of the United States put into a state of defence.

Suspension of Indian Hostilities—Sufferers by Fire in New York.

[SENATE.]

In all this he concurred. Every Senator had concurred in general appropriations to put the navy and army in a state of defence. This undefined appropriation was not the only exception. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] had said this appropriation was intended to operate as a permanent defence. He would ask, for what purpose was this French fleet coming on our coast? Had he said for what purpose were they coming? Why were the breezes bringing this great armament? If they were coming in hostile array, why are we (said Mr. P.) kept in the dark by the President of the United States? They had been looking, anxiously looking, for a message from the President, whether these newspaper rumors respecting this fleet of observation were true.

The President ought to know—it was his duty to know. He trusted, however, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] had superseded the functions of the President. Could it be for the purpose of overawing them out of their votes that this alarm had been raised? France, our former ally, he believed, did not doubt our valor. He believed she had a due respect for us. Why, sir, said Mr. P., do they think that the approximation of a fleet of France can alarm us into a vote? No, sir, said he, we would cover ourselves with a panoply for our mutual defence. The President of the United States, in his message, had informed them that he had ordered the representative of this country in France (Mr. Barton) to receive the money due to us, or ask for his passports to return to the United States. We were not now represented in either England or France. He did not say, however, that we were cut off from all intercourse in England as in France.

The President had recommended making reprisals, if France refused payment. France had refused, but the remedy was not pursued. It may be, said he, that this fleet is merely coming to protect the commerce of France. If the President of the United States, at the last session of Congress, had suggested the necessity of making this appropriation, we would have poured out the treasury; we would have filled his hands for all necessary purposes. There was one hundred thousand dollars appropriated that had not been called for. He did not know whether he was permitted to go any further and say to what extent any of the departments were disposed to go in this matter. At the opening of this session the President in his message entered into a detail of our affairs with France, and promised us, on the return of Mr. Barton, a special message. Mr. Barton had returned, if they were to rely upon the same source of intelligence upon which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] had relied. We are asked, why has the Senate not done its duty? I ask, said Mr. P., why the President has not done his duty? The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] had preferred a general indictment against the Senate before the people of the United States. It was strange the gentleman should ask the departments for calculations to enable us to know how much was necessary to appropriate, when the information was not given to us when we rejected the undefined appropriations.

I rejoice, said Mr. P., that the gentleman has said even to my fears there will be no French war. France was not going to squabble with America on a little point of honor, that might do for duellists to quarrel about, but not for nations.

There was no reason why blood should be poured out like water in righting this point of honor. If this matter was placed on its proper basis, his hopes would be lit up into a blaze of confidence. Who were the plaintiffs in this case? Not France. We are the plaintiffs. France is the defendant. If a ca. sa. should issue, it would be to levy upon the goods and chattels of France, or, in case of her insolvency, to levy on the body of Louis Philippe. No, sir, said he, we shall have no war with France. I can imagine a state of things, said Mr. P., calculated to make a war inevitable.

If the Senate had wandered so far from its duties as had been intimated, and a war was to be waged with the Senate, that might make a war with France. But God forbid that such a state of things should exist. If a war of partnership was to be waged, he deplored the consequences. He hoped no measures would be adopted here that would lead to a war with France.

If the real cause of apprehensions should occur, he hoped for unanimity. Whether the resolution of the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BEXTON,] the propositions of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] or from his colleague, [Mr. CALHOUN,] should be taken up first, he would leave to be settled between them.

Mr. CLAYTON was surprised at the suggestion of an idea that the American Senate was not disposed to make the necessary preparations for the defence of the country; that they had endeavored to prevent the passage of a bill, the object of which was to make provision for large appropriations for our defence. The Senator from Missouri had gone into a liberal attack of the Senate. He (Mr. C.) was not disposed to say any thing further of the events of the last night of the session. He took occasion to say there were other matters in connexion with this appropriation. Before any department or any friend of the administration had named an appropriation for defence, he made the motion to appropriate five hundred thousand dollars. It was on his motion that the Committee on Military Affairs made the appropriation to increase the fortifications. Actuated by the very same motives which induced him to move that appropriation, he had moved an additional appropriation to Fort Delaware. The motion was to increase the seventy-five thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand, and elicited a protracted debate. The next question was, whether, in the general bill, five hundred thousand dollars should be appropriated. He recollected the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance told them there was an amendment before that committee of similar tenor. As chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, he felt disinclined to give it up. The amendment fell on the single ground, by one vote, that the Committee on Finance had before it the identical proposition made by the Committee on Military Affairs. He appealed to the country whether, under those circumstances, they were to be arraigned before the people of the country on a charge of a want of patriotism. He had always felt deeply affected when those general remarks were made impugning the motives of patriotism of the Senators. He was willing to go as far as he who goes farthest in making appropriations for the national protection. Nay, he would be in advance of the administration.

On motion of Mr. EWING, and without taking the question on the resolution,

The Senate adjourned.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. WRIGHT moved the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in the city of New York.

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

[JAN. 13, 1836.]

Mr. CALHOUN moved to strike out from the bill the second section. He was opposed to all that did not provide for the actual sufferers. He was opposed to becoming the general insurers for all losses, whether of an agricultural, manufacturing, or commercial community.

Mr. WRIGHT held in his hand a statement, showing the amount of bonds for duties to be three millions six hundred thousand dollars. Mr. W. said, if the second section should be stricken out, relief would then be extended to only a portion of the sufferers.

Mr. CLAY did not like either of the sections, and perhaps it was not possible to prepare one to meet the views of all the other gentlemen of the Senate. He had, however, prepared two sections to meet his views, and wished the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to withdraw his amendment for the present, in order that he might introduce them. He objected to the bill, as reported, on account of the inequality of its operation. The second section of the bill, as reported, provided for cases where no loss had been incurred by the persons who were to have the benefits of it. The mercantile community of New York were exceedingly sensitive, and the distinction taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] was entirely too refined. It was an old saying, that there was no friendship in trade. By their reported bill, relief was extended to all persons who had imported goods in the port of New York. Suppose (said Mr. C.) there are other persons who import in New York, not citizens of that place, persons from Philadelphia, were they to be excluded from the benefits of the provisions of the bill? It is said (continued Mr. C.) that the Government may give relief to this man or to that man, as the case may seem to require. It was the want of universality in the bill that made it objectionable to him. He did not consider this like the case of a poor debtor, whose debt the Government were likely to lose. Here Mr. C. submitted his amendments, as follows:

1. That, in all cases where merchandise was consumed by fire in the city of New York on the 16th and 17th of December, 1835, the duties paid or accruing thereon shall be refunded or remitted, under such rules and regulations, in regard to evidence, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; provided that the total amount to be allowed under the act shall not exceed ——— dollars. And if the amount of the aforesaid duties shall be ascertained to exceed that sum, it shall be divided between the sufferers ratably, in proportion to their respective losses.

2. That in all cases of bonds taken prior to the aforesaid fire, for duties on merchandise imported into the port of New York, by persons who have suffered loss by the said fire, in the destruction of their buildings or effects, to the amount of their respective bonds, it shall be lawful, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to extend the time of payment of the aforesaid bonds to three, four, and five years, in equal instalments, with the assent of the securities, or to take new bonds, with sufficient surety or sureties; provided that no such indulgence shall be given in the case of any bond which had fallen due before the fire aforesaid.

Which being read, he resumed:

If we had a Government warehouse system introduced, and the Government had lost the goods, there would be no doubt of the liability and power. The amendment he had offered would employ the vigilance of the merchants who had actually sustained losses, to prevent frauds upon the munificence of the Government. They would know, through the entries and clerks in the custom-house, and the regulations of the port of entry, when fraudulent attempts were made to consume the sum appropriated for their benefit. There were cases which the bill might not meet; but, in a general provision of this kind, it was not to be expected that every case would be provided for.

Mr. WRIGHT said he has compelled to trouble the Senate with a very few remarks, and he found himself very delicately situated, if he correctly understood the state of the question. To make himself sure upon that point, he would ask if he was right in supposing that the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had withdrawn his motion to strike out the second section of the bill. [Mr. CALHOUN signified that he had withdrawn the motion.] Mr. W. continued. He said the question was then upon the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] which was virtually to remit the duty upon the goods burned. This was part of the relief prayed for by the citizens of New York, in the memorial in their behalf which had been presented to the Senate; but a relief separate and distinct from that provided for in the bill under discussion. This bill merely provided for forbearance of the debts due to the Government for duties, in consequence of the calamitous fire. Another bill, he felt authorized to say, would be presented, or would come from the other branch of Congress, proposing a remission or refunding of the duties upon the burned goods, and the delicacy of the situation of himself and his colleague arose from the fact that, if they should vote against the amendment now proposed, providing for this relief, they would be subject to the misrepresentation and misconstruction of voting against that part of the relief prayed for by their constituents; while, if they voted for the amendment, they necessarily, by its adoption, denied what he considered the more general, and, so far as that whole great commercial community was concerned, more important relief of a forbearance of payment of the outstanding duty bonds.

In this position, he knew but one course; and that was to pursue singly the object proposed by the bill before the Senate, and to postpone to some future occasion the remaining wishes of the sufferers. He would say, however, that neither himself nor his colleague had made up their minds that the relief proposed by the amendment could not be properly extended, and their votes against the amendment must be understood merely to indicate that they were unwilling to substitute that measure of relief for the one provided for in the bill, and not that they were unwilling to grant both; not that they were opposed to the principle of the amendment, but that they could not consent to adopt it at the expense of sacrificing another measure of relief equally important, and, in their judgment, more clear from objection.

Mr. W. said he was not disposed to disguise or deny that the bill before the Senate granted to the merchants of New York the use, without interest, of an amount of capital equal to the amount of bonds the payment of which was forborne, and for a time equal to that forbearance. This he understood to be the object of the bill. An immense amount of the capital of that commercial city had been annihilated by the fire. Property of the value of between seventeen and eighteen million had been entirely destroyed in the period of a few hours, and he had supposed the object of the bill was, by a forbearance of payment upon the duty bonds, to give to the city the temporary use of that portion of the capital thus destroyed. In that case, but about one fifth of the loss would be thus supplied, and that would be done without asking the Government to give one cent beyond the mere use of this portion of its dues for a very short period. The whole amount of bonds to be extended by the bill exceeded by a very trifle $3,600,000, and a very large portion, more than two thirds of the whole amount, were only to be forborne for six, nine, and twelve months.

He asked if this small measure of relief was not due to the occasion. Every man within the hearing of his voice could appreciate the condition of such a community under such a loss of property. Every one must see that the business of that city could not go on without material and substantial relief, or without immense changes among the business men. Every one must feel that hundreds upon hundreds of the most respectable and enterprising of the merchants of the city must be entirely ruined, unless some relief, speedy and efficient, shall be afforded.

Still, Mr. W. said, he announced to the Senate with the most heart-felt and proud gratification, that, as yet, not a single mercantile failure had been the consequence of this unexampled calamity. Why, he would ask, was he able to state this singular and cheering fact? Because every effort of enterprise and faithfulness had been brought into action, while hope, confident hope—the last support which leaves the sinking and despairing man—had hung upon the prompt and favorable action of Congress, of the State Legislature, and of the corporate authorities of the city, to sustain those exertions until the future operations of trade might enable the worthy sufferers so far to retrieve their losses as to be enabled to pay their debts, not only to their neighbors, but to the Government; and thus save the city from a scene of wide-spread and fatal bankruptcy, the extent of which, if ever it commences, no human foresight can measure.

What, then, (said Mr. W.) is asked by this bill in furtherance of an object so important to that great commercial emporium, to its neighboring commercial cities, indeed, to the whole country? A mere forbearance of payment upon debts due to the Government, to the amount of three millions and a half of dollars, and upon more than two thirds of that sum for a very limited period: six, nine, and twelve months. Might he not, then, hope that opposition would be withdrawn, and that this extension of credit would be given without further delay.

He felt bound to repeat to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] and to the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that propositions, embracing precisely the principles contained in the amendment proposed by the former gentleman as a substitute for this bill, will be laid before Congress. He would further say that the question of a remission or refunding of the duties upon burned goods had been one of doubt and difficulty. It had, to a greater or less extent, occupied the attention of Congress from the commencement of the Government to the present time; and although he could not say that a uniformity of action would be found upon it, he believed he was right in the assertion that no remission had taken place upon such an application for many years now last past. He regarded that proposition of relief, therefore, as one of doubtful result, and certainly calculated to excite long debate, and to occupy much time, if ultimately successful. The present measure was not of that character, but was the one which had been uniformly adopted in such cases; and for that reason had been put forward now, under the hope that it would not only meet the approbation of Congress, but its prompt adoption.

Any objection, however, to the second section of the bill, of this character, might be easily removed by an amendment which should make that section general, and applicable to all the outstanding duty bonds taken at all the ports of the country. It was not for him to object to such an amendment. The bill, in that shape, would be made more acceptable to his suffering constituents, because relief to any commercial town in the country would consequently relieve the suffering city, whose interests it was his duty to represent in this debate. The present state of the national treasury would permit the extension of time upon the existing duty bonds, without injury to the fiscal operations of the Government, and if any member of the Senate would propose such an amendment to the second section of the bill, he should most cheerfully assent to it. He had not felt, and the committee from New York representing the interests of its citizens had not felt, at liberty to ask that the bill should be extended beyond the suffering port; but he could not be mistaken in saying that, if made general, it would be even more acceptable, and more beneficial to that city than in its present shape.

But, Mr. W. said, the adoption of the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] as a substitute for this bill, would not afford the relief required. He feared the honorable Senator himself was not aware of the practical effect of the proposition. What did he suppose would be the extent of the relief it would afford? He (Mr. W.) was able to say, from the information given to him by the intelligent gentlemen who composed the committee from New York, that it could not exceed a million and a half of dollars; that the whole amount of duties to be remitted or refunded upon burned goods, in case that measure should be adopted according to the prayer of the memorial, could not greatly exceed that sum. This would furnish great, and, in many instances, effectual relief to the immediate sufferers by the fire; but it would be, more properly speaking, individual than general; it would act more emphatically upon individuals than upon that great trading and commercial community; it would distribute eventually, and when the extent of the claims could be ascertained, a large sum of money among the actual sufferers who were importers and dealers in dutiable goods, and in that sense was a most desirable measure of relief. The bill before the Senate, however, had a larger scope, and proposed to accomplish a more general object. It proposed to relieve, so far as forbearance of payment could do it, the whole city; it was not opposed to the measure of relief provided for by the amendment, but independent of it; it was more speedy in its influence, and consequently would be more instantly beneficial.

Mr. W. said it was not by any thing we could give that he expected business in that great commercial emporium would be continued without fatal interruption; it had become embarrassed by an unprecedented destruction of property, sweeping from thousands of individuals, as it were, instantly, the means of paying their debts and discharging their obligations of a pecuniary character. The Government was a creditor to more than three and a half millions of dollars. We have our hand upon these oppressed merchants, and unless we raise it, by an extension of time for the payment of this great sum of money; if we enforce payment in this hour of their affliction, hope must desert them, and mercantile failures must commence, the extent of which no human foresight can measure. Will not the Senate, then, consent to the forbearance proposed by this bill, and leave for future consideration the relief provided for in the amendment?

Time, Mr. W. said, was every thing to the suffering merchants. He had been informed, by the respectable committee who were here to represent their interests, that something like $40,000 in amount of these bonds were falling due daily; while a provision in the revenue laws positively prohibits the entering of goods by, and the reception of new bonds from, a merchant whose former bond is due and unpaid in the hands of the collector. Importations ordered before the fire are daily arriving, and men whose all has been consumed are compelled to raise the means to pay their existing bonds, to enable them to enter the goods thus received. Delay, then, in the extension of the credits proposed by this bill, might cause a commencement of mercantile failures, which, once commenced, could not be calculated, either as to their extent or number, or as to their effect upon the general mercantile community of the country. He did hope, therefore, that the bill might be acted upon without delay, and without being connected with other propositions of a more questionable character.

He never spoke of legislative precedents as binding upon legislative bodies, but he did speak of them as worthy of the most grave consideration when they were found to be uniform, and not conflicting with principle. He feared that the proposition to remit the duties upon the burned goods would be found to be against the precedents and practice of the Government for many years last past, and for that reason his own efforts, with that of the committee representing the citizens of New York, have been to have this bill presented by itself, disconnected from any such debatable question. It had been so presented by the Committee on Finance, and he hoped it would not now be exchanged for so doubtful a mode of relief, by the adoption of the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAR,] or in any way connected with that question. He wished each measure of relief prayed for in the New York memorial might be acted upon separately and independently by Congress, and he must entreat the Senate to adopt or reject the proposition to extend the time for the payment of the duty bonds, and not to change it for another, and he feared it would prove a less acceptable proposition.

Mr. W. said it had been objected to the second section of the bill, that it was unconstitutional, as being within the meaning of the constitution, a regulation of commerce or revenue, not general to all the ports of the country, but partial, and proposing to give an advantage to the port of New York. He could not himself see any force in the objection. He could not view the bill as a regulation of commerce or revenue, in any manner to affect importations hereafter to be made, or the revenue to be collected from such importations. It was a mere regulation between the Government and a certain portion of its debtors, whose means of payment had been swept away by a fire unexampled upon this continent in its extent, and the destruction of property it had caused. Could any gentleman consider a simple forbearance of payment to debtors thus circumstanced as a regulation of commerce or revenue, and, as such, partial, unequal, and unconstitutional? He could not think so, and surely he was entirely unable to see how this position was to be maintained by gentlemen who proposed to remit the duties upon the burned goods, and thus not to forbear payment upon the bonds merely, but to give them up to be cancelled without payment. He must suppose that, if Congress possessed the power to forbear payment upon any bonds taken for duties, they possessed equal power, so far as the constitution was concerned, over all bonds so taken; and certainly he could not comprehend how it could be constitutional to give up a bond to be cancelled without payment, and unconstitutional to forbear payment upon that same bond for a term of years, or a few months, giving nothing but the use of the money.

Mr. W. said he had already observed that he did not quote legislative precedents as binding upon legislative bodies, but that he did refer to them as worthy of high regard in cases where the power to act was clear, and the practice of Congress had been uniform and long sanctioned. In that sense he was bound to refer to several acts of Congress applicable to cases of the nature, but not of the extent, of the case under consideration. These acts spread over a period from 1803 to 1820, and the relief afforded by each was an extension of time to the debtors of the Government for the payment of their duty bonds. The acts to which he would refer were—

An act for the relief of the sufferers by the fire at Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, in 1803;

An act for the relief of the sufferers by the fire at the same place, in 1807;

An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire at Norfolk, in the State of Virginia, in 1804;

An act for the relief of the sufferers by the fire at Savannah, in the State of Georgia, in 1820;

Together with sundry private acts for similar relief in individual cases of loss by fire. It was a duty he owed to the Committee on Finance, of which he was a member, to refer to these precedents as their justification in presenting the bill before the Senate. He was not aware that any question of partiality or favoritism towards these afflicted ports had been raised, or that it had been for one moment supposed by any person that these laws were infractions of the constitution, or that they disturbed, in any sense, the equality of the regulations of commerce or revenue. He would add no more upon this point, but, with a single other remark, would submit the bill to the judgment and justice of the Senate.

Was it not for the interest of the Government to grant this extension? The means of its debtors to pay had been swept away by the fire. Still they were struggling, by every effort which enterprise and courage could command, to sustain themselves, to sustain their credit as merchants, and to avoid bankruptcy, until the regular restoration of business and the gains of trade should enable them to pay their debts. If, in this state of things, we press them with demands for immediate payment of our $3,600,000 of bonds, is there not greater danger of loss to us than if we give them time, and permit them to make the struggle which they are now making with so much credit to themselves and to the mercantile character? He would give it as his most deliberate opinion, that the bill was rather calculated to contribute to the security of the Government than to subject it to a loss, and that it should be passed as a measure calculated to benefit the treasury, even if the sufferers were not to be regarded.

Mr. EWING confessed that his doubts had not been removed by the observations of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. He believed that if the extension were made general, it would be considered a regulation in relation to revenue. If, as a general proposition, then, said Mr. E., it would be considered as a regulation, in relation to revenue, when you make the extension apply to a particular port, contrary to that provision of the constitution before referred to, this regulation applies to the port of New York alone, and gives that port a preference over other ports of the Union. The fire in New York gave Congress no power it did not possess before. Then, suppose there had been no fire there, and a bill was brought in to extend the credit on duty bonds, one, two, three, four, or five years, touching New York, and no other city, would it not then be contended that you were giving a preference to New York over the other ports of the Union? The fact that there was a fire did not change the nature of the case at all. You are, said Mr. E., giving advantages to New York not given to others. It appeared to him that there were strong constitutional objections to the bill, and he therefore could not vote for it. He would with pleasure give it his support, if these constitutional objections were removed. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky was equally objectionable.

Mr. WEBSTER did not go for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.] It resolved itself into a question of constitutional power. Seeing a practice of the Government for a period of twenty years, we should be cautious, said Mr. W., in hazarding an opinion against it. How did it happen that bills in 1803, in 1804, and 1820, of similar tenor, passed Congress, and the question of unconstitutionality had not been discovered till this time? Was this a law to regulate revenue, because it finds certain debtors to the Government, and gives them time? Was that a regulation of the revenue of the Government? The constitution goes on, said Mr. W., enumerating certain powers and restrictions. Congress had a right to regulate commerce with foreign Powers. It conferred no power to give a preference to importations in one State over another. In this provision it had clearly a prospective view. A man has a bond to pay, and Congress gives him time. Was this regulating the revenue of the country? On the ground of prudence, he thought the bill ought to be passed. It was an act of prudence for the Government to give relief, as a prudent creditor. A prudent creditor would always give time, rather than incur the risk of losing his debt. With respect to the proposition intended to be introduced in place of this bill, first, it provides for a return of duties, and an appropriation of a million and a half of dollars. That law must find out the loss. Here is a man, said he, who has received the amount of insurance on his goods; should he receive the relief? He did not say that was a case that might not be provided for; but it was a case that was not provided for. It was said that the original bill was unequal in its operations. He did not consider it a case of right; and it was, therefore, not necessary that an exact amount should be made to each, according to his loss. If it should be more favorable to some than to others, no one had a right to complain. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] seemed to regard this matter as a release. He thought the true state of the case had been stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT.] It was not a release, but an indulgence.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, had no hesitation in saying that if there was any seaport of this Union deserving the special favor of Congress, it was the port of New York. But on this as well as on all other occasions, we should, said he, act on principle. The principle they should act on with regard to this bill was one which should govern them on all subsequent occasions of the like nature. The danger was of establishing a precedent which they might hereafter be called on to follow. On the subject of constitutional power alone, he confessed he had no difficulties. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had put that question on its true grounds. We are, said he, dealing a creditor with our debtors, and we have the power to grant them the indulgence contemplated in the bill. But, said Mr. K., we should not on all occasions use the power we possess without due caution, lest we abuse it. The second section of the bill was liable to serious objections. It provided not only to extend the credit on the bonds of those who had suffered by the fire in New York, but on all other bonds. It might be carried over the whole continent. The credit might be extended to Liverpool, to Lyons, and to Leeds. The great difficulty was to extend the bounty of the Government to those who were the proper objects of its bounty, and not to those who had no claims on it. Now, as far as New York was concerned, he ventured to say that not one in a hundred would be the actual losers by the fire. Do we not know, said he, that the abstraction of so many goods from the market will raise the value of the rest? The value of the goods remaining on hand, then, will be enhanced, and though some few may suffer bankruptcy, the mass will be benefited by their speculations. These results operated against the second section of the bill, and supported the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] to strike out that section. The Senator from Massachusetts agreed that it would be a matter of prudence in Congress, as creditors, to extend the credit on the debts due them; but by what stretch of argument could the Senator make this apply to the provision in the first section of the bill, which renews bonds already paid. The arrangement that gentlemen contended for, was, as that of a prudent creditor to secure his debt. The first section was as follows: "Provided, that those who are in the provision of this section, but who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the late fire, should also be entitled to the benefit of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid, and said payments refunded;" that is to say, said Mr. K., that we are to take money out of our pockets, and lend it for four or five years without interest, for the purpose of securing our debt. He admitted that the Senator from Massachusetts was perfectly correct in his constitutional argument, but he thought there should be some reasonable affinity between the measures to be adopted, and the end to be attained. He asked, therefore, if the bill was the prudent measure of a prudent creditor to secure his debt. He should vote against the second section, which extended the credit on the bonds of those who had not suffered by the fire, and should also move to strike out that provision of the first section which refunds the money and renews the bonds already paid. With these changes, he would vote for the bill.

Mr. MANGUM was decidedly against the propositions to amend the bill. There was no gentleman there prepared to say what would be the scope of its influence, or the amount of money necessary to meet the cases that would occur. Both the gentlemen who had proposed amendments assumed the constitutional power of releasing entirely. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce had announced that if the power to release the whole could be assumed, we are well warranted in assuming the fact, that for the safety of the debt, we are justified in giving an extension of time. In a conference of the Committee on Finance, they had come to that conclusion. This Government had one precedent much stronger than any one that had been referred to. It was the case of the earthquake in Virginia, in the days of her greatness. He should vote for it, on the ground that it was to afford present and immediate relief to the whole commercial community in the city of New York, and to others in different parts of the country. The relief would be afforded to the whole community. Was it not compatible with the beneficence of the Government to extend relief wherever it could be done constitutionally? He thought relief could be best administered according to the opinion of those who best understood the nature and extent of the calamity; and he would vote against every amendment that was offered. Did the constitution justify it? He did not doubt it. Did the finances of the country justify it? They did, French war or no French war.

Mr. LEIGH rose to state his impressions on the constitutional question that had been presented. It was of no importance to any body but himself, but he wished that his opinion should be understood, or rather that it should not be misunderstood. The constitution provided that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." And it was objected to this bill, and especially to the second section, that it made a regulation of revenue favorable to the merchants of New York, and not applicable to any other port. Now, the word "regulation," the phrase "regulation of commerce or revenue," meant general provision of law applicable to all cases of the like kind. The gentleman from Kentucky, sensible that generality of provision is essential to the idea of regulation by law, said that there was such generality here; that the provisions of this bill applied to all the merchants of New York. [Mr. CLAY explained. He had said that they applied to all the importers of New York.] Mr. L. said the difference, in his view of the question, was not material. The bill proposed to relieve the importers who suffered directly by the late fire, and the other importers, as consequentially implicated with those who suffered directly; it was probable, almost inevitable, that the other importers were implicated in so extensive and heavy a calamity. The relief was to be given by an extension of credit for the duties. This, he thought, was not the more a regulation of commerce or revenue, because of the number of persons to whom the relief was extended. If that were so, the importers of New York would, in consequence of their vast numbers, be least of all importers entitled to such relief.

He thought that if this bill, instead of being confined to relief on account of the particular calamity that had befallen New York, had been extended to all cases of the like kind that should hereafter occur there, as well as that which had occurred, this would have been such a regulation of commerce or revenue, partial to that city, as the constitution interdicted. But this bill provided relief for a particular case of calamity, though that calamity involved very many. Therefore, in his judgment, the bill was not obnoxious to the constitutional objection. The gentleman from Kentucky had made some very imposing observations, which had made no slight impression on his mind, as to the unequal operation of the provisions of the bill; but Mr. L. apprehended it would be found impossible to frame any provisions for such a purpose, which would not operate unequally; and he doubted very much whether any could be devised that would operate more equally and fairly than those proposed by this bill.

Mr. DAVIS believed there was a uniform desire in the Senate to afford relief, provided it could be done consistently with other duties. The bill purported to be a bill for the relief of sufferers by fire. He had some objections to the bill, but he would not say that he would vote against it. It was his purpose at present to throw out some objections that had occurred to him. Gentlemen argued that the bill was not to relieve sufferers by fire, but to relieve the commercial community. If so, then the title was wrong. Do you, said he, propose that persons who have lost merchandise and property shall receive an extension of credit on bonds for duties? We had lately introduced a more speedy method for the collection of duties. But by this bill the time of collection was to be extended for four or five years, without paying interest. Who were those gentlemen to be benefited? The object all suppose to be for the relief of citizens of the city of New York. But a great amount of these goods were imported by foreigners. Suppose a man has his goods insured in Liverpool, is he entitled to your beneficence? He would ask what proportion of this property was of foreign manufacture, and what proportion of American? You do not, said he, propose to give relief to the American manufacturer. You extend it to a class of persons who have not asked it. It was not the principle he complained of, it was the great inequality of distributing the relief. You place (said Mr. D.) a fund in the hands of individuals who have not suffered, and to whom it is clear gain. As to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] to extend this relief to the whole country, it was more objectionable than the other. Here was a great suffering they all knew of. Among those sufferers a large proportion were Americans. By adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] you propose to throw into the hands of foreign persons a large amount to inundate the country with goods.

Mr. WEBSTER said a few words in reply to his colleague, [Mr. DAVIS.] The suffering of the commercial community was great and was general, and his colleague well understood how, in such a community, the losses of one affected another. In a large community, mixed up of buyers and venders, importers and retailers, all must have suffered more or less in such a calamity as that at New York. Were those alone who came there the actual sufferers by this fire? The Senate would see that if the actual sufferers alone were interested, they would be debating about returning the duties on the burnt goods, whereas they were discussing a bill to relieve the commercial community. The application was in behalf of the whole commercial community; those who were scorched, as well as those who were not. Did any man doubt that there were hundreds of sufferers, who did not lose a bale of goods, or the most inconsiderable tenement? While his colleague objected to this bill, he had not pointed out a more appropriate mode of relief. This bill was a mode of relief which operated on the whole community, though perhaps more on some than on others. It extended to those who had domestic goods, and to those who had suffered by the fire; and those whose warehouses were full of domestic goods would be among the most anxious to get this bill passed, in order to sustain the credit of those with whom they are connected in trade.

Mr. NILES rose to say that he had prepared an amendment, which he intended to offer if the several amendments then under consideration should not be adopted. He had listened with attention and with profit, so far as his own action on the bill might be concerned, to this discussion; he felt that there was much weight in some of the objections which had been urged against the bill by the honorable gentlemen from Kentucky and Massachusetts, [Mr. CLAY and Mr. DAVIS,] and the amendment which he had prepared would, he thought, remove some of those objections.

[Mr. N. here read his amendment, which was a proviso to the bill to secure the payment of interest on the bonds, the payment of which was to be extended.]

There are two questions arising upon this bill: one, whether the relief it provides is reasonable, and adapted to the case; and whether it is equitable and just in its distribution, so far as it is to benefit individuals. He thought there were objections to this part of the bill, and its benefits would probably be very unequally distributed; and what gave more force to this objection was the fact, that the greatest benefit would be shared by those least entitled to it, by the large and wealthy importers. What is the object of this bill, and the nature of the relief it provides for? It is the extension of credit to the merchants who are the debtors of the United States for duties. It is not, as I understood, the object of the bill to remit any part of them. It seems not to be designed to afford any pecuniary relief, further than by the extension of credit. This being the object of the bill, he was not willing to give it an operation by which it might put large sums of money into the pockets of merchants. All who have sustained a loss to the amount of $1,000 will be entitled to an extension of three, four, and five years' credit, on their bonds, without interest, so that a merchant having bonds to the amount of $50,000, and having lost 1,000, would by this bill be a gainer to the amount of several thousand dollars.

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

There was another question in relation to this bill, which was, whether there was any constitutional or other general principle which stood in its way.

He had no difficulty as to the constitutional question which had been raised; he had felt no doubts at first on this point, and if he had they would have been removed by the lucid, and, to his mind, conclusive argument of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] But this bill was by no means free from objection in regard to the principle on which it rests. This bill is a case of special or partial legislation to which I have a strong objection, as all special laws conferring either rights or immunities, or other benefits, on particular individuals, must operate in derogation of the common rights and interests of the community. The law will, as has been observed, act on the debtors of the United States, yet not upon any general principle; it will not operate on all the public debtors, nor on all of any general class, as the debtors for the purchase of the public lands, or the debtors for duties on imported goods; but its operation will be local, and confined to a particular description of debtors in a single seaport. This is, therefore, a clear case of partial legislation, and objectionable in principle. The question in my mind is, whether the extraordinary circumstances of this case are such as to form an exception to a sound general principle. If there can be any exception to this principle, (and I am not prepared to say there cannot be,) this case must be one. It is not necessary to enlarge on that terrible calamity, or the consequences of it, which in one night laid in desolation a large portion of our greatest commercial city. I consider this, sir, an extraordinary case, and I am therefore prepared to vote for this bill, although it will require a departure from a sound principle which I am extremely unwilling to disregard.

Mr. BUCHANAN said it had not been his intention to say a single word upon this question. He would not do so now, but he distinctly perceived, if the friends of the bill yielded to any one of the amendments which had been proposed, the bill was lost. We must take the bill as it now is, or none. For his own part, he took a much more liberal view of the question than some of those gentlemen who had addressed the Senate. What was the state of the case? On the 16th of December last, a capital of between seventeen and eighteen millions of dollars had been in one day annihilated by fire, in our greatest commercial emporium. Notwithstanding this calamity, not a single failure had since taken place among the merchants of that city. He would say that he did not believe the history of the commercial world presented an example of such punctuality, and such ability to comply with all engagements, in the midst of such distress. It was highly honorable, not only to New York, but to the American character. At the time of this destructive fire, the merchants of that city were indebted to the United States about $3,600,000. And what does this bill, first and second sections and all, propose? To give them this amount, or any part of it? No, sir. All that is asked is, that you shall not, in the midst of their distress, extort this sum from them; which, at this moment, may save them from insolvency and ruin, for the purpose of placing it in an overflowing treasury, where it is not wanted. You are only asked to grant these suffering merchants time to pay this money, provided they give you ample security that the money shall be paid. Is there a single Senator who would not most cheerfully comply with this request, if he did not believe the constitution to be in his way? Not one. He certainly should not go into the argument of the constitutional question, after what had already been said. He felt confident that a large majority of the Senate were already convinced that the constitution had nothing to do with the question.

After the merchant had entered his goods at the custom-house, and given bonds for the payment of the duties, he became a debtor to the Government, with whom we might make any fair and reasonable terms, as we may do, and have done, with our other debtors. This, he was very clearly of opinion, would not be giving any preference, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another.

What is the present condition of the mercantile community of New York? He had observed in the late public journals that money was now worth one, one and a half, and two per cent. a month. The pressure was very great. The present state of tension could not long endure. Without some relief, some speedy relief, it was probable the merchants must yield. Let a single failure take place to the amount of a million, half a million, or a quarter of a million, and, in its consequences, it would produce such ruin in New York as would be felt to the very extremities of the Union. We might then see that the forbearance which the bill proposes to extend to the merchants is the very best bargain for ourselves which we can make.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has proposed, as a substitute for this bill, the remission of the duties upon the goods destroyed by fire. In this proposition he entirely concurred. He had always been of opinion that, when merchandise had been destroyed by fire before it had gone into the consumption of the country, the Government ought not to exact the duties. He certainly, however, could not vote that the gentleman's amendment should take the place of the bill; and more especially, as a remission of duties on goods destroyed by fire was a distinct mode of relief, asked for by the citizens of New York, which would yet come before the Senate.

To the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] he would say that he felt as friendly to American manufactures and American manufacturers as he or any other gentleman could do, and would go as far to relieve them. But what can we do for them on the present occasion? We have not the power to do any thing. And shall we, because we cannot do all the good we desire, do nothing at all? He trusted this bill would pass without any amendment.

Mr. CLAY said he perceived, what he was not aware of when he offered his amendment; [Mr. C. here mentioned some new light in which the matter had presented itself to his mind, not distinctly heard or understood by the reporter;] and as there seemed to be a general disposition to grant the relief asked for, he would withdraw the amendment he had offered.

Mr. TYLER considered it rather supererogatory to extend this discussion further. But, as a member of the Committee on Finance, he had found in investigating the matter that it had been the uniform practice of the Government to extend indulgence to its debtors. He found, in the year 1803, an act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in Norfolk, and the first section of this bill was like it. He could not go against this bill, when his own fellow-citizens of Virginia had been relieved in precisely the same case. Mr. T. mentioned the names of the committee to whom it had been referred in the Senate; and, said he, in the House of Representatives, Mr. Randolph was chairman of the committee who reported it, who was always attached to strict construction of the constitution, and it was approved by Thomas Jefferson; with these precedents before him, added to the convictions produced by the arguments of the gentlemen who had advocated the passage of the bill, he could not vote against it. Mr. T. spoke of the respective merits of the first and second sections of the bill. It afforded relief to the whole commercial community involved in this sweeping calamity; said he, it is not alone the drawer, it is the endorser, who stands in danger of losing the amount. The effect reached, to a great extent, every person in the commercial community. There was one difference between the precedent he had cited and this bill. There it was not limited as this was. In this bill they had extended a guard over it, and, as it now stood, it was better guarded than the bill granting relief to the sufferers at Portsmouth and Norfolk.

Mr. HENDRICKS observed that it was obvious that the bill would be reported to the Senate without amendment, and that he was prepared to vote for it as it was. He would resist all amendments that might be offered, believing that they would only tend to prolong discussion and embarrass the passage of the bill.

Mr. EWING thought it necessary to say a word or two in relation to the first section, before taking the question on his amendment, as it was supposed there might be some discrepancy between them which might be removed by another amendment he would then suggest. The first section of the bill provided that the collector of the port of New York should be authorized to extend the credit on the bonds, payable in New York, of those who had suffered by the fire. Now, he proposed that each collector, in the different ports of the United States, should have the same authority given him. It would have this effect. It would operate in favor of none who had not suffered by the fire, and it would not give a preference to one port over another. To illustrate this, he would state a case. A and B are sufferers by the fire in New York, and both have bonds becoming due; the one resides in New York and the other in Philadelphia, so that the bill extends relief to the first and not to the last. Now, he would ask, what good reason there was for making this distinction? The amendments he had suggested would remove all his constitutional objections to the bill, and, if made, it would give him pleasure to vote for it.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had listened with great attention to those gentlemen who had taken part in this debate, but his objections to the second section still remained unchanged. It was admitted on all hands that this second section contained a novel principle, and that no precedent for it was to be found on our statute books. Here indulgence was extended to those who had not suffered by the fire, and the argument in support of it was that it was not a regulation as to revenue, but that we were as creditors dealing with our debtors. But might not this apply as well when the commercial community of a city had suffered by any other calamity, by the breakage of banks, or by shipwrecks? You may at no time (said Mr. C.) say that this particular city has suffered and we must extend relief to it. Let it be recollected that it was not for the misfortunes of small towns that so much sympathy was excited; but that the calamities of large cities create an excitement which is apt to cause the constitution to be overlooked, and a dangerous precedent established by giving a preference to that city over the other ports of the Union. You must (said Mr. C.) extend relief only to those who have suffered, or you will establish, a dangerous precedent. He felt deeply for the losses sustained by this great commercial city, and he would with the greatest pleasure vote for the bill if its objectionable features were removed; but principle with him was stronger than feeling, and he was compelled to oppose it. He was not sent there to exercise his sympathies, but for a higher purpose. He would much prefer leaving this money in the hands of the merchants to placing it in the monopolizing banks, which made such great profits by the use of it; for he believed the merchants would make a better use of it. He would vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, but even if that prevailed he must vote against the bill, unless his objections to the second section were removed.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, was entirely at a loss to see what it was that caused the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to deprecate the principle of the Government extending relief to sufferers by fire or earthquakes. Had they not a constitutional power of extending relief to them? He had no constitutional difficulties in his way, and would not for his part inquire whether the right to legislate upon the subject had been established by precedent or not. He consulted his own common sense upon the subject. He had no doubt that granting the relief asked for was a duty they owed to themselves, to the country, and to the sufferers in this great calamity that had befallen that noble city. He would go as far as any one in support of the measure. He would not withhold the relief under technical objections. It was true he would prefer confining the relief to American citizens alone; and the objections suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] had some weight with him. But he was not going to oppose the bill because he did not see its operations in all its complex and intricate bearings. The commercial connexion was ramified and extensive in its character. Touch one single street in this great commercial emporium—touch Wall street—and you give a shock to the whole country. He should vote for the bill.

The question was then taken on Mr. EWING's amendment, and lost, without a division.

Mr. WHITE had intended to vote for this bill, and as the yeas and nays were called on the amendment by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] he would state the reasons why he should vote against it. The first section provided relief for those who had actually suffered by the fire, and the second section gave relief to those who had suffered a consequential loss. Now, was it possible that they had the power to indulge their debtors in the first case and not in the second? Here a great calamity had befallen a great city, and they were asked not to forgive the debts of those indebted to them, but to grant indulgence by extending the time of payment to those who had actually suffered by this great calamity. This was proposed to be done by the first section. There was another class of debtors, said Mr. W., not immediately sufferers, and we apply to them for payment; they answer that they have lost by those who have suffered by the fire, and that if we do not indulge them also, they would be put to great inconvenience and distress. The loss of the one class as much deserved relief as the other; for, in such a calamity, no man could tell how far the losses extended. He confessed he had no hesitation in extending relief in both cases, and he had no constitutional scruples as to the bill. Suppose the case of the commercial community suffering by the breaking out of a war, or great losses have been occasioned by inundations of the Mississippi. One half of your debtors under such circumstances apply for relief, and you grant it; the other half tell you that they have suffered as much in consequence of the losses sustained by those to whom you have granted relief; how would you make the distinction between them? As there was a direct loss, and also a probable loss in consequence of it, they had a right to grant the relief, and he was prepared to vote for the bill, and against the amendment.

Mr. PRESTON said the second section of the bill was virtually a regulation of commerce, and gave a preference over the port of New York. It was, therefore, to his mind, unconstitutional, and he could not vote for it. Mr. P. read the clause of the constitution on that subject, which says, "no preference shall be given by any regulations of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said it was perfectly apparent that the Senate intended to pass this bill without any amendment. With all his heart would he make up this whole loss of seventeen millions to the city of New York, if it could be done without any dangerous consequences. It had been said that this bill was intended to extend relief to those who had suffered by the fire, and not to operate as a bounty to those who had sustained no loss. It had been stated that the capital of New York was increased in value; that was one argument used to hurry the passage of the bill. It was admitted on all hands that the rate of interest had increased, in addition to the enhanced value of goods. This, however, was not what he rose to speak of. He rose to fulfil his promise, to submit an amendment striking out the proviso in the first section to which he had before referred.

Mr. K. here read the proviso, as follows:

"Provided, That those who are within the provision of this section, but who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the late fire, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid, and said payments refunded."

This was taking money out of the treasury to lend for three, four, and five years, without interest, and had been characterized by a Senator from Massachusetts as the measure of a prudent creditor to secure his debt. Now, he asked, did not this debt lose its character eo instanti, from the very moment it was paid. So soon as the debt came into the treasury, it was the property of the United States, and they had just about as much right to lend it as to lend the whole seventeen millions that had been lost by the fire.

Mr. K. then moved to amend the bill by striking out the proviso in the first section above quoted.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had but a single remark to make. To adopt this amendment would be to punish those merchants who had paid their bonds punctually notwithstanding the distress, and to place them in a worse situation than others who had been either unable or unwilling to pay. This he could never consent to do.

The question being taken on Mr. KING's motion, it was lost without a division.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after remaining a short time with doors closed,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in New York, which yesterday passed to its third reading. The bill was read a third time, and passed, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that the House had appointed a Committee on Enrolled Bills on the part of the House.

The Senate concurred, and the Chair was directed to appoint a committee on the part of the Senate; whereupon, Mr. NAUDAIN and Mr. NILES were appointed.

ANTI-SLAVERY PETITIONS.

The motion of Mr. CALHOUN, that the petitions from Ohio praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be not received, was taken up.

Mr. RUGGLES suggested the propriety of dividing the question on the petitions, and taking the vote separately upon them.

Mr. WEBSTER, in reference to the time of day, said it would, in a few minutes, be time to pass to the unfinished business, which was the special order of the day, and expressed a hope that this course would be adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. LEIGH expressed a wish to know at what precise time this subject would be again taken up, as he was desirous to make some remarks on the subject.

The CHAIR said it would stand the first in the ordinary business of the morning.

The subject was, by unanimous consent, passed over.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The Senate took up Mr. BENTON's resolution to appropriate the surplus revenues for purposes of national defence.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, the resolutions which gave rise to the discussion a day or two since, and which are now before the Senate, have been almost wholly lost sight of, and the debate has turned upon matters relating to them but incidentally. Those matters I shall not overlook in the remarks which I propose to offer to the Senate; but I will in the first place give my views of the resolutions themselves, or rather of the resolution; for I deem the first only of importance, and shall consider that only.

This resolution proposes to set apart the surplus revenue now on hand, and, as I understand it—for it is not very definite in its language—the accruing surplus for the future, to be applied to the purposes of national defence. Now, before I vote for this resolution, I wish to have a definite idea of its meaning—not a vague, confused notion of something about it that may or may not be well enough; but I must understand it, especially the important words which are the substance, the very body and soul, of the resolution; that is, the surplus revenue; what is it?

It certainly is not any thing that is wanted for the purposes of Government, which are, I believe, generally, the civil list, foreign intercourse, military service, including the building and arming fortresses, &c., and the naval service, including the gradual improvement of the navy. These, if not all, are some of the ordinary expenditures of the Government; and so long as any money is wanting for these, there can be no surplus revenue; and if an extraordinary occasion should arise when it was necessary to summon and concentrate all our energies upon any of these objects of expenditure, there could be no "surplus revenue" until that necessity was met and satisfied. This, then, seems to me to be the interpretation of the resolution: After we have expended all the money that it is necessary to expend, or which can be expended upon our fortifications and our navy, we will set apart all the residue of our available means, to be applied to the same objects.

Mr. President, I am in favor of making as perfect as possible our national defences, and will go as far as any gentleman to effect that object: but I must go about it, if at all, in the ordinary and legitimate mode of legislation. I am not disposed to consider that a thing to be done only when we have nothing else to do—a matter to spend money on, instead of a necessary duty to be performed. I would appropriate, not out of the surplus, but out of the revenue of the nation, so much as is necessary, and as can be applied and expended advantageously, from year to year, upon these objects; but, having done all that was necessary, I would not by resolution determine to expend or to set apart all the residue of our national funds to those objects, however important, after they have been fully answered. Nor am I disposed, in this matter of public defence, to thrust the Senate in advance of the Executive, or to lend my aid in enabling Congress to usurp this important function of the Chief Magistrate of the Union.

The President is commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States; as such, it is his duty to see that they are at all times well appointed, and in a situation to perform the services which the exigencies of the times may require of them. If money is necessary to finish or to repair our forts, to arm, to man them, or to erect new ones, it is from him that this information should come to us, and we cannot properly act upon it coming from any other source. Nay, the constitution enjoins on him the duty of communicating such matters to Congress.

“He shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.”

If, then, he deems it necessary or expedient that appropriations of public money should be made for our fortifications or our navy, let him tell us so; and not tell us, in the language of this resolution, that he wants all we have, or all the surplus; but let him—as all his predecessors have done—let him tell us the amount wanted, and which can be expended advantageously upon these objects—the specific objects to which it ought to be applied—and I, for one, will go far, very far, in the way of appropriation, to satisfy all his requisitions.

I am opposed to this resolution for another reason. Its prime object does not seem to be the defence of the country, but the expenditure of the surplus revenue. It is not offered because a fort is wanting here, or a fleet there, to guard our coast or protect our commerce. It is because we have plenty of money, and this is a good way to get rid of it. The object, then, being chiefly to spend money, and but as an incident to build fortifications, it must be expected that those who shall have the charge of it will pay special attention to their principal duty—spend it fully and effectually—spend much money, though they may build but few ships or fortresses. But it seems this resolution is not of itself an appropriation; it merely declares that the whole surplus revenue—the twenty millions of money now in the hands of the Executive, and the accruing surplus—shall be set apart for this purpose. It, then, amounts to this; that this money shall remain where it is, in the coffers of a few favorite banks, to be used by them to increase their dividends, until, some eight or ten years hence, it can be appropriated, and some four or five years thereafter expended upon our navy or our fortifications.

I have said that I am prepared to go very far, as far as may be within any reasonable bounds, in voting appropriations for our fortifications and navy; but to all this, however proper and necessary, there is a limit, which it is injurious to the very object to pass. If there be an attempt to apply too much money to these objects, and hasten them overmuch, you necessarily intrust their execution, in part, to incompetent engineers or superintendents. You have to employ inferior workmen, and to use defective materials; so that the very object of our solicitude sustains injury from the effort to urge it forward too rapidly. But if this large and sweeping appropriation be made, and the President take the necessary time to apply it, what is the effect? It places the whole surplus revenue at once in his hands by law. It is out of the ordinary control of Congress, or, more properly, in a situation in which Congress has not generally exercised a control over it, and there it would remain for years; the unexpended balances in the hands of the Executive rising from eight millions, the present amount in hand, to twenty, thirty, or forty millions of dollars. This would be equivalent to a law that the President should deposit the public money where he pleased, and the accumulating surplus should remain, to an indefinite period, subject to his disposition and control.

It will not soon be forgotten that the ordinary appropriation for fortifications failed the last year in the House of Representatives; for what reason I shall not just now inquire. Yet, notwithstanding this, the balance of old appropriations was not all expended. The whole amount of unexpended appropriations on hand is stated by the Secretary of the Treasury at $7,595,574. That part of this is of the appropriations for fortifications I infer from the fact that, in the report of the Secretary of War, he states, as an excuse for the slow progress made in some of the fortifications, that mechanics and laborers could not be procured to perform the work. If we should now appropriate the whole surplus revenue of twenty millions, how many years would it remain on hand unexpended, swelling the fortunes of the favored capitalist, or ready for use as the convenient instrument of corruption?

But the Senator from Missouri tells us that the seaboard is defenceless, that our forts are unfinished or dismantled, and our navy unfit for service. He has drawn an appalling picture of the wretched state of these our arms of defence, which clearly indicates somewhere a degree of shameful negligence or mismanagement; and where does this heavy responsibility rest?

The present Chief Magistrate, and those who act with him, have held the control of this Government for now almost seven full years. At the time they received it from the hands of their predecessors, no complaint was made of the state of the defences of the country; nor do I believe there was then any reason for such complaint. They were in a state of steady and regular improvement, gradually becoming all that was necessary for the security of the country. Why are they now in the miserable condition described? Why have they been for so many years neglected by this administration, which has been all-powerful in the nation, and which has possessed a treasury full even to redundancy? Has the Senate interposed to prevent appropriations for these objects? No, never—never, within my knowledge and recollection, in a single instance. No appropriation which was asked for by the Executive for these objects has, as far as I know, been withheld, diminished, or given grudgingly, by this body. Why, then, is this the state of our country at this time, if indeed it be so? Sir, here is the solution: This has been an administration whose capacities and whose powers have been fitted and directed to pulling down every thing and to building up nothing. Look around throughout the country, and see if there is a single monument, a great and important monument, raised by it, or founded by it, to rise hereafter, and extend its beneficence to future times. But it has been successful in the works of destruction. One after another the institutions of the country have been made to fall or totter before it; but nothing has been built up, nothing strengthened, save only the executive power itself. There was no time to erect fortifications; to build, to equip, or to repair our ships; our foreign defences occupied no portion of the attention of our Executive or his Departments. And the consequence seems to be—what any one might have predicted—our seaboard is now defenceless, and subject to the mercy of the first Power that may see fit to attack us.

But the Senate of the United States are charged here, upon their own floor, and by a member of their own body, with high crimes against their country, because of this unprotected state of our maritime frontier; as if we were to go in advance of the Executive, to procure for him and hunt out the objects of necessity, and offer him appropriations, and ask him to expend them. But the last session of the Senate was the one in which many and heavy crimes are said to have been committed, in the refusal of appropriations. The Senator has produced here a schedule setting out, one after another, a list of our misdemeanors; and first, is our refusal to pass, last winter, a resolution similar to that which is now under consideration. He might have spared himself the trouble of enumerating this; for, unless I am deceived, he will soon have another instance, a fresh repetition, of the same offence.

Sir, anxious as I was, and as I am, that the necessary defences of the country should be duly and promptly attended to, I did not and I will not vote for this crude, unformed, and shapeless proposition, nor any other like absurdity, though it may seem to tend to the effecting of a desirable object. I require something more—not merely that the object be a good one, but that the means of effecting it be appropriate. But I let this go for what it is worth, and proceed to the next specification. The Senate is charged with having put down an amendment which the Senator from Missouri proposed last winter to the fortification bill, containing an additional appropriation of $500,000. This matter is one of which I have no recollection whatever. It appears that the proposition was made by the honorable Senator from Missouri by order of the Committee on Military Affairs; and my honorable friend from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] has already put that matter at rest, in the brief but forcible exposition which he gave us of it the other day. The Senator from Missouri gave up the point, and admitted, most expressly, that, though he presented the proposition, he abandoned it on a suggestion; and such I see, on inspection of the papers of that day, was the fact. It is reported shortly, thus:

“Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by inserting an additional appropriation of $500,000.

“At the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER, the consideration of this amendment was waived by Mr. BENTON for the present.”

So that, on a conversation between the Senator from Missouri and the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the honorable Senator, in effect, withdrew his proposition; and he has now charged this Senate with a dereliction of duty, and a want of patriotism, because we did not adopt the measure, which he presented, it is true, but put out of our power by virtually withdrawing it. What did we know of the necessity or the propriety of his proposition? He who presented it did not explain it, did not press it, did not ask for its adoption, but expressly declared that he would not press it, which on this floor is equivalent to saying that he did not wish it to be adopted. It is most unfortunate that the Senator from Missouri did not recollect the actual state of things before he advanced this, among the other grave charges against the Senate. It is true, as I have already said, that when this special matter was commented upon by the Senator from Delaware, the gentleman from Missouri gave it up, and admitted that it was he, and not the Senate, that had disposed of that proposition. But all who understand the tactics of the party press know that his charge will be sent abroad throughout the whole land, so far as a newspaper circulates, but the refutation of the charge, and the admission that it was unfounded and mistaken, will never find its place in one of them—no, not one; and the honest yeomanry of the country, who read and believe, will be led thereby to suppose a state of things existed which did not in fact exist, and be led to an unjust and injurious censure of the conduct of some of their public agents. It is therefore unfortunate that the honorable Senator had not better refreshed his recollection before he made this accusation. This is the second specification in his bill of indictment against the Senate; but, lastly, and chiefly, the loss of the fortification bill of last year, the whole blame of which he very liberally and generously takes upon this body. Let us look to it; it is easy to make charges, with or without foundation; and in this case, fortunately, the proof is at hand, and is direct, clear, and conclusive. This is the history of the transaction: The fortification bill was passed in the House on the 21st day of January, and on the same day sent to the Senate. The relations of our country with France were upon that day precisely the same as they were on the 3d of March, at the close of the session. The bill at that time contained no appropriation of three millions for the general purpose of defence; and, if it had been deemed necessary, can any one doubt that it would have been inserted by a committee in the confidence of the Executive, and by a House devoted to his interests? But no such thing. The bill came to this body containing appropriations for fortifications to the amount of about $450,000; an amount evidently too small for the energetic prosecution of the works on hand. The Committee on Finance, to whom this bill was referred, detained it for some time, that information might be obtained which would enable them to supply the deficiencies of the bill, and make it what it ought to have been when it came to us from the House. I can say, sir, for I was then a member of that committee, that it appeared to be the anxious wish of the chairman, as well as of all the other members, to do every thing that could be done to supply the deficiency arising from the neglect or inaction of the other branch of Congress, and to make up to the public service what they had left deficient. The bill was reported back with various amendments, increasing the appropriations about two hundred thousand dollars. With these amendments, it was returned to the House on the 24th day of February, where it slumbered until just at the close of the session, at a late hour of the last evening. Until that hour we had supposed the amendments of the Senate had been agreed to by the House, and that the bill had become, or was about to become, a law, without any further action on our part; but on the evening of the 3d of March, after the Senate had taken its recess, and after the chamber was lighted up for the night, in the midst of multifarious and pressing business, both legislative and executive, which was then crowded upon us, this bill was returned to us from the House, with an amendment to one of the amendments of the Senate, appropriating the round sum of three millions of dollars, “to be expended in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications, and ordnance, and increase of the navy”—an amendment giving $3,000,000, attached to an amendment making an appropriation of perhaps $75,000—thrust in upon us here in the very last moments of the session—no time left for deliberation, none for reference, none to enable us to modify or amend; it involved, in the very nature of things, immediate acceptance or immediate rejection. Waiving for a moment the decisive objection growing out of a solemn requisition of the constitution, what was there as a matter of expediency which could permit us to accept it? It was not recommended to us or asked for by the President; he had sent us no message—informed us of no public necessity that required it—expressed no wish that it should be made. It was not an ordinary appropriation; for all that was ordinary and in the usual course of the Government had been already hunted up by the committees of the Senate, and inserted in that or other bills, in place or out of place, wherever we could put them, so that the wheels of Government should not stop. This amendment was sent to us by the House, but on whose responsibility? It was first acted on there in Committee of the Whole on the 3d of March, and passed, with little examination or discussion. We had not even the authority of that body, such as it would have been had their vote passed upon deliberation, with time for discussion. Under these circumstances, I say, without hesitation, it is my firm belief that those who caused that amendment to be inserted knew that it would not pass this body, and did not intend that it should pass it. The very sum appropriated—the time which was chosen to send it to the Senate—the necessity of passing it, if at all, out of all the rules and without the application of any of the guards which legislative bodies never can properly dispense with in the appropriation of public money—must have satisfied those who controlled this matter, and who gave it movement and direction, that it must be rejected by the Senate. But, lest there should be any doubt on the subject, lest it might have taken it with all the objections to which it was otherwise liable, it was sent to us in a form, and in substance too, violatory of the spirit of the constitution. It would have been an appropriation in form, but not in fact. It would have been voting money generally into the hands of the President, to appropriate as he might think fit, provided it were applied for the purposes of national defence. And it would have been putting it in the power of the President to raise an army, to make and to carry on war, without the further aid or interposition of Congress. I do not believe, sir, that any man who reasoned could think for a moment that that measure could or ought to pass this body; and I am yet to be convinced that the friends of the administration here would have given it their votes, if they had believed that their votes would have made it a law. They would at least have weighed well the matter, much better than they could have weighed it during the hour that it was pending here, before they would have assumed the responsibility which the passage of that measure involved.

But, sir, it was rejected. I do not stand here to defend myself for the part I took in its rejection, nor to apologize for the act. I stand ready now, and at all times, to proclaim the participation which I had in it—to claim it as one of the good works which I have helped to perform; and to avow that the like, come when it will, or where it will, before me as a subject for my action, will meet a like immediate and indignant rejection.

But, sir, the bill to which this three millions is an amendment was also lost. How, sir, and where? Not in the Senate. The bill was perfectly safe, if the House chose that it should be so, after the rejection of this amendment. It was returned to them much better than when they first sent it to the Senate—with much more extensive appropriations for our national defence; and that body had nothing to do, in order to make it a law, but pass the bill when returned to them, without the amendment which the Senate had rejected. This they did not do. They asked for a conference, which was at once conceded. The conferees met, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance returned in a few moments, and reported an agreement to strike out the three millions, and appropriate $300,000 for the increase of the navy, and $500,000 additional for the repairing and arming our fortifications. The bill was still in the hands of the House of Representatives, and it was in their power still to have made it a law in a few moments' time—a law with the addition of $800,000 to the ordinary appropriations, and with a full million added to the original bill as they had sent it to the Senate. We waited until late at night, and the bill was not named in their body again. Message after message came to us, but this came not. Before the session closed, a message was sent by this body to the House, respectfully reminding them of the bill, and the agreement of the committee of conference. It was read in the House, but no answer was returned. There sleeps the bill, and there let it sleep for ever. And if any evil has happened or shall happen to the country, for the want of the appropriations which it contained, let the censure of the nation fall, I care not how heavily, on those who contrived and produced its loss.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, said, when these resolutions and inquiries were first presented to the Senate, he regarded them as matters of business, as measures designed to have a bearing upon the great national interests. But his surprise was not greater than the mortification he felt, when he found that the whole was made conducive to a vituperative and indecorous attack upon this Senate. Nor were these feelings at all allayed when he heard from the lips of the mover of the resolutions, accompanied with an air of menace, that the accusation thus made should be made known to the people. That what should be made known to the people? That the Senator from Missouri charged the Senate of the United States of faithlessness to their duty—of a total disregard of the national security and defence; and that it was owing to their opposition to the grant of three millions, sent in the last night of the session as an amendment to the fortification bill, that the United States have not now a fleet upon the ocean equal to that which he represents as about to be sent from France upon our coast to overawe the councils of the country.

Now, sir, as to this unjust and gross accusation, my reply is, distinctly, that it is wholly unfaithful to the history of the proceedings in the Senate, and unfounded, in letter and in spirit.

Before he made any further remark upon this accusation, and the circumstances supposed to lead to it, he would advert to the paper on the table, containing the resolutions and inquiries, and would still continue to treat it as a matter of national concern. If the subject before the Senate is really intended for defence, he would endeavor to make it stronger; if a matter of national interest, he wished to make it more national; and if it is designed to be adopted, he flattered himself that the amendment he held in his hand, and which he would read as part of his remarks, will secure it greater strength in the Senate.

Strike out all of the first resolution after the word Resolved, and insert, That the general defence and permanent security of the country are principal objects of the national care, and therefore adequate and liberal specific appropriations from the public revenues ought regularly to be set apart and applied to those purposes.

This amendment, it will be seen, has a decided advantage over the resolution designed to be stricken out, as it pledges the whole revenue, as far as it can be expended, to the national defence, instead of confining it to a surplus, which, although large now, may not be so ample in future; nor is it fit that the public defence should be measured by surplus revenue. One of the chief objects of appropriation ought to be for defence; this should be made with ample but proper liberality from the public income generally, and not rendered dependent upon casual surplus. Besides, as was well remarked just now

National Defence.

by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] we know nothing of surpluses until all the demands of the Government and country are supplied; then, when all demands are supplied as far as can be expended, it seems to be unnecessary further to apply surpluses to any of those purposes.

Besides this, sir, there are other objections to this application of the surplus revenue, not only because it is, and ought to be, made useless by amply providing for all national demands before a surplus is ascertained, but because it interferes with (he knew not if designed) the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] to appropriate the surplus revenue from the public lands to the States, which he believed to be a favorite object with the people in the States, and because it also interferes with a proposition of like import, but more extensive, introduced by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.]

So far upon the amendment. When the Senator from Missouri, availing himself of his resolutions, commenced his attack upon the Senate, by giving us some account of a French officer who had exchanged friendly salutations with those of our own ships on the ocean, and read an extract from a French journal, stating that a French fleet was to be sent upon our coast too powerful for any that our country could furnish, he represents this fleet as sent here to menace us, and significantly asks the question, why is it that we have not a fleet adequate to meet them? Which interrogatory he as significantly answers for himself, by ascribing it to this Senate; that it is owing to their rejection of the three millions added to the fortification bill, which was sent to the Senate, without specification, on the night of the last day of the past session; and this rejection, he insinuates, was done with a view of preventing the "clothing the nakedness of the land."

Now, sir, if such could have been the design of the Senate, they must have had some motive for this act of treachery, and there must have been some grounds to expect a condition of things when such a design could have been made to be felt, as in case of a war. Let us see how the Senator and his positions agree with each other in sustaining such an accusation. By reference to the proceedings of the Senate of last session, we shall find that, upon due consideration, the Senate unanimously resolved that it was "inexpedient to adopt any legislative measure in regard to the state of affairs with France." By looking at the history of the proceedings of the other branch of Congress, as now upon record, we find that the House, so late as the 2d of March, after a full view of all the despatches sent by the Executive, unanimously decided that the "treaty with France should be maintained, and its execution insisted on," and said no more; and we see also that a resolution, "That a contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France," introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in that House, was by that chairman, on the same day, the 2d of March, laid upon the table, where it quietly reposed during the short remnant of the session. Stronger proof than this we cannot have as to the unanimous sense of Congress against the probability of any hostile change in our French relations. This, it will be observed, was no party vote—no vote of the administration's friends—no vote of the opposition—but a unanimous vote of every member in each House. By the Senator's own showing, too, the other day, from his French authorities, all was peaceful and harmonious in France—no manifestation of a change, or of an intent to change, our peaceful relationships; and this state of things he dates as late as the month of April past, some four weeks at least after the adjournment of Congress. How, then, in the midst of all these fair prospects of peace, and in contradiction to their own action, and the united action of all Congress, this Senate could have plotted to prevent Congress from "clothing the nakedness of the land," was, he must confess, utterly incomprehensible to him.

Again, sir, suppose these three millions had been voted on the 3d of March last at night, without specification or limit, by what magic could the Senator have transmuted these millions, in the short period of nine months, into ships equal in number to Admiral Mackau's fleet, which he represents as about to be on our coast? Did not the Senator count that fleet at sixty sail; whilst the whole of our own fleet is, in commission eighteen; in ordinary twenty; on the stocks thirteen; constituting an aggregate of fifty-one vessels? Yet the Senator would have converted three millions into sixty ships, with our whole navy thus situated, and in a space of time that would have rendered it a miraculous operation. We have had some evidences from the Senator that he was a second Midas, who turned all he touched into gold; and now we are to presume that he intends to amuse us with another humbug, in a miraculous augmentation of the navy of the United States.

In order that the world may see that there is no evidence before us that the Executive entertained such ideas as those of the Senator, I turn you to the report from the Navy Department, of the 5th December, where we find that less than half a million of dollars is required by that Department to fit out one ship of the line, six frigates, nineteen smaller vessels, and one steam frigate, for the year 1836; which last steam frigate can be completed, he says, in the course of the year. And from the Secretary of War's report on the 30th November, we learn, substantially, that new estimates are submitted, because no appropriations for fortifications had been made last year. He further states that some forts have been completed, others recommended, in continuation of the system of defence; and that a number of our important harbors are either wholly undefended or partially protected; and he then adds, as a system adapted to this condition of the defences, this suggestion, viz: "an adherence to the general plan of defence, and a gradual prosecution of the work as the national finances and other considerations may justify, seem to be demanded by a just regard to the circumstances of the country, as well as by the experience which the events of the last war forced upon us."

Now, sir, according to these reports, we see no such pressing emergency, no such urgent demands as the Senator sets forth. If they had existed last session, when the three millions were asked for, why are they not included in the estimates now, when nothing more is said to be required than the usual appropriations? It is the duty of the Departments, acting under the authority and direction of the President, to make known to Congress full estimates for every specific object which the national interest may demand; and to such applications alone can Congress pay attention.

But, sir, there is another document to which he must call the attention of the Senate—it is the late executive message, which speaks a language that he was scarcely able to comprehend; or, if he did comprehend it, he regretted it. After stating that loss and inconvenience had been experienced from the failure of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, the message goes on: "This failure was the more regretted, not only because it necessarily interrupted and delayed the progress of a system of national defence, projected immediately after the last war, and since steadily pursued, but also because it contained a contingent appropriation, inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive, in aid of this important object." And why were these executive views not made known? Am I to understand that they were entertained, and, being entertained, that they were to be obeyed, without even the condescension of being made known? It is a pity that such views were kept locked up in the executive bosom, which were to have come in aid of so important an object. It is to be lamented that they did not burst the bars that confined them, that they might have shed their light here. Such intelligence was wanted; it was asked for. He distinctly remembered that the venerable Senator from Tennessee, [MR. WHITE,] and the Senator from Massachusetts, [MR. WEBSTER,] and probably others, but those two he well remembered, said, each in his place, that if the President would inform the Senate that three millions were wanting for the public service, and would cause to be specified the sums for the respective objects, they were ready to give it; and they went further, and said, if the heads of Departments would say that amount was wanted, and state the sum that was to be applied to each, they were ready to vote it—but the intelligence came not at all; it was too closely penned up in the executive bosom to escape, and the unsanctioned call was rejected.

He would now take a brief review of the history of this transaction, not wishing to consume unnecessarily the time of the Senate, that the world, to whom it is to be made known, may more accurately understand it. The fortification bill, as it is called, came first from the House to the Senate at an advanced period of the session, after being duly deliberated on in the House of Representatives, as we are bound to presume. Much addition was made to the bill by the Committee on Finance here, for defence, which passed the Senate on the 24th February, and was returned to the House. Nothing more was heard of it here until the night of the last day of the session, on the 3d of March, when the bill came back to us, containing an additional appropriation of three millions of dollars, as a contingent fund, without any specification. This was so large and so extraordinary a demand upon the public treasury, so suddenly and so unexpectedly made, at the very heel of the session, that it met with a powerful and effective opposition; and, after rejection in the Senate, and being insisted on in the House, a conference was had, the bill being then in the House, and on conference it was determined that an additional half million should be granted for increasing the navy, and three hundred thousand dollars more for equipping fortifications, amounting in all to eight hundred thousand dollars. The Senate's committee returned from the conference, and reported the result to the Senate, who waited to the end of the session in vain to hear from the House of Representatives; but the committee of the House, which had the bill in possession, did not report the result of the conference to the House, and there the bill died.

It is for this, sir, that the Senator from Missouri has taken occasion to frame his unfounded accusation against the Senate for a dereliction of duty little short of treason. It is somewhat inexplicable, after all the estimates for expenditure for the year had been sent in, and more than gratified, that, at almost the last hour of the session, a call should be made upon them for three millions of dollars, without a particle of information to show why or wherefore, without the slightest intimation from the head of the Government, or from any of the executive officers, that the money was wanting or would be useful. And why, he asked again, if the money was really wanting for the public service, was the necessary information not given? Was the source of authority so difficult of access that it could not be got at? Nothing was more easy. The President himself, accompanied by the heads of Departments, was under the same roof with ourselves; he was in an adjoining room in this Capitol all the time; a message might have been procured from him, if it had been his pleasure to have sent it, in five or ten minutes; nay, if you had but opened the door, he might, if he had thought proper, have diffused among us all the light that was necessary for the "important object so much in accordance with executive will;" yet that light was withheld, though so much and so often requested; the information, so easy to be given, was not imparted, that might have ensured the appropriation. And it is for this that we are to be branded by the Senator from Missouri as faithless to our duty, and regardless of the nation's security? Yes, sir, if we could have been beguiled and drawn off under such circumstances, and made unfaithful to our duty, we might have merited the reproach of traitors. [A call to order by the Chair.] Mr. G. proceeded. With our convictions, of constitutional duty, I mean, sir; pardon me, I design no imputation on others. Yes, sir, we should have been justly subject to imputation, if, with our convictions, and under the circumstances we were placed, we had taken a different course. A sense of duty was imperious; with it there was no compromise.

When time was sufficient throughout the whole session to make known every want of the Government, either immediate or contingent, and no call was made but those which were fully supplied; when both Houses of Congress had unanimously concurred in opinion that no further legislative act was necessary in consequence of the state of our relations with France, the only Power with which we had any involvement at the time, it did seem strange that, at the last moments of the session, a requisition should have been made for so unusual an amount of money, without any explanation or message, or information that could lead to an understanding of the sudden cause of the requisition, or any specification of the objects to which it was to be applied. The information was requested, yet it was not given; it was at hand, but we could not reach it; it was under such circumstances we felt that we could not grant away the public money, and we refused to do so.

Mr. BENTON observed that the Senator from Maryland, [MR. GOLDSBOROUGH,] who had just resumed his seat, and himself, had some words at the last session, which had placed him in a situation, with respect to that gentleman, of the most scrupulous reserve. He believed it to be the instinct of gentlemen, whenever any thing had happened between them of an unpleasant nature, to behave afterwards to each other with the most punctilious and scrupulous politeness. He believed it to be the instinct of gentlemen to feel that, from such a time, they must stand upon a footing towards each other, in which they could no longer give and take. Now, sir, (said Mr. B.,) the Senator from Maryland has repeated what he did at the last session; he has made a premeditated attack on me. He felt (Mr. B. said) no malice, nor any degree of irritation, for what was passed; for if he was quick, he was at least free from malice. The gentleman at that time (Mr. B. said) drew a picture which a thousand persons present believed to be drawn for him; which he (Mr. B.) felt to be drawn for him; and had been informed that the gentleman had then rehearsed the part he was about to perform,* the first part, but not the concluding part; for the gentleman denied that his picture was intended for him. From that time to the present, (said Mr. B.,) the gentleman has no right to make a personal allusion to me. If the gentleman chooses to wait a year, and then come forward to settle an account in which he may have a balance against him, it is for him (said Mr. B.) and not for me to do so. I do not treasure up old things, to be brought out afterwards. The gentleman had now made an affirmation contradicting what I have said; but I tell the gentleman (said Mr. B.) that I know his affirmation to contain precisely as much truth now, as I believed that his denial did then.

The CHAIR (occupied pro tem. by Mr. KING) said he was not aware that any personal allusion to the Senator from Missouri had been made by the Senator from Maryland, or he should have called him to order. The remarks of the Senator from Missouri were out of order.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH rose to speak.

The CHAIR. Order! The Senator from Maryland will not be permitted to proceed.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Am I not permitted to reply, in order, to that which has been asserted out of order?

The CHAIR. No; the Chair cannot permit another word on the subject from either of the gentlemen.

Mr. PORTER, of Louisiana, said that he could not but feel, in common with every Senator, pain at the excitement which the debate had given rise to. It was, however, in some respects, unavoidable. If grave charges, affecting the patriotism and the obligations of duty which we all owed to the country, fell from such a high place as this, it was not surprising that it excited sensibility and produced warmth. Those who could sit by and listen calmly to such an accusation were not worthy of sitting here at all. If the majority felt jealous of discharging their duty honestly, faithfully, and patriotically, to the republic, they could not but be deeply sensible to imputations which, if true, showed that they had not been patriotic, faithful, or honest. I (said Mr. P.) believe that, on the occasion alluded to, as in all others, the Senate will be found not to have been wanting to the constitution; and, as one generally acting with that majority here, I rejoice that an opportunity is at last afforded us to vindicate our claims to public confidence, and place the true state of this matter fairly before the American people. I feel, sir, quite confident that, although party feeling may for a moment induce them to give an unwilling ear to truth, and party management may for a short period prevent that truth from reaching them, sooner or later it will vindicate its claims to obedience, and undeceive them. A most extraordinary delusion (said Mr. P.) has indeed possessed a portion of the public on this matter, and it was high time it should be removed. The Senator from Missouri, if his remarks were suffered to pass unanswered, would contribute to spread wider and fix deeper that delusion. Claiming as I do (said Mr. P.) full credit for truth and perfect sincerity of purpose, I ascribe no other motive to the honorable Senator. He has, no doubt, presented truly to the Senate those impressions which the transaction he has introduced into his remarks have made on his mind, and I can make full allowance for the influence of feelings which no one, in these heated times, is entirely free from. But while (said Mr. P.) I cheerfully make this admission, I am constrained to tell him that I listened to his observations with the most unfeigned regret. I consider his views radically wrong, and the facts belonging to the transaction erroneously understood, and most incorrectly presented by him to the Senate.

To one part of the honorable Senator's remarks I am glad to give my entire approbation. He told us, nearly toward the close of them, that, in relation to our present dispute with France, he trusted and believed all present appearance of war would fail, and that he meant to alarm no one. Sir, (said Mr. P.,) this is most consolatory, considering the relation in which the honorable Senator is known to stand to the present administration. But, sir, I should have heard these remarks with more unmixed satisfaction (said Mr. P.) if a great many observations which preceded this declaration had not tended, unintentionally no doubt, to produce feelings quite adverse, as I consider, to the conclusion he came to. Notwithstanding, however, the impression which these observations are calculated to make, I take this opportunity (said Mr. P.) to say that I, too, consider there is no just cause to apprehend a war; that I have undiminished and full confidence that the good sense and enlightened views of two of the freest people on earth will yet avert an unprofitable, unnecessary, and most afflicting contest.

The honorable Senator, sir, has read from a French journal, I believe, remarks there stated to have fallen from a member of the Chamber of Deputies, speaking in his place, in that body, in which this country, and its conduct in relation to the present difficulty with France, are spoken of in unkind terms. Sir, I consider this reference wholly unwise, and am unable to see any possible good which can result from bringing it before the American people. It may excite irritation here; it can do nothing more. It neither enlightens our judgment in regard to the true state of feeling in France towards the United States, nor furnishes any fact which should in the slightest degree influence us in any conclusions to which we, as statesmen, might come, or ought to come, on the matter. No doubt (said Mr. P.) there are in France, as there are here, and in every country on earth, men of uneasy temper and irritable feelings—men who delight in strife and confusion, and sicken when they see good-will and peace prevail, either among individuals or nations. Interested motives there, as well as here, may prompt persons to fan the flame of discord, and the fierceness of political opposition may occasion men to urge in debate what in their calm moments they would regret and disavow.

With this knowledge, sir, (said Mr. P.,) how can we draw the conclusion that the sentiments of the individual in question are those of the French people? On what a slender thread would hang the peace and happiness of nations, if every rash and intemperate man in those nations could, by violent denunciation and unjust invective, break the ties of peace which unite them. The individual referred to was but one in a body composed of, I believe, (said Mr. P.,) more than four hundred. There is no pretence for believing that he spoke the sentiments of either the French Government or the French people. I should, sir, if I wished to instruct the American people, if I desired them to know what were the sentiments of France towards this country, I would refer, not to the angry declamation of a member of the Chamber of Deputies, but to the declarations of the King, who represents the people, and who, until the contrary is proved, I am bound to believe, and I do believe, speaks the true sentiments of that people. I have been unable to discover, in any thing which has fallen from him, the slightest ground for believing that he entertains any unkind feeling towards us. Quite the reverse, I trust. He still remembers the generous hospitality with which he, in common with every unfortunate man, is received on the shores of this asylum of mankind, and would regret that the evening of his life was destined to see him placed in a situation where other sentiments and other feelings, under national hostility, might take the place of those he now entertains. It is true, sir, that I have heard his sincerity doubted in regard to the gentle language which he has uniformly practised towards us; but it is obvious that this accusation just applies with the same force to any other person connected with the Government, who uses language of a different kind. Sir, (said Mr. P.,) I desire not to be misunderstood. I do not now enter into the question, whether the conduct of France has been just or wise in relation to this unfortunate matter. Many considerations enter into the examination of that topic, which I shall not touch, because this is not the proper time to discuss them. But when extracts are read here, from the French papers, which have a tendency to show not merely that France has done us wrong by withholding the payment of money which she most justly owes, but that an angry and hostile feeling pervades her people and their councils in regard to us, I desire to disabuse the public mind of such an impression, because my sincere, and therefore honest, conviction is, that no such feeling exists there in relation to the American people.

Another subject (said Mr. P.) which occupied a prominent part of the honorable Senator's speech related to the expected appearance of a French fleet on our coast. The idea was conveyed strongly, by the tenor of the honorable Senator's remarks, that it came here by way of menace, and he emphatically said, we are voting under the guns of France. Agreeing, as I perfectly do, (said Mr. P.,) in the truth of the honorable Senator's declaration, that, since the commencement of this unfortunate misunderstanding with France, he has never said an unkind word on this floor in regard to her, and professing not to doubt the sincerity of his assertion that he had no wish to excite any irritation on this subject, I cannot help remarking that nothing could be imagined more unfortunate for his purpose than the introduction of this topic. If any thing (said Mr. P.) more distinguishes the people of this republic from that of any other country, it is their pride—a pride springing from the combined influence of the recollection of their ancestors, their settlement here, their own history since, and the glorious freedom which they now enjoy.

It is to appeal to them, therefore, on the ground which, of all others, they are the most sensitive, to tell them, or to induce them to believe, that this movement of the French armament was intended to awe or impose on them. Sir, I do not believe (said Mr. P.) that peace could be preserved in this country six months, if its citizens were once imbued with the notion that France, or any other country on earth, imagined that it could influence their judgment through their fears. And I rejoice (said Mr. P.) that it is so. Long may they preserve such a spirit; and may they ever spurn at the idea that any appeal can be made to them by the stranger, except to their reason, their magnanimity, and their sense of justice. But this feeling, which is so honorable, is, at the same time, one which, like all other strong passions, readily leads to error. It should, therefore, never be touched, unless we are perfectly convinced we have a solid reason for doing so. Mr. President, (said Mr. P.,) I do not think any such reasons exist in this case. In the first place, sir, the honorable gentleman did not profess to have any further information as to the direction of that armament than that which is accessible to every member on this floor, namely, that which is derived from the newspapers. Sir, (said Mr. P.,) I have been unable to see any thing in them which gives the slightest countenance to the idea that the French fleet were destined for our coast, unless the West Indies, indeed, make a part of the coast of the United States. All the intelligence which has reached us lately from Europe on this subject distinctly informs us that the naval armament now fitting out in the ports of France is destined, not for our coast, but for the West Indies. It is plainly stated, in every newspaper that I have seen, that its destination is to the French dependencies in that quarter of the globe, to Guadeloupe and Martinique. The order of the Marine Department in France indicates that such a direction is given to it. I think, therefore, sir, the honorable Senator may quiet all his fears on this subject. Certainly nothing can be inferred from its designation, which can justify any alarm—the cruising place assigned to it is not in our seas.

Sir, (said Mr. P.,) I am surprised that it did not occur to the honorable Senator that a rational motive could be found for such a movement of the French marine, at this moment, quite different from that of hostile aggression. It is known to us all, and it is well known to the French Government, that the President of the United States, at the last session of the twenty-third Congress, in his annual message, did specially recommend that reprisals should be resorted to by the United States, in case the Government of France longer delayed to render us that justice which, by her treaty, she should ere this have rendered. And it was equally well known to her that Congress did not negative such a course of action. It merely delayed acting on the recommendation. The unfortunate misconceptions and misunderstandings which have since prevailed between the two countries having induced our representative at Paris to withdraw, the Government of France, no doubt, feared that measures formerly recommended might be at once resorted to by the United States to compel the payment of the sum, and knew that, in that event, her West India possessions were most vulnerable to the blow. It is not, therefore, at all surprising that she should resort to this precautionary measure; that she should endeavor to guard distant possessions against the sudden movements of a country which is, relatively, much nearer to them than she is.

I am happy, however, to be able to give the Senator from Missouri information on the subject which will, I trust, effectually dissipate from his mind, and from any mind in the nation, all apprehension that we are about to sustain any aggression from France. Since I came into the Senate chamber this morning, there has been put into my hands a newspaper, containing an extract from the Moniteur, printed at Paris—a gazette which the honorable Senator knows is the recognised official organ of the French Government. In that paper I delight to see it distinctly averred that France will not be the aggressors in this quarrel; that the armament is purely defensive; and that she entertains strong hopes that amicable relations may yet be preserved between the two countries. In answer to some of the journals in the interest of Charles X., who are anxious to involve this country and France in war, because they hate the institutions which prevail in both, the official organ of the Government thus indignantly states:

"It is false that the communication made by order of the French Government to that of the United States had for its object to obtain the insertion of such and such phrases in the next message of the President. The French Government did no more than make known officially the existence and the tenor of the law of June 17, 1835, as well as the duties imposed on it by this law, and the nature of the explanations which it had a right to expect.

"It is false that the communication made by order of the French Government remained without an answer. This was verbal, as had been the communication.

"Of the same kind were those which took place at Paris between the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the chargé d'affaires of the United States. The documents relative to these conferences will be laid on the tables of the two Chambers. If it has been impossible to come to an understanding, nothing has passed, at least, of a nature to render more grave the differences between the two countries.

"Nevertheless, the recall of the American chargé d'affaires, coming after the measures proposed by the President last year to Congress, hostile to French property, has rendered some precautions necessary. It was the duty of the French Government, under such circumstances, to be prepared, at all events, to protect French interests. Such is the aim of the armaments equipping in our ports—an aim purely defensive. There exists, at this moment, no legitimate cause of war between France and the United States, and in no case shall the aggression come in the first instance from France."

Sir, I rejoice to see this. It is conformable to what we have a right to expect, and to the position of that country in this unfortunate dispute. If she entertained for one moment the idea of war, because we were complaining of the injuries we sustained by the long-delayed payment of a just debt, I should say that she had effaced all claim to our respect and our regard. And yet, sir, (said Mr. P.,) even in the bitterness which such a conduct would not fail to engender, there would be times, and those not unfrequent, when each party would feel that their position was not a natural one. Old friendship and old sympathies would, in spite of all the passions war excites, rise in their breasts. Neither could he forget those days, nor those associations, when the gallant nobles of France and the intrepid freemen of the new world battled side by side, on the same field, for the same cause.

They could not, if they would, obliterate the remembrance of the time when their risk was common, their exertions common, and their glory common; each, I should think, (said Mr. P.,) would look with anxiety to the day when they could lay down those weapons which each can well wield, and embrace once more as friends.

I enter not (said Mr. P.,) into the question whether, dear as these recollections must be, they may not be sacrificed to the sterner claims which each may suppose they owe to their country. And I express no opinion how near or how distant we are now to that sacrifice. All I wish to enforce is, that questions of this kind cannot be examined too calmly, and that every thing which is irritating, and extraneous, and collateral to the main question, should be studiously put aside from our consideration. War! (said Mr. P.,) with the fearful passions it excites, the crimes it produces, the enduring miseries it inflicts, is a sad affair, and those on whom the responsibility of making it rests cannot be too cautious. Any one who compares Europe for the last twenty years with the twenty years which preceded them, and sees how vastly the balance in the sum of human happiness preponderates in favor of the period first mentioned, may take lessons on this head in the best of all schools—that of experience.

But, sir, (said Mr. P.,) though I have thought it necessary to say something in reply to the observations of the honorable Senator on the points which I have just noticed, still had this been all which fell from the honorable Senator, I should not have mingled in this debate. But, sir, the honorable Senator thought proper to say that the failure to put the country in a state of defence against foreign aggression was owing to the conduct of the Senate last winter in refusing to concur in the proposition of the House of Representatives, to put the sum of three millions into the hands of the Executive. Never in my life, sir, did I hear any thing which gave me more surprise. I shall examine, before I sit down, on what foundation that assertion rests. But before I do, I must refer to another assertion of the honorable Senator, which startled me still more. He said that this was not all; that there was a much larger account for which we were responsible: that all the specific appropriations contained in the fortification bill were lost by the conduct of the Senate; and he proceeded to enumerate them, including, among others, a proposition of the Military Committee to apply the sum of $500,000 to the defence of the country. The honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] having satisfactorily shown that the measure originated with him, and was abandoned under circumstances which take away all ground for imputing its failure to become a law to any action of the Senate, the Senator from Missouri has, as I understand him, given up that part of the accusation. If he will bestow some of his attention on me, (said Mr. P.,) I think I will satisfy him that he will be compelled to surrender all the rest.

And first, sir, before we proceed to the point, (said Mr. P.,) I wish the issue which I now make with the honorable Senator to be clearly understood. I undertake, then, to say that it was not the fault of the Senate that the fortifications of the country were not last year put in defence. I assert distinctly that every thing which patriotism could suggest, under their views of duty, was done by them to get the fortification bill passed. I say that it was not lost in the Senate. I assert that it was passed there, and returned to the House for its action; and I say it was lost in the House of Representatives; lost by the conduct of that body, without precedent in the history of this Government.

The doings and misdoings (said Mr. P.,) of the 23d Congress are now as much matter of history as the affairs of Greece and Rome are. Still it is my desire to speak of a Legislature of which I formed a part with all the respect and gentleness which is consistent with a frank exposition of truth. With this feeling, sir, I proceed to disclose to the American people the extraordinary circumstances which prevented the passage of the fortification bill.

So far, sir, (said Mr. P.,) from the Senate having refused or neglected to pass all the specific appropriations which were presented to it by the House of Representatives, for the use of the fortifications, they not only passed them, but they passed them with amendments, by which large additions were made to these appropriations. Sir, (said Mr. P.,) I do not wish to fatigue the Senate with going through all the items which compose the amendments made by the Senate; it would be too tedious to do so. I now speak for the bill itself, as it passed this body. It is at this moment under my eye. And I learn from it that the bill which reached the Senate on the 7th day of February, from the House of Representatives, appropriated only the sum of $439,000 to this portion of the national defence. What, sir, was the conduct of this body, which is now charged with neglecting the defence of the country? Why, sir, to approve of the appropriation made in it; and, after consultation with the heads of Departments, send it to the House of Representatives seven days before the adjournment. What, sir, was the conduct of that body, which it appears was, according to the honorable Senator, so much alive to the true interests and honor of the country? Why, sir, this: to keep it nearly the whole of these seven days without action, and to return it to us seven hours before the termination of Congress, with an amendment placing three millions of dollars at the disposal of the Executive!

Sir, (said Mr. P.,) the Senate found itself placed, by this extraordinary step on the part of the House, in a position at once singular and difficult. The unusual course adopted would, if any other sentiment but that of respect for a co-ordinate branch of the Government could have found place in our minds, have suggested the suspicion that the late period at which such a measure was introduced, and the annexing to it the fortification bill, which the wants of the country required action on, was intended to coerce them into a vote in favor of it, or to enable those opposed to the majority here to charge them with neglecting the true interests of the country. Little time was left us, sir, for consultation; there was none to obtain information to guide our conduct. We asked each other, why was this sent at so late a period? What change has occurred in our foreign relations which demands it? Does the President recommend it? To what means of defence is it to be applied? If this measure is so all-important now for the national protection, why have the three months which have elapsed since our meeting passed without any intimation of its necessity? And if we had that information, are there not insuperable objections to passing it without the specific objects to which the money can be applied being designated? No answer could be given to the questions; and, sir, we did, as I trust every American Senate will hereafter do, placed in similar circumstances. We rejected the amendment. What followed? (said Mr. PORTER.) Did our conduct show that, in the rejection of this enormous and unprecedented appropriation of the people's money, we were actuated by any desire to place the country in an unprotected attitude? No, sir, on conference with the House, through the respective committees, we agreed to vote eight hundred thousand dollars more, for the purposes of defence, three hundred thousand dollars of which was to be applied to the arming the fortifications of the United States, and five hundred thousand dollars for the repair and equipment of their ships.

Sir, it is thus seen that the Senate agreed to appropriate one million six hundred and fifty-nine thousand dollars to the defence of the country. How, then, Mr. President, with the semblance of justice, can it be said that we left the nation in a defenceless position? And, sir, (said Mr. P.,) I ask why, if national protection was the sole object in this amendment of three millions, why was the sum of more than one million and a half refused? I say the refusal is utterly irreconcilable with the purposes which the amendment professed to have in view. Sir, said Mr. P., I have never heard any thing like a satisfactory answer to this question. It is said, indeed, it was too late. To that I say, said Mr. P., if it was too late, whose is the blame? Not ours, certainly. Was it the fault of the Senate that this extraordinary, and, I repeat it, unprecedented amendment was made at so late an hour? No, sir, it was the act of the House of Representatives. On us certainly rests the responsibility of rejecting the vote of three millions, to be used as the President pleased. I am glad that it does. I am proud, said Mr. P., that I am one of those who did so. But I repeat it, on whom rests the responsibility of tacking this amendment to the regular appropriation bill at so late an hour, and thereby defeating it? I say again, sir, on the House of Representatives; and I appeal to every candid man in the nation, if the facts do not bear me out in the position I have taken; and I make, said Mr. P., the same appeal, whether there is any, or the slightest, foundation to charge the Senate with having been the cause why the country is now in a defenceless position.

I have considered, said Mr. P., this matter as if the fact was really that the lateness of the hour prevented action on the part of the House. I took no note of the hour, Mr. President, but members who did recollect there was ample time before, under any construction of the constitution, Congress had terminated, to act on the report of the committee of conference. It is certain that other and important matters were transacted in both Houses after the committees had reported. But, sir, no report was made to the House of Representatives. Why was it not made? I leave to every man to make the conjecture. It is not for me to say; the American people will judge.

I have finished, Mr. President. My object in addressing the Senate was, first, to place the transactions of the last session of Congress in relation to this matter in their true light, and I have given the facts as I understand them; my other object was, to remove as far as I could all irritating considerations from that serious question which we may soon be called to act on. I take the opportunity to say, however, that whenever the crisis, in my judgment, arrives, when the strongest measures are necessary to vindicate the national honor, I shall be found behind no man here to support them; and that if (which God avert) war is determined on, I shall, whether it be adopted in pursuance of my judgment or not, give it a zealous and faithful support; but I consider it a great calamity, come when it may. I am anxious to avert it, and I think the maxim of the great poet true in regard to nations as well as individuals:

"Beware

Of entrance to a quarrel, but, being in,
Bear it so that the opposed may be in fear of thee."

Mr. WEBSTER next addressed the Chair. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) to make any remarks on the state of our affairs with France. The time for that discussion has not come, and I wait. We are in daily expectation of a communication from the President, which will give us light; and we are authorized to expect a recommendation by him of such measures as he thinks it may be necessary and proper for Congress to adopt. I do not anticipate him. I do not forewarn him. In this most important and delicate business it is the proper duty of the Executive to go forward, and I, for one, do not intend either to be drawn or driven into the lead. When official information shall be before us, and when measures shall be recommended upon the proper responsibility, I shall endeavor to form the best judgment I can, and shall act according to its dictates.

I rise, now, for another purpose. This resolution has drawn on a debate upon the general conduct of the Senate during the last session of Congress, and especially in regard to the proposed grant of the three millions to the President on the last night of the session. My main object is to tell the story of this transaction, and to exhibit the conduct of the Senate fairly to the public view. I owe this duty to the Senate. I owe it to the committee with which I am connected; and although whatever is personal to an individual is generally of too little importance to be made the subject of much remark, I hope I may be permitted, in a matter in regard to which there has been so much misrepresentation, to say a few words for the sake of defending my own reputation.

This vote for the three millions was proposed by the House of Representatives as an amendment to the fortification bill; and the loss of that bill, three millions and all, is the charge which has been made upon the Senate, sounded over all the land, and now again renewed. I propose to give the true history of this bill, its origin, its progress, and its loss.

Before attempting that, however, let me remark, for it is worthy to be remarked and remembered, that the business brought before the Senate last session, important and various as it was, and both public and private, was all gone through, with most uncommon despatch and promptitude. No session has witnessed a more complete clearing off and finishing of the subjects before us. The communications from the other House, whether bills or whatever else, were especially attended to in proper season, and with that ready respect which is due from one House to the other. I recollect nothing of any importance which came to us from the House of Representatives, which was here neglected, overlooked, or disregarded.

On the other hand, it was the misfortune of the Senate, and, as I think, the misfortune of the country, that, owing to the state of business in the House of Representatives towards the close of the session, several measures which had been matured in the Senate, and passed into bills, did not receive attention, so as to be either agreed to or rejected in the other branch of the Legislature. They fell, of course, by the termination of the session.

[SENATE.]

Among these measures may be mentioned the following, viz:

The Post Office reform bill, which passed the Senate unanimously, and of the necessity for which the whole country is certainly now most abundantly satisfied;

The custom-house regulations bills, which also passed nearly unanimously, after a very laborious preparation by the Committee on Commerce, and a full discussion in the Senate;

The judiciary bill, passed here by a majority of thirty-one to five, and which has again already passed the Senate at this session with only a single dissenting vote;

The bill indemnifying claimants for French spoiliations before 1800;

The bill regulating the deposite of the public moneys in the deposite banks;

The bill respecting the tenure of certain offices, and the power of removal from office; which has now again passed to be engrossed, in the Senate, by a decisive majority.

All these important measures, matured and passed in the Senate in the course of the session, and many others whose importance was less, were sent to the House of Representatives, and we never heard any thing more from them. They there found their graves.

It is worthy of being remarked, also, that the attendance of members of the Senate was remarkably full, particularly toward the end of the session. On the last day every Senator was in his place till very near the hour of adjournment, as the journal will show. We had no breaking up for want of a quorum, no delay, no calls of the Senate; nothing which was made necessary by the negligence or inattention of the members of this body. On the vote for the three millions of dollars, which was taken at about eight o'clock in the evening, forty-eight votes were given, every member of the Senate being in his place and answering to his name. This is an instance of punctuality, diligence, and labor, continued to the very end of an arduous session, wholly without example or parallel.

The Senate, then, sir, must stand, in the judgment of every man, fully acquitted of all remissness, all negligence, all inattention, amidst the fatigue and exhaustion of the closing hours of Congress. Nothing passed unheeded, nothing was overlooked, nothing forgotten, and nothing slighted.

And now, sir, I would proceed immediately to give the history of the fortification bill, if it were not necessary, as introductory to that history, and as showing the circumstances under which the Senate was called on to transact the public business, first to refer to another bill which was before us, and to the proceedings which were had upon it.

It is well known, sir, that the annual appropriation bills always originate in the House of Representatives. This is so much the course that no one ever looks to see such a bill first brought forward in the Senate. It is also well known, sir, that it has been usual, heretofore, to make the annual appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point in the general bill which provides for the pay and support of the army. But last year, the army bill did not contain any appropriation whatever for the support of West Point. I took notice of this singular omission when the bill was before the Senate, but presumed, and indeed understood, that the House would send us a separate bill for the Military Academy. The army bill, therefore, passed; but no bill for the Academy at West Point appeared. We waited for it from day to day, and from week to week, but waited in vain. At length, the time for sending bills from one House to the other, according to the joint rules of the two Houses, expired; and no bill had made its appearance for the support of the Military Academy. These joint rules, as is well known, are sometimes suspended on the application of one House to the other, in favor of particular bills, whose progress has been unexpectedly delayed, but which the public interest requires to be passed. But the House of Representatives sent us no request to suspend the rules in favor of a bill for the support of the Military Academy, nor made any other proposition to save the institution from immediate dissolution. Notwithstanding all the talk about a war, and the necessity of a vote for the three millions, the Military Academy, an institution cherished so long, and at so much expense, was on the very point of being entirely broken up.

Now it so happened, sir, that at this time there was another appropriation bill which had come from the House of Representatives, and was before the Committee on Finance here. This bill was entitled "an act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1835."

In this state of things, several members of the House of Representatives applied to the committee, and besought us to save the academy by annexing the necessary appropriations for its support to the bill for civil and diplomatic service. We spoke to them, in reply, of the unfitness, the irregularity, the incongruity, of this forced union of such dissimilar subjects; but they told us it was a case of absolute necessity, and that, without resorting to this mode, the appropriation could not get through. We acquiesced, sir, in these suggestions. We went out of our way. We agreed to do an extraordinary and irregular thing, in order to save the public business from miscarriage. By direction of the committee, I moved the Senate to add an appropriation for the Military Academy to the bill for defraying civil and diplomatic expenses. The bill was so amended; and in this form the appropriation was finally made.

But this was not all. This bill for the civil and diplomatic service being thus amended, by tacking the Military Academy upon it, was sent back by us to the House of Representatives, where its length of tail was to be still much further increased. That House had before it several subjects for provision, and for appropriation, upon which it had not passed any bill, before the time for passing bills to be sent to the Senate had elapsed. It was anxious that these things should, in some way, be provided for; and when the diplomatic bill came back, drawing the Military Academy after it, it was thought prudent to attach to it various of these other provisions. There were propositions to pave streets in the city of Washington, to repair the Capitol, and various other things, which it was necessary to provide for; and they, therefore, were put into the same bill by way of amendment to an amendment; that is to say, Mr. President, we had been prevailed on to amend their bill for defraying the salary of our ministers abroad, by adding an appropriation for the Military Academy; and they proposed to amend this our amendment, by adding to it matter as germane to it as it was to the original bill. There was also the President's gardener. His salary was unprovided for, and there was no way of remedying this important omission but by giving him place in the diplomatic service bill, among chargés d'affaires, envoys extraordinaires, and ministers plenipotentiary. In and among these ranks, therefore, he was formally introduced by the amendment of the House, and there he now stands, as you will readily see by turning to the law. Sir, I have not the pleasure to know this useful person; but, should I see him some morning, overlooking the workmen in the lawns, walks, copses, and parterres, which adorn the grounds around the President's residence, considering the company into which we have introduced him, I should expect to see at least a small diplomatic button on his working-jacket.

SENATE.]

National Defence.

[JAN. 14, 1836.]

When these amendments came from the House, and were read at our table, though they caused a smile, they were yet adopted, and the law passed, almost with the rapidity of a comet, and with something like the same length of tail.

Now, sir, not one of these irregularities or incongruities, no part of this jumbling together of distinct and different subjects was, in the slightest degree, occasioned by any thing done, or omitted to be done, on the part of the Senate. Their proceedings were all regular, their decision prompt, their despatch of the public business correct and seasonable. There was nothing of disorganization, nothing of procrastination, nothing evincive of a temper to embarrass or obstruct the public business. If the history which I have now truly given shows that one thing was amended by another which had no sort of connexion with it, that unusual expedients were resorted to, and that the laws, instead of arrangement and symmetry, exhibit anomaly, confusion, and the most grotesque associations, it is nevertheless true that no part of all this was made necessary by us. We deviated from the accustomed modes of legislation only when we were supplicated to do so, in order to supply bald and glaring deficiencies in measures which were before us.

But now, Mr. President, let me come to the fortification bill, the lost bill, which not only now, but on a graver occasion, has been lamented like the lost Pleiad.

This bill, sir, came from the House of Representatives to the Senate, in the usual way, and was referred to the Committee on Finance. Its appropriations were not large. Indeed, they appeared to the committee to be quite too small. It struck a majority of the committee, at once, that there were several fortifications on the coast either not provided for at all, or not adequately provided for by this bill. The whole amount of its appropriations was $400,000 or $430,000. It contained no grant of three millions, and if the Senate had passed it, the very day it came from the House, not only would there have been no appropriation of the three millions, but, sir, none of those other sums which the Senate did insert in the bill. Others, besides ourselves, saw the deficiencies of this bill. We had communications with and from the Departments, and we inserted in the bill every thing which any Department recommended to us. We took care to await the proper period, to be sure that nothing else was coming; and we then reported the bill to the Senate with our proposed amendments. Among these amendments, there was a sum of $75,000 for Castle Island, in Boston harbor, $100,000 for defences in Maryland, &c. These amendments were agreed to by the Senate, and one or two others added, on the motion of members; and the bill, being thus amended, was returned to the House.

And now, sir, it becomes important to ask when was this bill, thus amended, returned to the House of Representatives? Was it unduly detained here, so that the House was obliged afterwards to act upon it suddenly? This question is material to be asked, and material to be answered, too, and the journal does satisfactorily answer it; for it appears by the journal that the bill was returned to the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 24th of February, one whole week before the close of the session. And from Tuesday, the 24th of February, to Tuesday, the 3d of March, we heard not one word from this bill. Tuesday, the 3d of March, was, of course, the last day of the session. We assembled here at 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning of that day, and sat until three in the afternoon, and still we were not informed whether the House had finally passed the bill. As it was an important matter, and belonging to that part of the public business which usually receives particular attention from the Committee on Finance, I bore the subject in my mind, and felt some solicitude about it, seeing that the session was drawing so near to a close. I took it for granted, however, as I had not heard any thing to the contrary, that the amendments of the Senate would not be objected to, and that when a convenient time should arrive for taking up the bill in the House, it would be passed at once into a law, and we should hear no more about it. Not the slightest intimation was given, either that the Executive wished for any larger appropriation, or that it was intended in the House to insert such larger appropriation. Not a syllable escaped from any body and came to our knowledge, that any further alteration whatever was intended in the bill.

At three o'clock in the afternoon of the 3d of March the Senate took its recess, as is usual in that period of the session, until five. At five we again assembled, and proceeded with the business of the Senate until eight o'clock in the evening; and, at eight o'clock in the evening, and not before, the Clerk of the House appeared at our door, and announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to one of the Senate's amendments, agreed to others, and to two of those amendments, viz: the fourth and fifth, it had agreed, with an amendment of its own.

Now, sir, these fourth and fifth amendments of ours were—one a vote of $75,000 for the castle in Boston harbor, and the other a vote of $100,000 for certain defences in Maryland. And what, sir, was the addition which the House of Representatives proposed to make, by way of "amendment," to a vote of $75,000 for repairing the works in Boston harbor? Here, sir, it is:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy: Provided, Such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

This proposition, sir, was thus unexpectedly and suddenly put to us, at eight o'clock in the evening of the last day of the session. Unusual, unprecedented, extraordinary, as it obviously is, on the face of it, the manner of presenting it was still more extraordinary. The President had asked for no such grant of money; no Department had recommended it; no estimate had suggested it; no reason whatever was given for it. No emergency had happened, and nothing new had occurred; every thing known to the administration at that hour, respecting our foreign relations, had certainly been known to it for days and for weeks before.

With what propriety, then, could the Senate be called on to sanction a proceeding so entirely irregular and anomalous? Sir, I recollect the occurrences of the moment very well, and I remember the impression which this vote of the House seemed to make all around the Senate. We had just come out of executive session; the doors were but just opened; and I hardly remember whether there was a single spectator in the hall or the galleries. I had been been at the Clerk's table, and had not reached my seat when the message was read. All the Senators were in the chamber. I heard the message certainly with great surprise and astonishment; and I immediately moved the Senate to disagree to this vote of the House. My relation to the subject, in consequence of my connexion with the Committee on Finance, made it my duty to propose some course, and I had not a moment's doubt or hesitation what that course ought to be. I took upon myself, then, sir, the responsibility of moving that the Senate should disagree to this vote, and I now acknowledge that responsibility.

It might be presumptuous to say that I took a leading part, but I certainly took an early part, a decided part, and an earnest part, in rejecting this broad grant of three millions of dollars, without limitation of purpose or specification of object; called for by no recommendation, founded on no estimate, made necessary by no state of things which was made known to us. Certainly, sir, I took a part in its rejection; and I stand here, in my place in the Senate, to-day, ready to defend the part so taken by me; or rather, sir, I disclaim all defence, and all occasion of defence, and I assert it as meritorious to have been among those who arrested, at the earliest moment, this extraordinary departure from all settled usage, and, as I think, from plain constitutional injunction—this indefinite voting of a vast sum of money to mere executive discretion, without limit assigned, without object specified, without reason given, and without the least control under heaven.

Sir, I am told that, in opposing this grant, I spoke with warmth, and I suppose I may have done so. If I did, it was a warmth springing from as honest a conviction of duty as ever influenced a public man. It was spontaneous, unaffected, sincere. There had been among us, sir, no consultation, no concert. There could have been none. Between the reading of the message and my motion to disagree there was not time enough for any two members of the Senate to exchange five words on the subject. The proposition was sudden and perfectly unexpected. I resisted it, as irregular, as dangerous in itself, and dangerous in its precedent, as wholly unnecessary, and as violating the plain intention, if not the express words, of the constitution. Before the Senate I then avowed, and before the country I now avow, my part in this opposition. Whatsoever is to fall on those who sanctioned it, of that let me have my full share.

The Senate, sir, rejected this grant by a vote of twenty-nine against nineteen. Those twenty-nine names are on the journal; and whensoever the expunging process may commence, or how far soever it may be carried, I pray it, in mercy, not to erase mine from that record. I beseech it, in its sparing goodness, to leave me that proof of attachment to duty and to principle. It may draw around it, over it, or through it, black lines, or red lines, or any lines; it may mark it in any way which either the most prostrate and fantastical spirit of man-worship, or the most ingenious and elaborate study of self-degradation may devise, if only it will leave it so that those who inherit my blood, or who may hereafter care for my reputation, shall be able to behold it where it now stands.

The House, sir, insisted on this amendment. The Senate adhered to its disagreement. The House asked a conference, to which request the Senate immediately acceded. The committees of conference met, and, in a short time, came to an agreement. They agreed to recommend to their respective Houses, as a substitute for the vote proposed by the House, the following:

“As an additional appropriation for arming the fortifications of the United States, three hundred thousand dollars.”

“As an additional appropriation for the repair and equipment of ships of war of the United States, five hundred thousand dollars.”

I immediately reported this agreement of the committees of conference to the Senate; but, inasmuch as the bill was in the House of Representatives, the Senate could not act further on the matter until the House should first have considered the report of the committees, decided thereon, and sent us the bill. I did not myself take any note of the particular hour of this part of the transaction. The honorable member from Virginia [Mr. LEIGH] says he consulted his watch at the time, and he knows that I had come from the conference, and was in my seat, at a quarter past eleven. I have no reason to think that he is under any mistake in this particular. He says it so happened that he had occasion to take notice of the hour, and well remembers it. It could not well have been later than this, as any one will be satisfied who will look at our journals, public and executive, and see what a mass of business was despatched after I came from the committees, and before the adjournment of the Senate. Having made the report, sir, I had no doubt that both Houses would concur in the result of the conference, and looked every moment for the officer of the House bringing the bill. He did not come, however, and I pretty soon learned that there was doubt whether the committee on the part of the House would report to the House the agreement of the conferees. At first I did not at all credit this; but it was confirmed by one communication after another, until I was obliged to think it true. Seeing that the bill was thus in danger of being lost, and intending, at any rate, that no blame should justly attach to the Senate, I immediately moved the following resolution:

“Resolved, That a message be sent to the honorable the House of Representatives, respectfully to remind the House of the report of the committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill respecting the fortifications of the United States.”

You recollect this resolution, sir, having, as I well remember, taken some part on the occasion.*

This resolution was promptly passed; the Secretary carried it to the House, and delivered it. What was done in the House on the receipt of this message now appears from the printed journal. I have no wish to comment on the proceedings there recorded—all may read them, and each be able to form his own opinion. Suffice it to say, that the House of Representatives, having then possession of the bill, chose to retain that possession, and never acted on the report of the committee. The bill, therefore, was lost. It was lost in the House of Representatives. It died there, and there its remains are to be found. No opportunity was given to the members of the House to decide whether they would agree to the report of the two committees or not. From a quarter past eleven, when the report was agreed to by the committees, until two or three o'clock in the morning, the House remained in session. If at any time there was not a quorum of members present, the attendance of a quorum, we are to presume, might have been commanded, as there was undoubtedly a great majority of the members still in the city.

But now, sir, there is one other transaction of the evening which I feel bound to state, because I think it quite important, on several accounts, that it should be known.

A nomination was pending before the Senate for a judge of the Supreme Court. In the course of the sitting that nomination was called up, and, on motion, was indefinitely postponed. In other words, it was rejected; for an indefinite postponement is a rejection. The office, of course, remained vacant, and the nomination of another person to fill it became necessary. The President of the United States was then in the Capitol, as is usual on the evening of the last day of the session, in the chamber assigned to him, and with the heads of Departments around him. When nominations are rejected under these circumstances, it has been usual for the President immediately to transmit a new nomination to the Senate; otherwise the office must remain vacant till the next session, as the vacancy in such case has not happened in the recess of Congress. The vote of the Senate, indefinitely postponing this nomination, was carried to the President's room by the Secretary of the Senate. The President told the Secretary that it was more than an hour past twelve o'clock, and that he could receive no further communications from the Senate, and immediately after, as I have understood, left the Capitol. The Secretary brought back the paper containing the certified copy of the vote of the Senate, and endorsed thereon the substance of the President's answer; and also added that, according to his own watch, it was a quarter past one o'clock.

There are two views, sir, in which this occurrence may well deserve to be noticed. One is, a connexion which it may perhaps have with the loss of the fortification bill; the other is its general importance, as introducing a new rule, or a new practice, respecting the intercourse between the President and the Houses of Congress, on the last day of the session.

On the first point I shall only observe that the fact of the President's having declined to receive this communication from the Senate, and of his having left the Capitol, was immediately known in the House of Representatives; that it was quite obvious that if he could not receive a communication from the Senate, neither could he receive a bill from the House of Representatives for his signature. It was equally obvious that if, under these circumstances, the House of Representatives should agree to the report of the committees of conference, so that the bill should pass, it must nevertheless fail to become a law, for want of the President's signature; and that, in that case, the blame of losing the bill, on whomsoever else it might fall, could not be laid upon the Senate.

On the more general point I must say, sir, that this decision of the President, not to hold communication with the Houses of Congress after 12 o'clock on the 3d of March, is quite new. No such objection has ever been made before, by any President. No one of them has ever declined communicating with either House at any time during the continuance of its session on that day. All Presidents, heretofore, have left it with the Houses themselves to fix their hour of adjournment, and to bring their session, for the day, to a close whenever they saw fit.

It is notorious, in point of fact, that nothing is more common than for both Houses to sit later than 12 o'clock, for the purpose of completing measures which are in the last stages of their progress. Amendments are proposed and agreed to, bills passed, enrolled bills signed by the presiding officers, and other important legislative acts performed, often at two or three o'clock in the morning. All this is very well known to gentlemen who have been for any considerable time members of Congress. And all Presidents have signed bills, and have also made nominations to the Senate, without objection as to time, whenever bills have been presented for signature, or whenever it became necessary to make nominations to the Senate, at any time during the session of the respective Houses for that day.

And all this, sir, I suppose to be perfectly right, correct, and legal. There is no clause of the constitution, nor is there any law, which declares that the term of office of members of the House of Representatives shall expire at 12 o'clock at night on the 3d of March. They are to hold for two years, but the precise hour for the commencement of that term of two years is nowhere fixed by constitutional or legal provision. It has been established by usage and by inference, and very properly established, that, since the first Congress commenced its existence on the first Wednesday in March, 1789, which happened to be the 4th day of that month, therefore the 4th of March is the day of the commencement of each successive term; but no hour is fixed by law or practice. The true rule is, as I think, most undoubtedly, that the session holden on the last day constitutes the last day, for all legislative and legal purposes. While the session commenced on that day continues, the day itself continues, according to the established practice both of legislative and judicial bodies. This could not well be otherwise. If the precise moment of actual time were to settle such a matter, it would be material to ask, who shall settle the time? Shall it be done by public authority, or shall every man observe the tick of his own watch? If absolute time is to furnish a precise rule, the excess of a minute, it is obvious, would be as fatal as the excess of an hour. Sir, no bodies, judicial or legislative, have ever been so hypercritical, so astute to no purpose, so much more nice than wise, as to govern themselves by any such ideas. The session for the day, at whatever hour it commences, or at whatever hour it breaks up, is the legislative day. Every thing has reference to the commencement of that diurnal session. For instance, this is the 14th day of January; we assembled here to-day at 12 o'clock; our journal is dated January 14th, and if we should remain here until five o'clock to-morrow morning, (and the Senate has sometimes sat so late,) our proceedings would still all bear date of the 14th of January; they would be so stated upon the journal, and the journal is a record, and is a conclusive record, so far as respects the proceedings of the body.

It is so in judicial proceedings. If a man were on trial for his life, at a late hour on the last day allowed by law for the holding of the court, and the jury acquitted him, but happened to remain so long in deliberation that they did not bring in their verdict till after 12 o'clock, is it all to be held for naught, and the man to be tried over again? Are all verdicts, judgments, and orders of courts, null and void if made after midnight on the day which the law prescribes as the last day? It would be easy to show by authority, if authority could be wanted for a thing the reason of which is so clear, that the day lasts while the daily session lasts. When the court or the legislative body adjourns for that day, the day is over, and not before.

I am told, indeed, sir, that it is true that, on this same 3d day of March last, not only were other things transacted, but that the bill for the repair of the Cumberland road, an important and much-litigated measure, actually received the signature of our presiding officer after 12 o'clock, was then sent to the President, and signed by him. I do not affirm this, because I took no notice of the time, or do not remember it if I did; but I have heard the matter so stated.

I see no reason, sir, for the introduction of this new practice; no principle on which it can be justified, no necessity for it, no propriety in it. As yet, it has been applied only to the President's intercourse with the Senate. Certainly it is equally applicable to his intercourse with both Houses in legislative matters; and if it is to prevail hereafter, it is of much importance that it should be known.

The President of the United States, sir, has alluded to this loss of the fortification bill in his message at the opening of the session, and he has alluded, also, in the same message, to the rejection of the vote of the three millions. On the first point, that is, the loss of the whole bill, and the cause of that loss, this is his language:

"Much loss and inconvenience have been experienced in consequence of the failure of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, which passed one branch of the national Legislature at the last session, but was lost in the other."

If the President intended to say that the bill, having originated in the House of Representatives, passed the Senate, and was yet afterwards lost in the House of Representatives, he was entirely correct. But he has been altogether wrongly informed, if he intended to state that the bill, having passed the House, was lost in the Senate. As I have already stated, the bill was lost in the House of Representatives. It drew its last breath there. That House never let go its hold on it, after the report of the committees of conference. But it held it, it retained it, and, of course, it died in its possession when the House adjourned. It is to be regretted that the President should have been misinformed in a matter of this kind, when the slightest reference to the journals of the two Houses would have exhibited the correct history of the transaction.

I recur again, Mr. President, to the proposed grant of the three millions, for the purpose of stating, somewhat more distinctly, the true grounds of objection to that grant.

These grounds of objection were two: the first was, that no such appropriation had been recommended by the President, or any of the Departments. And what made this ground the stronger was, that the proposed grant was defended, so far as it was defended at all, upon an alleged necessity, growing out of our foreign relations. The foreign relations of the country are intrusted by the constitution to the lead and management of the executive government. The President not only is supposed to be, but usually is, much better informed on these interesting subjects than the Houses of Congress. If there be danger of rupture with a foreign State, he sees it soonest. All our ministers and agents abroad are but so many eyes, and ears, and organs, to communicate to him whatsoever occurs in foreign places, and to keep him well advised of all which may concern the interests of the United States. There is an especial propriety, therefore, that, in this branch of the public service, Congress should always be able to avail itself of the distinct opinions and recommendations of the President. The two Houses, and especially the House of Representatives, are the natural guardians of the people's money. They are to keep it sacred, and to use it discreetly. They are not at liberty to spend it where it is not needed, nor to offer it for any purpose till a reasonable occasion for the expenditure be shown. Now, in this case, I repeat again, the President had sent us no recommendation for any such appropriation; no Department had requested it; no estimate had contained it; in the whole history of the session, from the morning of the first day down to eight o'clock in the evening of the last day, not one syllable had been said to us, not one hint suggested, showing that the President deemed any such measure either necessary or proper. I state this strongly, sir, but I state it truly; I state the matter as it is; and I wish to draw the attention of the Senate and of the country strongly to this part of the case. I say, again, therefore, that when this vote for the three millions was proposed to the Senate, there was nothing before us showing that the President recommended any such appropriation. You very well know, sir, that this objection was immediately stated as soon as the message from the House was read. We all well remember that it was the very point put forth by the honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] as being, if I may say so, the butt-end of his argument in opposition to the vote. He said, very significantly, and very forcibly, "It is not asked for by those who best knew what the public service requires: how, then, are we to presume that it is needed?" This question, sir, was not answered then; it never has been answered since; it never can be answered satisfactorily.

But let me here again, sir, recur to the message of the President. Speaking of the loss of the bill, he uses these words:

"This failure was the more regretted, not only because it necessarily interrupted and delayed the progress of a system of national defence projected immediately after the last war, and since steadily pursued, but also because it contained a contingent appropriation, inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive, in aid of this important object, and other branches of the national defence, some portions of which might have been most usefully applied during the past season."

Taking these words of the message, sir, and connecting them with the fact that the President had made no recommendation to Congress of any such appropriation, it strikes me they furnish matter for very grave reflection. The President says that this proposed appropriation was "in accordance with the views of the Executive;" that it was "in aid of an important object;" and that "some portions of it might have been most usefully applied during the past season."

And now, sir, I ask, if this be so, why was not this appropriation recommended to Congress by the President? I ask this question in the name of the constitution of the United States; I stand on its own clear authority in asking it; and I invite all those who remember its injunctions, and who mean to respect them, to consider well how the question is to be answered.

Sir, the constitution is not yet an entire dead letter. There is yet some form of observance to its requirements; and even while any degree of formal respect is paid to it, I must be permitted to continue the question, why was not this appropriation recommended? It was in accordance with the President's views; it was for an important object; it might have been usefully expended. The President being of opinion, therefore, that the appropriation was necessary and proper, how is it that it was not recommended to Congress? For, sir, we all know the plain and direct words in which the very first duty of the President is imposed by the constitution. Here they are:

After enumerating the powers of the President, this is the first, the very first duty, which the constitution gravely enjoins upon him. And now, sir, in no language of taunt or reproach, in no language of party attack, in terms of no asperity or exaggeration, but called up by the necessity of defending my own vote upon the subject, I now, as a public man, as a member of Congress here in my place, and as a citizen who feels as warm an attachment to the constitution of the country as any other can, demand of any who may choose to give it, an answer to this question: "Why was not this measure, which the President declares that he thought necessary and expedient, recommended to Congress?" And why am I, and why are other members of Congress, whose path of duty, the constitution says, shall be enlightened by the President's opinions and communications, to be charged with want of patriotism and want of fidelity to the country, because we refused an appropriation which the President, though it was in accordance with his views, and though he believed it important, would not, and did not, recommend to us? When these questions are answered, sir, to the satisfaction of intelligent and impartial men, then, and not till then, let reproach, let censure, let suspicion of any kind, rest on the twenty-nine names which stand opposed to this appropriation.

How, sir, were we to know that this appropriation "was in accordance with the views of the Executive?" He had not so told us, formally or informally. He had not only not recommended it to Congress, or either House of Congress, but nobody on this floor had undertaken to speak in his behalf. No man got up to say, "The President desires this; he thinks it necessary, expedient, and proper." But, sir, if any gentleman had risen to say this, it would not have answered the requisition of the constitution. Not at all. It is not a hint, an intimation, the suggestion of a friend, by which the executive duty in this respect is to be fulfilled. By no means. The President is to make a recommendation, a public recommendation, an official recommendation, a responsible recommendation; not to one House, but to both Houses; it is to be a recommendation to Congress. If, on receiving such recommendation, Congress fail to pay it proper respect, the fault is theirs. If, deeming the measure necessary and expedient, the President fail to recommend it, the fault is his; clearly, distinctly, and exclusively his. This, sir, is the constitution of the United States, or else I do not understand the constitution of the United States. Does not every man see how perfectly unconstitutional it is that the President should communicate his opinions or wishes to Congress on such grave and important subjects, otherwise than by a direct and responsible recommendation; a public and open recommendation, equally addressed and equally known to all whose duty calls upon them to act on the subject? What would be the state of things if he might communicate his wishes or opinions privately to members of one House, and make no such communication to members of the other? Would not the two Houses be necessarily put in immediate collision? Would they stand on equal footing? Would they have equal information? What could ensue from such a manner of conducting the public business but quarrel, confusion, and conflict? A member rises in the House of Representatives, and moves a very large appropriation of money for military purposes. If he says he does it upon executive recommendation, where is his voucher? The President is not like the British King, whose ministers and secretaries are in the House of Commons, and who are authorized, in certain cases, to express the opinions and wishes of their sovereign. We have no King's servants; at least we have none known to the constitution. Congress can know the opinions of the President only as he officially communicates them. It would be a curious inquiry in either House, when a large appropriation is moved, if it were necessary to ask whether the mover represented the President, spoke his sentiments, or, in other words, whether what he proposed were "in accordance with the views of the Executive." How could that be judged of? By the party he belongs to? Party is not quite unique enough for that. By the airs he gives himself? Many might assume airs, if thereby they could give themselves such importance as to be esteemed authentic expositors of the executive will. Or is this will to be circulated in whispers? made known to meetings of party men? intimated through the press? or communicated in any other form, which still leaves the Executive completely irresponsible? So that while executive purposes or wishes pervade the ranks of party friends, influence their conduct, and unite their efforts, the open, direct, and constitutional responsibility is wholly avoided. Sir, this is not the constitution of the United States, nor can it be consistent with any constitution which professes to maintain separate departments in the Government.

Here, then, sir, is abundant ground, in my judgment, for the vote of the Senate, and here I might rest it. But there is also another ground. The constitution declares that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. What is meant by "appropriations?" Does this language not mean that particular sums shall be assigned, by law, to particular objects? How far this pointing out and fixing the particular objects shall be carried, is a question that cannot be settled by any precise rule. But "specific appropriation," that is to say, the designation of every object for which money is voted, as far as such designation is practicable, has been thought to be a most important republican principle. In times past, popular parties have claimed great merit from professing to carry this doctrine much farther, and to adhere to it much more strictly, than their adversaries. Mr. Jefferson, especially, was a great advocate for it, and held it to be indispensable to a safe and economical administration and disbursement of the public revenues.

But what have the friends and admirers of Mr. Jefferson to say to this appropriation. Where do they find, in this proposed grant of three millions, designation of object, and particular and specific application of money? Have they forgotten, all forgotten, and wholly abandoned, even all pretence for specific appropriation? If not, how could they sanction such a vote as this? Let me recall its terms. They are, that "the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and to increase the navy: provided such expenditure shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

In the first place it is to be observed, that whether the money shall be used at all or not, is made to depend on the discretion of the President. This is sufficiently liberal. It carries confidence far enough. But, if there had been no other objections, if the objects of the appropriation had been sufficiently described, so that the President, if he expended the money at all, must have expended it for purposes authorized by the Legislature, and nothing had been left to his discretion but the question, whether an emergency had arisen in which the authority ought to be exercised, I might not have felt bound to reject the vote. There are some precedents which might favor such a contingent provision, though the practice is dangerous, and ought not to be followed except in cases of clear necessity.

But the insurmountable objection to the proposed grant was, that it specified no objects. It was as general as language could make it. It embraced every expenditure that could be called either military or naval. It was to include "fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy;" but it was not confined to these. It embraced the whole general subject of military service. Under the authority of such a law, the President might repair ships, build ships, buy ships, enlist seamen, and do any thing and every thing else touching the naval service, without restraint or control.

He might repair such fortifications as he saw fit, and neglect the rest; arm such as he saw fit, and neglect the arming of others; or build new fortifications wherever he chose. And yet these unlimited powers over the fortifications and the navy constitute, by no means, the most dangerous part of the proposed authority; because, under that authority, his power to raise and employ land forces was equally absolute and uncontrolled. He might levy troops, embody a new army, call out the militia in numbers to suit his own discretion, and employ them as he saw fit.

Now, sir, does our legislation, under our constitution, furnish any precedent for all this?

We make appropriations for the army, and we understand what we are doing, because it is "the army," that is to say, the army established by law. We make appropriations for the navy; they, too, are for "the navy," as provided for and established by law. We make appropriations for fortifications, but we say what fortifications, and we assign to each its intended amount of the whole sum. This is the usual course of Congress on such subjects; and why should it be departed from? Are we ready to say that the power of fixing the places for new fortifications, and the sum allotted to each; the power of ordering new ships to be built, and fixing the number of such new ships; the power of laying out money to raise men for the army; in short, every power, great and small, respecting the military and naval service, shall be vested in the President, without specification of object or purpose, to the entire exclusion of the exercise of all judgment on the part of Congress? For one, I am not prepared. The honorable member from Ohio, near me, has said that if the enemy had been on our shores he would not have agreed to this vote. And I say, if the proposition were now before us, and the guns of the enemy were battering against the walls of the Capitol, I would not agree to it.

The people of this country have an interest, a property, an inheritance, in this instrument, against the value of which forty capitolis do not weigh the twentieth part of one poor scruple. There can never be any necessity for such proceedings but a feigned and false necessity, a mere idle and hollow pretence of necessity; least of all can it be said that any such necessity actually existed on the 3d of March. There was no enemy on our shores; there were no guns pointed against the Capitol; we were in no war, nor was there a reasonable probability that we should have war, unless we made it ourselves.

But whatever was the state of our foreign relations, is it not preposterous to say that it was necessary for Congress to adopt this measure, and yet not necessary for the President to recommend it? Why should we thus run in advance of all our own duties, and leave the President completely shielded from his own just responsibility? Why should there be nothing but grant, and trust, and confidence, on our side, and nothing but discretion and power on his?

Sir, if there be any philosophy in history, if human blood still runs in human veins, if man still conforms to the identity of his nature, the institutions which secure constitutional liberty can never stand long against this excessive personal confidence, against this devotion to men, in utter disregard both of principle and of experience, which seems to me to be strongly characteristic of our times. This vote came to us, sir, from the popular branch of the Legislature; and that such a vote should come from such a branch of the Legislature was among the circumstances which excited in me the greatest surprise and the deepest concern. Certainly, sir, certainly, I was not, on that account, the more inclined to concur. It was no argument with me that others seemed to be rushing, with such heedless, headlong trust, such impetuosity of confidence, into the arms of executive power. I held back the stronger, and would hold back the longer, for that very reason. I see, or think I see, it is either a true vision of the future, revealed by the history of the past, or, if it be an illusion, it is an illusion which appears to me in all the brightness and sunlight of broad noon, that it is in this career of personal confidence, along this beaten track of man-worship, marked, every furlong, by the fragments of other free Governments, that our own system is making progress towards its end. A personal popularity, honorably earned, at first, by military achievements, and sustained now by party, by patronage, and by an enthusiasm which looks for no ill, because it means no ill itself, seems to render men willing to gratify power, long before its demands are made, and to surfeit executive discretion, even in anticipation of its own appetite. Sir, if, on the 3d of March last, it had been the purpose of both Houses of Congress to create a military dictator, what formula had been better suited to their purpose than this vote of the House? It is true we might have given more money if we had had it to give. We might have emptied the treasury; but as to the form of the gift we could not have bettered it. Rome has no better models. When we give our money for any military purpose whatever, what remains to be done? If we leave it with one man to decide not only whether the military means of the country shall be used at all, but how they shall be used, and to what extent they shall be employed, what remains either for Congress or the people but to sit still and see how this dictatorial power will be exercised? On the 3d of March, sir, I had not forgotten—it was impossible that I should have forgotten—the recommendation in the message at the opening of that session, that power should be vested in the President to issue letters of marque and reprisal against France, at his discretion, in the recess of Congress. Happily this power was not granted. But suppose it had been, what would then have been the true condition of this Government? Why, sir, this condition is very shortly described. The whole war power would have been in the hands of the President; for no man can doubt a moment that reprisals would bring on immediate war; and the treasury, to the amount of this vote, in addition to all ordinary appropriations, would have been at his absolute disposal also. And all this in time of peace. I beseech sober men, sir, of all parties, I beseech all true lovers of constitutional liberty, to contemplate this state of things, and tell me whether such be a true republican administration of this Government. Whether particular consequences had ensued or not, is such an accumulation of power in the hands of the Executive according to the spirit of our system? Is it either wise or safe? Has it any warrant in the practice of former times? Or are gentlemen ready to establish the practice as an example for the benefit of those who are to come after us?

But, sir, if the power to make reprisals, and this money from the treasury, had both been granted, is there not great reason to believe that we should have been now up to our ears in a hot war? I think there is great reason to believe this. It will be said, I know, that if we had armed the President with this power of war, and supplied him with this grant of money, France would have taken this for such a proof of spirit on our part that she would have paid the indemnity without further delay. This is the old story, and the old plea. Every one who desires more power than the constitution or the laws give him, always says, that if he had more power, he could do more good. Power is always claimed for the good of the people; and dictators are always made, when made at all, for the good of the people. For my part, sir, I was content, and am content, to show to France that we are prepared to maintain our just rights against her, by the exertion of our power, when need be, according to the forms of our own constitution; that, if we make war, we will make it constitutionally; and if we vote money, we will appropriate it constitutionally; and that we will trust all our interests, both in peace and in war, to what the intelligence and strength of the country may do for them, without breaking down or endangering the fabric of free institutions.

Mr. President, it is the misfortune of the Senate to have differed with the President on many great questions during the last four or five years. I have regretted this state of things deeply, both on personal and on public account; but it has been unavoidable. It is no pleasant employment, it is no holiday business, to maintain opposition against power and against majorities, and to contend for stern and sturdy principle, against personal popularity, against a rushing and overwhelming confidence, that, by wave upon wave, and cataract after cataract, seems to be bearing away and destroying whatsoever would withstand it. How much longer we may be able to support this opposition in any degree, or whether we can possibly hold out till the public intelligence and the public patriotism shall be awakened to a due sense of the public danger, it is not for me to foresee or to foretell. I shall not despair to the last, if, in the mean time, we be true to our own principles. If there be a steadfast adherence to those principles, both here and elsewhere, if, one and all, they continue the rule of our conduct in the Senate, and the rallying point of those who think with us and support us out of the Senate, I am content to hope on, and to struggle on. While it remains a contest for the preservation of the constitution, for the security of the public liberty, for the ascendancy of principle over men, I am willing to hear my part in it. If we can maintain the constitution, if we can preserve this security for liberty, if we can thus give to true principle its just superiority over party, over persons, over names, our labors will be richly rewarded. If we fail in all this, they are already among the living, who will write the history of this Government, from its commencement to its close.

When Mr. WEBSTER had concluded,

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that, after the expulsion of the Tarquins, the kingly power was abolished at Rome. The great dread at Rome was the dread of the kingly name, from which the Romans thought the greatest danger to the republic was to be apprehended. The danger to Rome, however, was not in the kingly name; for, so odious had the name become, that, in the very worst days of the republic, it could never have been revived. Here was the error committed by the gentleman from Massachusetts—the dread of the kingly power, from which no danger could be apprehended in this Government. It was the patrician class—a moneyed aristocracy—a combination of their political leaders, seeking to establish an aristocratic Government, regardless of the welfare of the people, that was more to be dreaded than the power of any single man. There was the situation under which they were placed in that House. The administration was daily subject to the most violent attacks from these political leaders, who were men of established character, of intellectual acquirements, and acknowledged standing in society; yet the course of these leaders was not to be impugned, lest (said Mr. C.) we infringe the rules of order.

Here Mr. C. yielded the floor to a motion for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned to Monday.

UNITED STATES AND FRANCE.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his secretary.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Gentlemen: In my message at the opening of your session I informed you that our chargé d'affaires at Paris had been instructed to ask for the final determination of the French Government, in relation to the payment of the indemnification secured by the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, and that when advices of the result should be received it would be made the subject of a special communication.

In execution of this design, I now transmit to you the papers numbered from one to thirteen, inclusive, containing, among other things, the correspondence on this subject between our chargé d'affaires and the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, from which it will be seen that France requires, as a condition precedent to the execution of a treaty unconditionally ratified, and to the payment of a debt acknowledged by all the branches of her Government to be due, that certain explanations shall be made, of which she dictates the terms. These terms are such as that Government has already been officially informed cannot be complied with; and, if persisted in, they must be considered as a deliberate refusal on the part of France to fulfil engagements binding by the laws of nations, and held sacred by the whole civilized world. The nature of the act which France requires from this Government is clearly set forth in the letter of the French minister, marked No. 4. "We will pay the money," says he, "when the Government of the United States is ready, on its part, to declare to us, by addressing its claim to us officially, in writing, that it regrets the misunderstanding which has arisen between the two countries; that this misunderstanding is founded on a mistake; that it never entered into its intention to call in question the good faith of the French Government, nor to take a menacing attitude towards France;" and he adds, "if the Government of the United States does not give this assurance, we shall be obliged to think that this misunderstanding is not the result of an error." In the letter marked No. 6, the French minister also remarks, "that the Government of the United States knows that upon itself depends henceforward the execution of the treaty of July 4, 1831."

Obliged, by the precise language thus used by the French minister, to view it as a peremptory refusal to execute the treaty, except on terms incompatible with the honor and independence of the United States, and persuaded that, on considering the correspondence now submitted to you, you can regard it in no other light, it becomes my duty to call your attention to such measures as the exigency of the case demands, if the claim of interfering in the communications between the different branches of our Government shall be persisted in. This pretension is rendered the more unreasonable by the fact that the substance of the required explanation has been repeatedly and voluntarily given, before it was insisted on as a condition—a condition the more humiliating, because it is demanded as the equivalent of a pecuniary consideration. Does France desire only a declaration that we had no intention to obtain our rights by an address to her fears rather than to her justice? She has already had it, frankly and explicitly given by our minister accredited to her Government, his act ratified by me, and my confirmation of it officially communicated by him, in his letter to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs of the 25th of April, 1835, and repeated by my published approval of that letter after the passage of the bill of indemnification. Does France want a degrading, servile repetition of this act, in terms which she shall dictate, and which will involve an acknowledgment of her assumed right to interfere in our domestic councils? She will never obtain it. The spirit of the American people, the dignity of the Legislature, and the firm resolve of their executive Government, forbid it.

As the answer of the French minister to our chargé d'affaires at Paris contains an allusion to a letter addressed by him to the representative of France at this place, it now becomes proper to lay before you the correspondence had between that functionary and the Secretary of State, relative to that letter, and to accompany the same with such explanations as will enable you to understand the course of the Executive in regard to it. Recurring to the historical statement made at the commencement of your session, of the origin and progress of our difficulties with France, it will be recollected that, on the return of our minister to the United States, I caused my official approval of the explanations he had given to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to be made public. As the French Government had noticed the message without its being officially communicated, it was not doubted that, if they were disposed to pay the money due to us, they would notice any public explanation of the Government of the United States in the same way. But, contrary to these well-founded expectations, the French ministry did not take this fair opportunity to relieve themselves from their unfortunate position, and to do justice to the United States.

Whilst, however, the Government of the United States was awaiting the movements of the French Government, in perfect confidence that the difficulty was at an end, the Secretary of State received a call from the French chargé d'affaires in Washington, who desired to read to him a letter he had received from the French Minister of Foreign Affairs. He was asked whether he was instructed or directed to make any official communication, and replied that he was only authorized to read the letter, and furnish a copy if requested. The substance of its contents, it is presumed, may be gathered from Nos. 4 and 6, herewith transmitted. It was an attempt to make known to the Government of the United States, privately, in what manner it could make explanations, apparently voluntary, but really dictated by France, acceptable to her, and thus obtain payment of the twenty-five millions of francs. No exception was taken to this mode of communication, which is often used to prepare the way for official intercourse, but the suggestions made in it were, in their substance, wholly inadmissible. Not being in the shape of an official communication to this Government, it did not admit of reply or official notice, nor could it safely be made the basis of any action by the Executive or the Legislature; and the Secretary of State did not think proper to ask a copy, because he could have no use for it. Copies of papers, marked Nos. 9, 10, and 11, show an attempt on the part of the French chargé d'affaires, many weeks afterwards, to place a copy of this paper among the archives of this Government, which, for obvious reasons, was not allowed to be done; but the assurance before given was repeated, that any official communication which he might be authorized to make in the accustomed form would receive a prompt and just consideration. The indiscretion of this attempt was made more manifest by the subsequent avowal of the French chargé d'affaires, that the object was to bring the letter before Congress and the American people. If foreign agents, on a subject of disagreement between their Government and this, wish to prefer an appeal to the American people, they will hereafter, it is hoped, better appreciate their own rights, and the respect due to others, than to attempt to use the Executive as the passive organ of their communications. It is due to the character of our institutions that the diplomatic intercourse of this Government should be conducted with the utmost directness and simplicity, and that, in all cases of importance, the communications received or made by the Executive should assume the accustomed official form. It is only by insisting on this form that foreign Powers can be held to full responsibility; that their communications can be officially replied to; or that the advice or interference of the Legislature can, with propriety, be invited by the President. This course is also best calculated, on the one hand, to shield that officer from unjust suspicions; and, on the other, to subject this portion of his acts to public scrutiny, and, if occasion shall require it, to constitutional animadversion. It was the more necessary to adhere to these principles in the instance in question, inasmuch as, in addition to other important interests, it very intimately concerned the national honor; a matter, in my judgment, much too sacred to be made the subject of private and unofficial negotiation.

It will be perceived that this letter of the French

Minister of Foreign Affairs was read to the Secretary of State on the 11th of September last. This was the first authentic indication of the specific views of the French Government received by the Government of the United States after the passage of the bill of indemnification. Inasmuch as the letter had been written before the official notice of my approval of Mr. Livingston's last explanation and remonstrance could have reached Paris, just ground of hope was left, as has been before stated, that the French Government, on receiving that information in the same manner the alleged offending message had reached them, would desist from their extraordinary demand, and pay the money at once. To give them an opportunity to do so, and, at all events, to elicit their final determination, and the ground they intended to occupy, the instructions were given to our chargé d'affaires which were adverted to at the commencement of the present session of Congress. The result, as you have seen, is a demand of an official written expression of regrets, and a direct explanation addressed to France, with a distinct intimation that this is a sine qua non.

Mr. Barton having, in pursuance of his instructions, returned to the United States, and the chargé d'affaires of France having been recalled, all diplomatic intercourse between the two countries is suspended—a state of things originating in an unreasonable susceptibility on the part of the French Government, and rendered necessary on our part by their refusal to perform engagements contained in a treaty, from the faithful performance of which by us they are to this day enjoying many important commercial advantages.

It is time that this unequal position of affairs should cease, and that legislative action should be brought to sustain executive exertion in such measures as the case requires. While France persists in her refusal to comply with the terms of a treaty, the object of which was, by removing all causes of mutual complaint, to renew ancient feelings of friendship, and to unite the two nations in the bonds of amity, and of a mutually beneficial commerce, she cannot justly complain if we adopt such peaceful remedies as the law of nations and the circumstances of the case may authorize and demand. Of the nature of these remedies I have heretofore had occasion to speak; and, in reference to a particular contingency, to express my conviction that reprisals would be best adapted to the emergency then contemplated. Since that period, France, by all the departments of her Government, has acknowledged the validity of our claims and the obligations of the treaty, and has appropriated the moneys which are necessary to its execution; and though payment is withheld on grounds vitally important to our existence as an independent nation, it is not to be believed that she can have determined permanently to retain a position so utterly indefensible. In the altered state of the questions in controversy, and under all existing circumstances, it appears to me that, until such a determination shall have become evident, it will be proper and sufficient to retaliate her present refusal to comply with her engagements by prohibiting the introduction of French products and the entry of French vessels into our ports. Between this and the interdiction of all commercial intercourse, or other remedies, you, as the representatives of the people, must determine. I recommend the former, in the present posture of our affairs, as being the least injurious to our commerce, and as attended with the least difficulty of returning to the usual state of friendly intercourse, if the Government of France shall render us the justice that is due; and also as a proper preliminary step to stronger measures, should their adoption be rendered necessary by subsequent events.

The return of our chargé d'affaires is attended with public notices of naval preparations on the part of France, destined for our seas. Of the cause and intent of these armaments I have no authentic information, nor any other means of judging, except such as are common to yourselves and to the public; but whatever may be their object, we are not at liberty to regard them as unconnected with the measures which hostile movements on the part of France may compel us to pursue. They at least deserve to be met by adequate preparations on our part, and I therefore strongly urge large and speedy appropriations for the increase of the navy, and the completion of our coast defences.

If this array of military force be really designed to affect the action of the Government and people of the United States on the questions now pending between the two nations, then indeed would it be dishonorable to pause a moment on the alternative which such a state of things would present to us. Come what may, the explanation which France demands can never be accorded; and no armament, however powerful and imposing, at a distance, or on our coast, will, I trust, deter us from discharging the high duties which we owe to our constituents, to our national character, and to the world.

The House of Representatives, at the close of the last session of Congress, unanimously resolved that the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on by the United States. It is due to the welfare of the human race, not less than to our own interests and honor, that this resolution should, at all hazards, be adhered to. If, after so signal an example as that given by the American people during their long-protracted difficulties with France, of forbearance under accumulated wrongs, and of generous confidence in her ultimate return to justice, she shall now be permitted to withhold from us the tardy and imperfect indemnification which, after years of remonstrance and discussion, had at length been solemnly agreed on by the treaty of 1831, and to set at naught the obligation it imposes, the United States will not be the only sufferers. The efforts of humanity and religion to substitute the appeals of justice and the arbitrament of reason for the coercive measures usually resorted to by injured nations will receive little encouragement from such an issue. By the selection and enforcement of such lawful and expedient measures as may be necessary to prevent a result so injurious to ourselves, and so fatal to the hopes of the philanthropist, we shall therefore not only preserve the pecuniary interests of our citizens, the independence of our Government, and the honor of our country, but do much, it may be hoped, to vindicate the faith of treaties, and to promote the general interests of peace, civilization, and improvement.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, January 15, 1836.

The following message was also received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with the papers therein referred to, which, with those accompanying the special message this day sent to Congress, are believed to contain all the information requested. The papers relative to the letter of the late minister of France have been added to those called for, that the subject may be fully understood.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1836.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 13, 1836.To the President of the United States:

The Secretary of State has the honor to lay before the President a copy of a report made to him in June last, and of a letter addressed to this Department by the late minister of the Government of France, with the correspondence connected with that communication, which, together with a late correspondence between the Secretary of State and the French chargé d'affaires, and a recent correspondence between the chargé d'affaires of the United States at Paris and the Duke de Broglie, already transmitted to the President to be communicated to Congress with his special message relative thereto, are the only papers in the Department of State supposed to be called for by the resolutions of the Senate of the 12th instant.

It will be seen by the correspondence with the chargé d'affaires of France, that a despatch to him from the Duke de Broglie was read to the Secretary, at the Department, in September last. It concluded with an authority to permit a copy to be taken if it was desired. That despatch being an argumentative answer to the last letter of Mr. Livingston to the French Government, and in affirmation of the right of France to expect explanations of the message of the President, which France had been distinctly and timely informed could not be given without a disregard by the Chief Magistrate of his constitutional obligations, no desire was expressed to obtain a copy: it being obviously improper to receive an argument in a form which admitted of no reply, and necessarily unavailing to inquire how much or how little would satisfy France, when her right to any such explanation had been, beforehand, so distinctly and formally denied.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN FORSYTH.

The above messages and documents having been read, Mr. CLAY moved that the message, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Whereupon,

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he had been so much gratified with the message which had just been read that he could not, and he thought he ought not, at this the very first moment, to refrain from expressing his entire approbation of its general tone and spirit. He had watched with intense anxiety the progress of our unfortunate controversy with France. He had hoped, sincerely hoped, that the explanations which had been made by Mr. Livingston, and officially approved by the President of the United States, would have proved satisfactory to the French Government. In this he had found his hopes to be vain. After this effort had failed, he felt a degree of confidence, almost amounting to moral assurance, that the last message to Congress would have been hailed by France, as it was by the American people, as the olive branch which would have restored amity and good understanding between us and our ancient ally. Even in this, he feared he was again doomed to be disappointed. The Government of France, unless they change their determination, will not consider this message as sufficient. We have the terms clearly prescribed by the Duke de Broglie, upon which, and upon which alone, the French Government will consent to comply with the treaty, and to pay the five millions of dollars to our injured fellow-citizens. Speculation is now at an end. The clouds and darkness which have hung over this question have vanished. It is now made clear as a sunbeam. The money will not be paid, says the organ of the French Government, unless the Government of the United States shall address its claim officially in writing to France, accompanied by what appeared to him, and he believed would appear to the whole American people, without distinction of party, to be a degrading apology. The striking peculiarity of the case, the one which he would undertake to say distinguished it from any other case which had arisen in modern times, in the intercourse between independent nations, was, that the very terms of this apology were dictated to the American Government by the French Secretary for Foreign Affairs. One of these terms was, that it had never entered into the intention, (pensee), the thought, of this Government, to call in question the good faith of the Government of France.

But the French Government proceed still further. Upon the refusal to make this apology, which they ought to have known would never be made—could never be made—they are not content to leave the question where it then was. They have given us notice in advance that they will consider our refusal to make this degrading apology an evidence that the misunderstanding did not proceed on our part from mere error and mistake.

In addition to all this, the last note of the Duke de Broglie to Mr. Barton declares that the Government of the United States knows that henceforward the execution of the treaty must depend upon itself. They thus leave us to decide whether we shall make the apology in the prescribed terms, or abandon our claim to the fulfilment of the treaty.

He would not allow himself to express the feelings which were excited in his mind upon hearing these letters of the Duke de Broglie read. Most sincerely, most ardently, did he hope that the French Government, when this message reached them, if not before, might reconsider their determination, and that all our difficulties might yet pass away. But their language is now clear, specific, incapable of ambiguity or doubt. It would, then, become our duty calmly, but firmly, to take such a stand as the interests and the honor of the country may require.

Mr. B. had already said much more than he intended when he rose. He would, however, make another remark before he took his seat. He felt a proper degree of confidence, he might add a great degree of confidence, in the President of the United States. He knew him to be honest and firm, and faithful to his country; prompt to resent its injuries and avenge its wrongs. He confessed he had anticipated a message of a stronger character. He had supposed that a general non-intercourse with France would, at least, have been recommended. But the recommendation was confined to the mere refusal to admit French ships or French productions to enter our ports. It left France free to receive her supplies of cotton from the United States, without which the manufacturers of that country could not exist. This was wise; it was prudent. It left to France to judge for herself, if this unnatural contest must still continue, whether she would close her ports against our vessels and our productions.

In the spring of 1832, (Mr. B. did not recollect precisely the time,) Congress passed an act to carry into effect our part of the treaty. Under this treaty, the wines of France had ever since been admitted into the United States upon the favorable terms therein stipulated. Her silks were imported free of duty, in contradistinction to those which came from beyond the Cape of Good Hope. She had for years been enjoying these privileges. Nothing milder, then, could possibly be recommended than to withdraw these advantages from her, and to exclude her vessels and her productions from our ports.

When Mr. BUCHANAN had concluded,

Mr. CALHOUN rose and said:

I rise (said Mr. C.) with feelings entirely different from those of the Senator from Pennsylvania. He said he never listened to any message with greater satisfaction than the present. That which has excited such agreeable sensations in his breast, I have heard with the most profound regret. Never did I listen to a document with more melancholy feelings, with a single exception, the war message from the same quarter a few years since, against one of the sovereign members of this confederacy.

I arrived here (said Mr. C.) at the beginning of the session, with a strong conviction that there would be no war. I saw, indeed, many unfavorable and hostile indications; but I thought the cause of difference between the two nations was too trivial to terminate so disastrously. I could not believe that two great and enlightened nations, blessed with constitutional Governments, and between whom so many endearing recollections existed to bind together in mutual sympathy and kindness, would, at this advanced stage of civilization, plunge into war for a cause so frivolous. With this impression, notwithstanding all I saw and heard, I still believed peace would be preserved; but the message, and the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania, have dispelled the delusion. I will not undertake to pronounce with certainty that war is intended, but I will say that, if the recommendations of the President be adopted, it will be almost inevitable.

I fear (said Mr. C.) that the condition in which the country is now placed has been the result of a deliberate and systematic policy. I am bound to speak my sentiments freely. It is due to my constituents and the country to act with perfect candor and truth on a question in which their interest is so deeply involved. I will not assert that the Executive has deliberately aimed at war from the commencement; but I will say that, from the beginning of the controversy to the present moment, the course which the President has pursued is precisely the one calculated to terminate in a conflict between the two nations. It has been in his power, at every period, to give the controversy a direction by which the peace of the country might be preserved, without the least sacrifice of reputation or honor; but he has preferred the opposite. I feel (said Mr. C.) how painful it is to make these declarations; how unpleasant it is to occupy a position which might, by any possibility, be construed in opposition to our country's cause; but, in my conception, the honor and the interests of the country can only be maintained by pursuing the course that truth and justice may dictate. Acting under this impression, I do not hesitate to assert, after a careful examination of the documents connected with this unhappy controversy, that, if war must come, we are the authors—we are the responsible party. Standing, as I fear we do, on the eve of a conflict, it would to me have been a source of pride and pleasure to make an opposite declaration; but that sacred regard to truth and justice, which, I trust, will ever be my guide under the most difficult circumstances, would not permit.

I cannot (said Mr. C.) but call back to my recollection the position which I occupied twenty-four years since, as a member of the other House. We were then, as I fear we are now, on the eve of a war with a great and powerful nation. My voice then was raised for war, because I then believed that justice, honor, and necessity, demanded it. It is now raised for peace, because I am under the most solemn conviction that, by going to war, we would sacrifice justice, honor, and interest. The same motive which then impelled to war now impels to peace.

I have not (said Mr. C.) made this assertion lightly. It is the result of mature and deliberate reflection. It is not my intention to enter into a minute examination of that unhappy train of events which has brought the country to its present situation; but I will briefly touch on a few prominent points, beginning with that most unfortunate negotiation, which seems destined to terminate so disastrously for the country.

From the accession of the present King, his ministry avowed itself favorable to the settlement of our claims. It could scarcely be otherwise. The King had just been raised to the throne, under a revolution originating in popular impulses, which could not but dispose him favorably towards us. Lafayette at the time possessed much power and influence, and had greatly contributed to elevate Louis Philippe to his present station. His feelings were known to be decidedly favorable to us. But with all this favorable inclination, the ministry were fearful of concluding a treaty. They dreaded the Chambers; they knew how odious all treaties of indemnity were to the entire French nation, and how difficult it would be to bring the Chambers to agree to make an appropriation to carry a treaty of indemnity into effect, even with our country. With these impressions, they frankly stated to Mr. Rives, our minister, that the difficulty was not with them, but with the Chambers; that if a treaty were made, it could not be carried into effect without a vote of appropriation from the Chambers; and it was very doubtful whether such a vote could be obtained. These declarations were not made once or twice; they were repeated again and again, throughout every stage of the negotiation, and never more emphatically than in the very last, just before the conclusion of the treaty.

The President of the Council, M. Perrier, in a conversation with Mr. Rives, at that late period, stated that there would be no difficulty in arranging the question, were it not that he feared opposition on the part of the Chambers, which might place the relation between the two countries in a more dangerous state, by refusing to make the appropriation. How prophetic! as if he had foreseen what has since come to pass. I do not profess to give his words; I did not anticipate the discussion, and have not come prepared with documents; but what I state is substantially what he said. With this apprehension, he asked our minister to wait the short period of two months, for the meeting of the Chambers, that they might be consulted before the conclusion of the treaty, in order to avoid the possibility of the embarrassment which has since occurred, and which has so dangerously embroiled the relations of the two countries. Mr. Rives objected, and the treaty was concluded.*

* Extract of a part of the correspondence between Mr. Rives and the French minister during the negotiation, taken from the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations during the last session:

It appears, from a despatch of Mr. Rives to the Secretary of State, under date the 18th of September, 1830, at his first interview with the French Secretary of Foreign Affairs, after the revolution which placed the present King of France on the throne, that this French minister said that he thought that the principle of indemnity would be admitted, but that the amount of the claims was a very complex question, depending on a great variety of considerations, and requiring minute and detailed examination; "that he believed our claims would encounter much less opposition with the Government (meaning the King and his ministers) than with the Chambers; that he had thought of an organization of a commission to examine the subject, consisting of members of both Chambers, as the best means of preparing those bodies for an ultimate decision; and he should submit the proposition at an early day to the council." In a subsequent despatch of Mr. Rives, of the 9th November, 1830, he says, "the dispositions of the King, as well with regard to this subject (the American claims) as to the general relations between the two countries, are every thing we could desire. The difficulty exists in the extreme reluctance of the nation to pay any more indemnities, and the necessity which the Government feels itself under of consulting the repre-

Now, I submit (said Mr. C.) to every man of integrity and honor, whether we, in accepting the treaty after these repeated declarations, did not accept it subject to the condition which they implied; that is, whether, in point of fact, the stipulation of the French Executive ought not to be fairly construed, with these declarations sentatives of the nation, and of securing their approbation to any arrangement which may be ultimately concluded. The commission, of the formation of which I have already apprized you, has grown entirely out of this feeling."

On the occasion of an audience with the King, Mr. Rives, in his despatch of the 18th January, 1831, says that the King, in replying to his remarks, "reiterated the sentiments he had heretofore expressed to me, and referred to the measures he had taken, with a view to bring the differences between the two countries to a conclusion." * * * * "The King proceeded to say that, since the reading of the President's message, he had 'remonstrated' against all unnecessary delays in the prosecution of the business, and assured me that every thing should be done, on his part, to bring it to the earliest termination, notwithstanding the disastrous state of their finances."

The commission appointed to examine our claims made their report. The majority of four, rejecting our claims growing out of the Berlin and Milan decrees, as well as the Rambouillet and other special decrees, estimated the sum to which they supposed the United States to be fairly entitled, according to Mr. Rives, at between ten and fifteen millions of francs, and the minority of two, admitting the claims rejected by their colleagues, at thirty millions. In an interview between the French Minister of Foreign Affairs and Mr. Rives, described in his despatch of the 28th April, 1831, the minister "spoke of the intrinsic difficulty of all money questions in a representative Government, increased in the present instance by the almost unanimous report of the commission." In another interview with the President of the Council of Ministers, described in the same despatch of Mr. Rives, M. Perrier said: "He felt all the importance of cultivating good relations with the United States, and that he was sincerely desirous of adjusting this ancient controversy; but that their finances, as I saw, were exceedingly deranged, and that there would be great difficulty in reconciling the Chamber of Deputies to an additional charge on the enfeebled resources of the State, for claims, too, which had not arisen from any wrong done by the present Government of France." In the same despatch Mr. Rives reports: "The King expressed, as he has always done, very cordial sentiments for the United States; said he had frequently called the attention of his ministers to the necessity of settling our reclamations; that they had always objected the embarrassed state of the finances; but he hoped they would yet find the means of doing justice."

In a despatch of Mr. Rives, of the 7th of May, 1831, communicating the offer of twenty millions of francs, in full satisfaction of our claims, and his declining to accept it, he states the French minister to have replied, "that the offer he had just made was one of extreme liberality; that it would subject the ministers to a severe responsibility before the Chambers; that he had been already warned, from various quarters, that he would be held to a strict account for his settlement of this affair." In the same despatch Mr. Rives details a conversation which he had had with the President of the Council, respecting the amount of our claims, in which he said "that it was particularly hard that the burden of their adjustment should now fall upon the existing Government, in the present crippled state of its resources, and when all its expenses were upon a war footing; and made at the formation of the treaty, to amount simply to an engagement to use his best endeavors to obtain the assent of the Chambers to the appropriation. Such would certainly be the understanding, in a similar case, between honorable and conscientious individuals; and such, I apprehend, will be the opinion hereafter, when passions shall have subsided, of every impartial inquirer after truth.

The question (said Mr. C.) is now presented, has the French Executive complied with his promise? Has he honorably, faithfully, and earnestly, endeavored to obtain the assent of the Chambers? To these questions I shall not reply. I leave the answer to our Executive and to our ministers. They have explicitly and honorably acquitted the French Executive on this important point.

But (said Mr. C.) let us turn to the conduct of our own Executive in relation to this important part of the controversy. If the implied obligation on the part of the French Executive was such as I suppose, there was a corresponding one on the part of ours, to interpose no obstacle in obtaining the assent of the Chamber. How stands the fact? Mr. Rives, in communicating to our Executive the result of the negotiation, boasted of his skill, and the advantage which he had acquired over the French negotiators. I pass him by. It was, perhaps, natural for him to boast. What does the Executive do? With a full knowledge of all the facts, forewarned of the difficulty which the French ministry would have to encounter in the Chambers, he publishes to the world this boastful communication, which produced a sensation in France such as might have been expected, which increased in the same proportion the that it was certainly not the interest of either country to make an arrangement which the legislative authority here might refuse to carry into execution."

In another despatch of Mr. Rives, of the 29th of May, 1831, he relates a conversation in an interview with the President of the Council. That minister, Mr. Rives states, "then said that, but for the Chambers, there would be less difficulty in arranging this question, but that he apprehended a very serious opposition to it on their part, which might even more seriously embroil the relations of the two countries, by refusing to carry into execution any arrangement which should be made." He added, "that two months sooner or later could not be of much importance in the settlement of this question, and asked me if there would be any objection to adjourning its decision till the meeting of the Chambers, when the ministers could have an opportunity of consulting some of the leading men of the two Houses." This postponement was objected to by Mr. Rives, and was not insisted upon."

During the progress of the negotiation the principle of indemnity was early conceded. The French minister first offered fifteen millions of francs. Mr. Rives demanded forty. The French minister advanced to twenty, to twenty-four, and finally, with extreme reluctance, to twenty-five. At the point of twenty-four, Mr. Rives came down to thirty-two, as the medium between the two proposals. At that of twenty-five, the French minister announced it as their ultimatum; and in a despatch of Mr. Rives, of the 14th June, 1831, he reports the French minister to have said "that it was the opinion of the most enlightened and influential members of both Chambers, that the offer of twenty-four millions, heretofore made, was greatly too much; that ———, ———, ———, and other leading members of the one Chamber or the other, whom he mentioned, had already expressed that opinion to him, and emphatically warned him of the serious difficulties to which this affair would expose ministers."

difficulty of obtaining the assent of the Chambers to the appropriation. The next step increased the difficulty. Knowing, as he did, that the appropriations depended upon the Chamber, the then Secretary of the Treasury, without waiting for its action, drew a bill for the payment of the first instalment before the appropriation was made, and before, of course, it could possibly be paid. A protest necessarily followed, accompanied with much irritation on both sides.

With these obstacles, created by our own acts, the treaty was submitted to the Chambers. Every effort was made to obtain the appropriation. The minister displayed uncommon zeal and ability in defence of the treaty, but in vain, under these multiplied difficulties. The bill was rejected by a majority of eight votes; a number so small, in so large a body, that it may be fairly presumed, without any violence, that, had not Mr. Rives's letter been published, and the draft drawn before the appropriation was made, the majority would have been on the other side, and all the unhappy train of consequences which have since followed would have been prevented. So earnest were the French ministry in their efforts to carry the bill, that their defeat dissolved the administration.

With these facts before us, who can doubt where the responsibility rests? We had thrown the impediments in the way—we who had been so urgent to obtain the treaty, and we who were to profit by its execution. It matters not, in the view in which I am considering the question, to what motives the acts of our Executive may be attributed; whether to design or thoughtlessness, it cannot shift the responsibility.

Let us now (said Mr. C.) proceed to the next stage of this most unfortunate affair.

I pass over the intervening period; I come to the opening of the next session of Congress. In what manner does the President, in his message at the opening of the session, notice the failure of the French Chambers to make the appropriation? Knowing, as he must, how much the acts to which I have referred had contributed to the defeat of the bill, and that his administration was responsible for those acts, it was natural to expect that he would have noticed the fate of the bill in the calmest and most gentle manner; that he would have done full justice to the zeal and fidelity of the French Executive in its endeavors to obtain its passage, and would have thrown himself with confidence on the justice and the honor of the French nation for the fulfilment of the treaty. In a word, that he would have done all in his power to strengthen the executive Government in France in their future efforts to obtain the appropriation, and carefully avoid every thing that might interpose additional obstacles. Instead of taking this calm and considerate course, so well calculated to secure the fulfilment of the treaty, and so befitting the dignity and justice of our Government, he sends a message to Congress, couched in the strongest terms, and recommending that he should be invested with authority to issue letters of marque and reprisal in the event of the appropriation not being made—a measure, if not tantamount to war, leading to it by almost a necessary consequence. The message was received in France with the deep feeling of irritation which might have been expected; and under this feeling, with all the impediments which it was calculated to create, the bill to carry the treaty into effect had the second time to make its appearance in the Chambers. They were surmounted. The bill passed; but not without a condition—a condition which causes the present difficulty.

I deeply regret (said Mr. C.) the condition. In my opinion the honor of France did not require it; and the only vindication that can be offered for the ministry in accepting it, is the necessity of the case—that it was indispensable to its passage. But surely, in the midst of the difficulties which it has caused, we ought not to forget that the acts of our own Executive were the cause of its insertion.

This (said Mr. C.) brings us to the present stage of this unhappy controversy. I shall not offer an opinion on the message and documents which have just been read, till I have had time to read them at leisure, and more fully comprehend their character and bearing. The Senator from Pennsylvania has probably had the advantage of me in knowing their contents. [Here Mr. BUCHANAN signified his dissent.] I will not (said Mr. C.) make the remarks that I intended; but I am not satisfied with much that I have heard in the reading of the message and the documents. I am, in particular, very far from being satisfied with the reasons assigned by the Secretary of State why he did not accept the copy of the letter from the Duke de Broglie to the French chargé d'affaires here, which the latter offered to put in his possession. I regret exceedingly that we have not that document. It might have shed much light on the present state of this unhappy controversy. Much mystery hangs over the subject.

There is another point (said Mr. C.) which requires explanation. There is certainly some hope that the message at the opening of the session may be favorably received in France. The President has in it expressly adopted the explanation offered by Mr. Livingston, which affords some hope, at least, that it may prove to be satisfactory to the French Government. Why, then, send this message at this time? Why recommend preparations and non-intercourse, till we have heard how the message has been received in France? Suppose its reception should be favorable, in the absence of a representative of our Government at the French court, nothing could be done till the message which we have just received shall have passed the Atlantic, and reached Paris. How unfortunate would be the consequence! What new entanglements and difficulties would be caused in the relations of the two countries! Why all this? Who can explain? Will any friend of the administration rise in his place and tell us what is intended?

I might ask (said Mr. C.) for like explanation, why our chargé was recalled from Paris at the time he was. Why not wait till the annual message was received? Whom have we there to represent us on its reception, to explain any difficulty which might remain to be explained? All these things may have a satisfactory explanation. I cannot, however, perceive it. There may be some deep mystery in the whole affair, which those only who are initiated can understand.

I fear (said Mr. C.) that with the message which we have this day received, the last hope of preserving the peace of the country has vanished. This compels me to look forward. The first thing that strikes me, in casting my eyes to the future, is the utter impossibility that war, should there unfortunately be one, can have an honorable termination. We shall go into war to exact the payment of five millions of dollars. The first cannon discharged on our part would be a receipt in full for the whole amount. To expect to obtain payment by a treaty of peace would be worse than idle. If our honor would be involved in such a termination of the contest, the honor of France would be equally involved in the opposite. The struggle then would be, who should hold out longest in this unprofitable, and, were it not for the seriousness of the occasion, ridiculous contest. To determine this point, we must inquire which can inflict on the other the greater injury, and to which the war must be most expensive. To both a ready answer may be given. The capacity of France to inflict injury upon us is ten times greater than ours to inflict injuries on her; while the cost of the war, in proportion to her means, would be in nearly the same proportion less than ours to our means. She has relatively a small commerce to be destroyed, while we have the largest in the world, in proportion to our capital and population. She may threaten and harass our coast, while her own is safe from assault. Looking over the whole ground, I do not, said Mr. C., hesitate to pronounce that a war with France will be among the greatest calamities, greater than a war with England herself. The power of the latter to annoy us may be greater than that of the former; but so is ours, in turn, greater to annoy England than France. There is another view connected with this point, deserving the most serious consideration, particularly by the commercial and navigating portion of the Union. Nothing can be more destructive to our commerce and navigation than for England to be neutral, while we are belligerent, in a contest with such a country as France. The whole of our commercial marine, with our entire shipping, would pass almost instantly into the hands of England. With the exception of our public armed vessels, there would be scarcely a flag of ours afloat on the ocean. We grew rich by being neutral while England was belligerent. It was that which so suddenly built up the mighty fabric of our prosperity and greatness. Reverse the position, let England be neutral while we are belligerent, and the sources of our wealth and prosperity would be speedily exhausted.

In a just and necessary war, said Mr. C., all these consequences ought to be fearlessly met. Though a friend to peace, when a proper occasion occurs, I would be among the last to dread the consequences of war. I think the wealth and blood of a country are well poured out in maintaining a just, honorable, and necessary war; but in such a war as that with which the country is now threatened—a mere war of etiquette—a war turning on a question so trivial as whether an explanation shall or shall not be given—no, whether it has, or has not been given, (for that is the real point on which the controversy turns,) to put in jeopardy the lives and property of our citizens, and the liberty and institutions of our country, is worse than folly—is madness. I say the liberty and institutions of the country. I hold them to be in imminent danger. Such has been the grasp of executive power, that we have not been able to resist its usurpations, even in a period of peace; and how much less shall we be able, with the vast increase of power and patronage which a war must confer on that department? In a sound condition of the country, with our institutions in their full vigor, and every department confined to its proper sphere, we would have nothing to fear from a war with France, or any other Power; but our system is deeply diseased, and we may fear the worst in being involved in a war at such a juncture.

I have, said Mr. C., in conclusion, no objection to the message and documents going to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have great confidence in the committee, and have no doubt that they will discharge their duty to the Senate and to the country with prudence and wisdom, at the present trying juncture. But let me suggest a caution against the hasty adoption of the recommendations of the message. To adopt them would be to change for the worse the position which we now occupy in this unfortunate controversy, and lead, I fear, directly to war. We are told that a French fleet has been sent to the West Indies, which has been considered as a menace, with the intention of frightening us into hasty measures. The French Government itself has said, in its official journal, that it acts on the defensive, and that there is no legitimate cause of war between the two countries. We would not be justified, with these declarations, connected with the circumstances of the case, were we to regard the sending the fleet as a menace. We must not forget that we, in this controversy, are, as my colleague said the other day in debate, the plaintiffs, and France the defendant. If there must be war, it must come from us, not France. She has neither motive nor cause to make war. As we, then, must declare the war, it is not strange that France, after what has passed, should prepare for the worst; and such preparation ought fairly to be considered, not as a menace, but as a precautionary measure, resulting from our own acts. But should we in turn commence arming, it must be followed on the part of France with increased preparation, and again on ours with a corresponding increase, till, at length, the pride and passions of both parties would be so wrought up as to burst out to open violence.

I have, said Mr. C., thus freely expressed my opinion upon this important subject, feeling a deep conviction that neither justice, honor, nor necessity, impel to arms; and that a war with France, at all times, and more especially at the present, would be among the greatest calamities that could befall the country.

Mr. CUTHBERT followed, saying, the Senator from South Carolina says war must follow! If you arm, war must follow! We are told, in so many words, that we dare not do so! Yes, sir, that voice that twenty-four years ago lighted the fire of confidence and patriotism in the hearts of all who heard him, now humbles itself, and would humble this Senate, before a foreign Government. Dare not arm! Sir, every drop of blood in an American breast is roused by such a sentiment. Shame! shame! that it should have been uttered here. I trust it will meet with but one answer from one end of the Union to the other.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that when he made the observations which had called forth the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] he had believed the message to be the harbinger of peace, and not of war. This was still his opinion. In this respect he differed entirely from the gentleman. Under this impression, he had then risen merely to remark that, considering the provocation which we had received, the tone, the spirit, and the recommendations themselves, of the message, were mild and prudent, and were well calculated to make an impression upon France, and to render her sensible of her injustice.

It had been far from his intention to excite a general debate on the French question, and he would not be drawn into it now by the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina. He must, however, be permitted to say he was sorry, very sorry, that the gentleman had proclaimed that, if war should come, we are the authors of that war; and it would be the fault, not of the French, but of the American Government. Such a declaration, proceeding from such a source, from a voice so powerful and so potent, would be heard on the other side of the Atlantic, and there might produce a most injurious effect. He was happy to say that this sentiment was directly at war with the opinion of our Committee on Foreign Relations, who, in their report of the last session, had expressed the decided opinion that the American Government, should it become necessary, must insist upon the execution of the treaty. It was at war with the unanimous resolution of the House of Representatives of the same session, declaring that the treaty must be maintained. He believed it was equally at war with the feelings and opinions of the American people.

Whilst he expressed his hope and his belief that this message would prove to be the olive branch of peace, still there was so much uncertainty in the event, that it now became our imperative duty to prepare for the worst. Shall we, (said Mr. B.), whilst a powerful fleet is riding along our Southern coast, in a menacing attitude, sit here and withhold from the President the means which are necessary to place our country in a state of defence? He trusted this would never, never, be the case.

The messages and documents were then read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as moved by Mr. CLAY.

ELECTIONEERING AGENTS.

Mr. WHITE, of Tennessee, rose and said: I rise, Mr. President, to offer the resolution which I hold in my hand; but to enable the Senate to understand why it is offered, and the object I wish to accomplish, it is a duty incumbent on me to accompany it with some explanation; I will therefore read it, and then pass it to your table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, requested to inform the Senate what office Benjamin F. Curry holds in the Cherokee nation, under what law he was appointed, and at what time; what salary he receives, and whether he has at any time received any allowance in addition to his salary, and how much; stating particularly the whole amount he has received each year.

This Mr. Curry (proceeded Mr. W.) went into the nation some time after the election of the present Chief Magistrate, and I believed until about a twelvemonth ago he had been employed as an inferior agent to superintend the enrolment of Cherokees for emigration, to have their improvements valued, &c. During the last winter he was here, and when I returned home last spring, I understood he was making some figure as a politician; that out of his own head, or by the instigation of some person more wicked than himself, he had, while here, written some letters for publication to a small newspaper in my own State, which had engaged in the business of traducing me. In the course of the summer we had, in some of our congressional districts, animated contests between candidates for Congress. This gentleman, I understood, took an active part. He sometimes travelled out of the nation, and even out of his congressional district, was zealous in propagating his opinions, and, as I am informed and believe, either wrote himself or furnished the materials for one or more pieces, for the same vehicle of slander to which he had written while in Washington.

In the district including the Cherokee agency he was zealous in opposing the election of the former member, and, with a view to enable him to act efficiently, was in the habit of reading and showing, confidentially, a letter said to be written by the President himself, finding fault with the former member by name, and using general expressions, which Mr. Curry said were intended for me. I have likewise been informed that, still further to succeed in his plans of defamation, he confidentially used a letter, said to be written to him by my honorable colleague, [Mr. GRUNDY,] in which my name was used, not much to my advantage; and I now take this occasion, in the Senate, in presence of our brother Senators, in presence of this audience, and in the face of the world, to ask my colleague to say whether, at any time, he wrote any letter to Mr. Curry, in which my name is used.

[Mr. GRUNDY answered that he was taken by surprise with the question; but he did not remember he had ever written a letter on any subject to Mr. Curry, and that he felt certain, if he had, he had never used his colleague's name in other terms than those of respect.]

Mr. WHITE proceeded. I am then satisfied with the answer given for the present, and this artifice must have been used by Mr. Curry the more effectually to deceive and mislead those to whom he made such statements.

All this conduct I disregarded, and did not even think it worthy to be made matter of conversation. Our elections terminated; the former member was re-elected; and when the Legislature met, I was again honored with a seat here by a unanimous vote.

Some time ago a friend brought me a Georgia newspaper, and pointed me to a letter under the signature of Mr. Curry, dated 1st December, 1835, and addressed to the editor of a newspaper called the Federal Union. In that paper it had been published, and from it copied into various other papers, and finally into one in my own State, called the Nashville Union, gotten up by funds furnished here expressly for the purpose of distributing, in my own State and elsewhere, all the dirty filth and slander which could be collected, with a view to detract from my humble standing.

The time at which this letter was published, as well as the place where, and the matter of it, struck me with some force. The Legislatures of Georgia, of Alabama, of Tennessee, of North Carolina, Virginia, and several other States, were then in session, if I mistake not, and if I do I hope gentlemen will correct me, and that of Mississippi was soon to meet. Four of these States had a deep stake in the Indian question, because the Indians now reside in portions of them.

I saw that the most gross and base falsehoods were contained in it, as to myself. This I did not so much regard; but I saw further, that, with a view to reach me, a statement was made respecting Mr. McConnell, one of my constituents, an humble and inoffensive citizen, which would, in all probability, cost him his life. I felt hurt by this, as I had been the medium through which the Secretary of War had induced him to undertake this delicate, confidential, and hazardous agency.

The falsehoods were so glaring, and the mischievous tendency of the letter so obvious, that I at first hoped, so soon as it met the eye of the administration, the matter would be set right without any application from any quarter. After waiting some time without any step having been taken, and having good reason to believe the letter had been seen by at least one member of the administration, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, under date of the 2d instant, a copy of which I will now read:

WASHINGTON, January 2, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I must take the liberty of inviting your attention to a letter, under the signature of Benjamin F. Curry, published in a newspaper called the Federal Union, and bearing date "Cherokee Agency, December 1st, 1835."

In it you will see, in speaking of Samuel McConnell, Mr. Curry uses this language: "he has, for some years past, under the procurement of Judge White, of Tennessee, been receiving pay from the United States Government, as a secret and confidential agent, while all his visible efforts have been to defeat the measures of the ostensible agents in bringing about a treaty."

I feel assured your own sense of justice will at once pronounce that this statement, so far as I am concerned, is entirely unfounded.

The name of Mr. McConnell was not brought to your notice by me; I never asked or procured the Department to appoint him. Any agency I had in the matter was at the instance of the Department, and to carry into effect its wishes, as is fully disclosed in the letter from the acting Secretary of War to me, and my answer, with its enclosure, to him, to which I beg leave to refer you.

In that, as in every thing else, I was willing to do all in my power to aid in carrying into effect the wishes of the Department in relation to the Indians, and must think I am treated with great injustice if your agents attached to your Department are thus to misrepresent and calumniate me. From all the information I possess, I must think in the charges against Mr. McConnell there is a great disregard of truth. I had ever believed, and yet do, that he acted with great fidelity, and that from his services much benefit resulted.

But, sir, if Mr. McConnell was a secret agent, appointed by your Department, does he merit that his life should be endangered by this statement of your agent? If he was not a secret agent, is it right that he should be endangered by the statement of such a falsehood?

In another part of Mr. Curry's letter he states, shortly before the council, Lewis Ross came to Knoxville, and after his return rumors were put afloat connected with my name.

The inference Mr. Curry wishes should be drawn from this statement no doubt was, that Lewis Ross came to Knoxville to consult me. I assure you, that if Mr. Ross was in Knoxville, from the time I left Washington, in March, till my return this fall, I never heard of it until I read Mr. Curry's letter, and have had no communication whatever with him.

The whole tenor of this letter, so far as I am concerned, is a tissue of misrepresentations, intended to place my conduct in a false view before the world.

I am well aware that those who know Mr. Curry would not excuse me for taking any notice of his slanders generally; but from the peculiar nature of his charge, and the circumstance of his connexion with your Department, his statement may be thought entitled to some credit, should it pass without rebuke.

He is your officer; you are the witness who knows the gross injustice done me, and to you I confidently appeal for such steps as will do that which is just to the country, to Mr. Curry, and to myself.

I beg to be informed what course you will pursue in this matter.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant.

On the night of the 15th I received his answer, dated the 14th, enclosing a copy of one written to Mr. Curry on the 9th.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
January 14, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I must ask your indulgence for not having answered your letter of the 2d instant, which was received here on the 5th. The delay has been owing to the great press of business, and to the propriety of laying the matter before the President.

I have now the honor to send the copy of a letter addressed to Major Curry, and in which the President's disapprobation is conveyed to him. The statement that Mr. McConnell was employed at your suggestion is altogether erroneous, and I have put the matter right by giving the true facts of the case. I considered the Department under obligations to you for the trouble you took on the subject of the employment and proceedings of Mr. McConnell, and I have endeavored to do justice to his services, so far as these are known to me.

If Major Curry intended to intimate, as you suppose, that there was a communication between yourself and Mr. Ross, such an intimation was highly improper. Independent of the entire want of proof of such a course, your word is quite sufficient to satisfy me that there was no just ground for the suggestion.

I am, dear sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEWIS CASS.

Hon. HUGH L. WHITE.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 9, 1836.

SIR: The attention of this Department has been drawn to a letter from you to the editor of the Federal Union, and which was published in the Augusta Centinel of the 22d ultimo.

I am instructed by the President, if that letter was written by you, to convey to you his disapprobation of a part of it. There certainly can be no impropriety in an officer's communicating to the public proper information when circumstances require it, and the general proceedings relating to the prospects and progress of the Cherokee emigration are of this nature. But it is with regret the President observes in this communication allusions to persons and parties which do not seem to be necessary, and are calculated to produce an injurious effect. There is one error of fact, which it becomes the special duty of this Department to correct, as the requisite information is upon its files. You state that Mr. McConnell "has for some years past, under the procurement of Judge White, of Tennessee, been receiving pay from the United States Government, as a secret and confidential agent," &c. You have been led into a mistake on this subject. Mr. McConnell was not employed under the procurement of Judge White. The suggestion that Mr. McConnell's services might be useful, as well to the United States as to the Cherokee Indians, was made to this Department from another and very respectable quarter. All the necessary circumstances were not fully known at the Department, proper instructions were given to Mr. McConnell, and enclosed to Judge White, to be delivered if he thought the arrangement would be useful. Judge White had no agency whatever in the matter until he was requested, by the express direction of the President, to serve as a medium of communication between Mr. McConnell and this Department.

Mr. McConnell transmitted various reports, containing information respecting the state of things in the Cherokee country. But there is nothing in these going in the slightest degree to show that he did not act with due fidelity, as well to the United States as to the Cherokee Indians.

It is also a matter of regret that you should have attended at all to the employment of Mr. McConnell. From the relation in which he stands to the Cherokees, and the suspicious disposition of Indians, the disclosure may even put his life at hazard. It is therefore the more imperative upon me to state explicitly, as I have done, that there was nothing in the reports of Mr. McConnell which could give just offence to the Indians.

The President has directed me to say that he has read and approves this letter; and that, while he appreciates the zeal you have displayed in the execution of your duties, he deems it incumbent upon him to recommend to you great discretion, and particularly to convey to you his disapprobation of the allusion you have made to the employment of Mr. McConnell.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
LEWIS CASS.

Major B. F. CURRY, New Echota, Ga.

To this, on the 16th, I wrote a very short reply:

WASHINGTON, January 16, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge that I received last night your favor under date of the 14th, with its enclosure, in answer to mine of the 2d instant.

The result is so different from what I think I had a right to anticipate, that I refrain from any remarks on the contents of the letter written to Mr. Curry by direction of the President.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

HUGH L. WHITE.

I had applied, in the only friendly mode I could devise, for the interposition of the executive power. I remembered well the great principle for which the party had struggled to elevate the President to his present station. I remembered his recognition of it in his inaugural address, which thousands of the citizens of the United States, as well as most of those now in the reach of my voice, heard him deliver, as containing the principles upon which he would administer the Government. The paragraph is in the following words:

"The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform, which will require, particularly, the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed or continued power in unfaithful or incompetent hands."

This short paragraph shows the main ground on which the contest rested, which ended in the election of the present Chief Magistrate. It contains the sentiments avowed by him in the presence of nearly twenty thousand freemen. It contains the sentiments which, as one of his advocates, I honestly entertained. It contains the sentiments on the maintenance of which, I believe our freedom and liberty essentially depend. I felt hurt and mortified upon reading the Secretary's letter; I could not reply without using expressions not fit to address to a member of the President's cabinet. In place of Mr. Curry receiving such rebuke as would deter him from committing a similar offence in future, it appeared to me that he was complimented. Although his conduct was not approved as to McConnell, as to me it was very well; that, instead of an inferior agent, he was to be viewed as an electioneering political diplomatist; and that, hereafter, if the gardener spoken of by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day is to wear his diplomatic button, Mr. Curry ought to figure in his political electioneering star and garter.

But, sir, what was I to do next? The falsehood has gone forth to answer the meditated mischief. In some of the States it is probable it has accomplished its object. How is it to be contradicted? I have been furnished with a document proving the falsehood. Is it supposed that I would sneak to a printing office to beg a publication of its contradiction? No. I cannot descend to such an act of meanness. If I could, I dare not. The proud, high-minded, honorable men who sent me here would, for such an act of degradation, recall me from a station among honorable men, and thus gratify some high in office who seek to displace me.

My course is here; my place is here. From my stand, on this floor, I contradict the falsehood and expose the injustice. If any opponent will deny my statement, or justify this outrage, I meet him here openly, face to face, eye to eye, and maintain and assert what is due to my constituents and myself by all honorable means in my power.

But the Nashville Union—this vehicle of slanders and falsehoods, gotten up in this city, as I have understood, for just such purposes. The editor came here last winter, upon his own mere motion, or by the solicitation of some other person, with, as I have understood and believe, not more money than would bear his expenses. He lived in the House with my honorable colleague, and, while here, was furnished with some five or six thousand dollars to establish his press in Nashville, and, without relying upon subscribers, to be enabled to throw his paper into the hands of every man who would condescend to read it. Even this very number, containing this letter, I have no doubt, has been innocently sent, under the frank of Senators, from this floor, to many of the States in the Union.

If there is any person within my hearing who can contradict my statement, as to the manner in which this paper was established, I wish to hear him do so.

[Mr. GRUNDY rose and stated that the editor had come here last winter, not at his instance; that how the money was raised, or by whom, he had no knowledge; that the paper had taken its side, and was maintaining it as well as it could; that he had not noticed this letter in it, and that there was a great scuffling to get subscribers for it at home. Mr. McConnell he knew, and thought him a clever man, of good sense, and he believed he had recommended him for this office.]

To which Mr. WHITE replied. Yes, Mr. President, there was a great scuffling to get subscribers for it; so great that our old acquaintance, Samuel Gwyn, the land officer from Mississippi, was called into the service; and, when procuring subscribers at Gallatin in April last, he wrote to Mr. Ritchie, of the Enquirer, the celebrated letter as to Tennessee politics, intended unjustly to influence the Virginia elections, and which, no doubt, had the desired effect.

Mr. President, I have made these disclosures with great pain and the most deep mortification; but I deemed it my duty to do so. The answer to my resolution will show whether it will be in my power, and whether it will be my duty, to attempt any thing farther on the unpleasant subject.

The resolution was then agreed to.

[The following is Mr. Curry's letter, alluded to in the foregoing remarks:

From the Federal Union.

CHEROKEE AGENCY, Dec. 1, 1835.

SIR: I know your anxiety on the subject of a treaty, and having seen intimations, on Indian authority, that a treaty will be concluded at an early period, I have thought fit to give you a short sketch of the proceedings of the council, as well as before and since, connected with the Indian matters.

You will remember, Mr. Ross and his coadjutors entered into a written agreement with the Secretary of War last winter, to take for their claims east whatever sum the Senate of the United States might award, upon submitting the question to that body.

The question was submitted, and the Senate awarded five millions of dollars. Mr. Ross and his party acted on this occasion under a power of attorney from the committee and council of the nation, who claimed all the power and authority of the nation. This power of attorney was drawn by a skilful lawyer, Colonel Hansell, and signed by all who claimed authority and power as counsellors. Mr. Ridge and others, who seceded from Mr. Ross's council, made an arrangement, reduced to the solemn form of a treaty, and signed by the representatives of that party, on the basis of this award.

At the October council there attended a certain Mr. Payne, and one Samuel McConnell, of Tennessee; Payne hails from New York, but came through Georgia. He is of the whig party, and rumor makes him an abolitionist. He, it is said, formed an alliance with Mr. Longstreet, of Augusta, and other editors, by which he was to furnish matter, and they were to print it for political effect. McConnell is the same who instigated the arrest of the Georgia surveyor, and had him carried to Athens, Tennessee, for a violation of the intercourse laws, some three years ago, for marking lines within the limits of your State. He has large claims for reservations made to Indians under the treaties of 1817-'19; and has, for some years past, under the procurement of Judge White, of Tennessee, been receiving pay from the United States Government, as a secret and confidential agent, while all his visible efforts have been to defeat the measures of the ostensible agents in bringing about a treaty.

Lewis Ross, one of John Ross's executive counsellors, visited Knoxville about the commencement of this council, and, while absent, much concern was manifested by John to know where his brother Lewis could be. Lewis at length arrived.

Rumor was put afloat that Judge White, if made President, would do much for this people.

Ridge and his party shortly afterwards arrived. McConnell met him, as Ridge told it, and put him on his guard against the agent and Mr. Schermerhorn, who, he intimated, was about to sacrifice Ridge, and proposed that Ridge and his party should ride with him in the direction of Governor Carroll's, in order to see that commissioner before myself and Mr. Schermerhorn had an opportunity to give to his mind such a bias as it might receive, provided that this precaution was not used. Mr. Ridge was evidently much perplexed, and his confidence apparently shaken through some unexpected interference.

An interview was shortly afterwards brought about between John Ross and John Ridge, which resulted in a determination never to treat on the basis of the award of the Senate. This was accordingly submitted to the people, about six or seven hundred only being present. Coupled with this, however, was a resolution appointing nineteen delegates to treat here (at Red Clay) or elsewhere, with the Government of the United States. After the passage of these resolutions, most of the Indians went home rejoicing that they had got their lands back. The committee thus appointed to treat remained, and raised an objection to Mr. Schermerhorn's authority; and in this they were sustained by this Mr. Payne: for the truth of this I refer you to Colonel Hansell. While Payne was thus engaged, Mr. Foreman, a Cherokee of respectability, informs me McConnell was using these arguments with Ridge's friends, who had refused to go over with them. You had nothing to expect from the agent; and the commissioner will have no power. All the patronage and money for which your country is sold will be at the disposal of Ross. You had better leave them and join him; stick to them, and you are ruined; go with him, and you are saved.

The suspicious movements of Mr. Payne, and the secret conclaves constantly going on between him and Mr. Ross, united with the strange results of this council, and the increased insolence of the Indians, strengthened the suspicion that these fresh hopes were founded upon anticipated insurrection in the South and West, and a severe conflict at the same time with foreign foes; during which the Indians might have an opportunity to reinstate themselves. The parties (Payne and Ross) were closeted, after the adjournment of council, for at least a week, just back of the Georgia line, within Tennessee. Indians, committing the most atrocious murders in that part, had been arrested and carried before the circuit courts of Tennessee, and the laws had, by Judge Keith, been declared unconstitutional, leaving the country neither subject to State nor federal jurisdiction. From the great variety of character in that section of the country, and the absolute necessity of knowing where to look for protection against the incendiary as well as the assassin, I was instrumental in taking an appeal from his honor Judge Keith's decision to the supreme court of Tennessee, the opinion of which had not reached the Indian country in a tangible character at the time of Mr. Ross and Mr. Payne's temporary arrest; since which, I have seen it announced that the supreme court of Tennessee had reversed the decision of Judge Keith against the unconstitutionality of the laws. But from this high tribunal an appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States (as I am informed) at the instance of some of those very persons in Tennessee who rail out so largely against the Georgia guard for having stepped a few paces across the line into an unorganized territory, to examine into the correctness of an alleged conspiracy against the vital interest of not only yours but the adjoining States.

Abolition tracts have been circulated among the Indians; and I have seen, in the handwriting of Mr. Payne, charges that the Government of the United States had attempted to bribe John Ross, by offering him a bribe of fifty thousand dollars, and a tissue of other misrepresentations, calculated, and no doubt intended, to alienate the confidence of the Indians from our Government, and excite them against its citizens; which, with his persuasions to them that Mr. Schermerhorn was not duly authorized to treat with them, being calculated to delay its measures with this tribe, are flagrant violations of the intercourse law of 1831; and had I been aware of the extent of this gentleman's offence, and been here before his release, his confinement would have continued at least until orders as to the proper course to be pursued could have been received from the War Department.

The foregoing shows that, while the Indians have appointed a delegation to treat, they resolve, by the same voice, not to treat on the basis of the five million. The delegation have refused to meet the commissioners at Newtown, and say they will go to Washington city, although they have been notified by the Secretary of War and Commissioner of Indian Affairs that the Department will hold no more communications with them. Last winter, after the award of the Senate was had, the Secretary of War requested Mr. Ross and his party to submit the details of a treaty, to be based upon the Senate's award. This he objected to, because he believed it to be more satisfactory to his people to have a treaty concluded in their presence, which would save the delegation from unjust imputations, &c. Commissioners were sent into the country therefor, and now, by the procurement of Ross and Ridge, a resolution is passed declaring they will not abide by their own engagements, and never will treat on the basis of the Senate's award.

Should you think this worthy a place in your paper, I hold myself answerable for its contents.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

BEN. F. CURRY.

To the Editor of the Federal Union.]

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the question on the petition, from sundry citizens of Ohio, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; the question being, "Shall the petition be received?"

Mr. LEIGH rose and said he considered it his duty to discuss the questions that had arisen in the debate on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, against receiving these petitions; yet he had felt all along, and still felt, some reluctance to perform that duty. For, though he was not sensible of an excitement in his own breast, and, so far from wishing to increase, was most anxious to allay the existing excitement in the public mind, by all means best adapted to counteract and remove the causes of irritation; and though he was sure, if he could be sure of any thing depending on the evidence of his own consciousness, that he had no party feeling at all connected with the subject, he was, nevertheless, somewhat apprehensive that the remarks he should feel it his duty to make (such was the nature and delicacy of the topics to which he must advert) might not prove, in their effect, exactly correspondent with his wishes and design.

He reminded the Senate that there had been three memorials presented on this subject: two from Ohio, as to which the gentleman from South Carolina insisted on the preliminary question, whether they should be received or not; and one from the Society of Friends of Pennsylvania, which the gentleman who presented it

[Mr. BUCHANAN] moved to reject, without further consideration. All three had one and the same object; they all prayed Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. But (said Mr. L.) the temper and language of these memorials are widely different. That from the Quakers does indeed represent slavery as unchristian and inhuman, as they would deprecate and remonstrate against war, however just and necessary, as unchristian and inhuman; but they evince no animosity towards slaveholders; they manifest the same mild and peaceful spirit, the same good-will and brotherly love towards all men, which that society of Christians have so signally, at all times and on all occasions, displayed in word and deed. They have been holding similar language for years; holding it in the slaveholding as well as the non-slaveholding States; addressing it to Congress; addressing it, in conversation, to their slaveholding neighbors in Virginia, (as my colleague and I can testify,) and in memorials to our Legislature; yet they have never given offence, provoked resentment, or excited alarm. Sensitive as we are supposed to be on this subject, the Quakers who have lived among us have found out the art of maintaining their opinions without offence; and the art consists simply in purifying their own hearts and language from the least taint of malignity. I cannot help wishing I could find some principle of discrimination, favorable to this memorial of the Quakers, on which I could think myself justified in giving it a different treatment from that which I have no hesitation in giving to the memorials from Ohio. One of these is from men; the other is signed by women only. That from the men is comparatively moderate; they only intimate their opinion that the holding of slave property, and the transfer of it by sale, as practised in this country, is alike detestable with the African slave trade, which has been declared piracy by law. But the memorial from the softer sex contains as much matter of offence, insult, and vituperation, applicable to all the slaveholding portions of their fellow-citizens, as could possibly have been put into a paper of the same compass. These ladies probably thought (or rather, perhaps, the person who prepared the memorial for them thought) that their sex would give them a title to indulgence. But, in my sense of things, their sex, instead of furnishing a motive for treating them with indulgence, is an aggravation of their fault. They have unsexed themselves. These memorialists of Ohio, male and female, it seems, are sorely afflicted with the cruel grievances our slaves endure from us, their ruthless masters; their souls are oppressed with the load of mortal sin which we incur by holding their fellow-creatures in bondage; and, while they profess sympathy and compassion for the slave, it is but too apparent that abhorrence and detestation of the slave-owner constitute the moving spirit that dictates their language and their conduct.

There are some who impute the restless, busy, mischievous schemes of agitation, in which the abolitionists are engaged, to mere fanaticism, and thence seem willing to infer that, however furious their zeal and pernicious its effects, their motives may not be wanting in sincerity and benevolence. But, for my part, supposing their conduct justly imputable to fanaticism, that would be no argument with me, either of their sincerity or their benevolence; for, of all the evil spirits that have ever possessed the human heart, fanaticism has proved itself the most persecuting, unsparing, cruel, and relentless; and no man that has read the history of the civil broils of our British ancestors in the times of Charles I. can need more to convince him that fanaticism is apt to be accompanied with hypocrisy, and conscious hypocrisy, too.

Mr. L. then stated the precise question before the Senate to be, whether we ought to receive these Ohio memorials? This question, he thought, did not necessarily involve the question which had arisen in the debate, whether Congress has the constitutional power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. For, said he, supposing Congress to have the power, yet, as we have been assured on all hands that there is no difference of opinion on the question of policy—that it is the opinion of the great majority of the Senate, that indeed it is the unanimous opinion of this body, that it would be most impolitic, unwise, and unjust, to do what these petitioners pray Congress to do, I cannot comprehend how good policy, sound wisdom, or justice, can require or even permit us to entertain these petitions. Can it be thought politic, wise, or just, to receive petitions of which the objects are acknowledged to be mischievous? The question whether they shall be received is a preliminary question which every Senator has a right to have put and decided upon every paper offered to this body, and the very purpose of it is to enable us to refuse a hearing to propositions of a mischievous tendency. There is nothing unusual in the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that these memorials shall not be received. Short as has been my service in the Senate, I have known instances in which it has been resolved, upon the preliminary question put, that memorials should not be received, on the ground that they contained language disrespectful and calumnious of the Senate, or of particular members, though they related to subjects in which the petitioners were interested in common with the whole nation. Now, that seems to me the most trivial objection imaginable, compared with the objection which we make to these memorials, and the truth and justice of which, in point of fact and probable consequence, have not been denied—that they are calculated, if they are not intended, to disquiet the minds and disturb the peace of one half the Union, and to produce or keep alive an agitation throughout the whole, which has a manifest tendency to weaken the political bonds by which we are united, and to jeopard all our institutions.

Gentlemen who are unwilling to vote against receiving these petitions are willing, as I understand, to vote to reject them as soon as they shall be received. The difference between not receiving and rejecting, in principle and effect, is, I suppose, no more than this—that rejecting, as it admits the right of the petitioners to be heard, and only declares the prayer of the petitions unreasonable, may nowise tend to discourage the renewal of such petitions, but may, on the contrary, suggest and invite a renewal of them in future and more propitious times; whereas a decisive vote of the Senate against the receiving of them, as it amounts to a denial of the right of the petitioners to be heard at all, may and ought to have the effect of discouraging and preventing the renewal of petitions of the like mischievous kind in future; whether it will or not, is another consideration. Supposing it expedient and prudent not to receive these petitions, (having regard to the probable effects,) is there any objection, in principle, to this course? Is there any principle that obliges us to receive petitions, without regard to their merits or purposes, and without consideration of consequences? The first amendment to the constitution has been referred to, which provides that Congress shall make no law abridging the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances. But the right here secured to the people, to petition for a redress of grievances, must have relation to grievances of the petitioners themselves, not those of others; and the refusal of Congress to receive unjust, mischievous, or absurd petitions can hardly, by any violence of construction, be regarded as tantamount to the making of a law abridging the right of the people to petition for a redress of grievances. In the present case, the prayer for redress of grievances is, most palpably, only a pretext, a flimsy pretext, and a mockery—a pretext to justify the petitioners in meddling in affairs in which they themselves can be no way, or only very remotely, concerned, to the jeopardy of the rights, the interests, the peace and happiness, of a large portion of their fellow-citizens—a pretext for complaining of evils which, if they exist, can hardly, by any possibility, reach them—a pretext to justify the petitioners, while they are out of the way of all danger themselves, in disturbing the tranquillity of the two States surrounding this District, and, by consequence, the whole Southern country. Redress of grievances! I defy the wit of man to point out any grievance which these Ohio petitioners can sustain from the existence of negro slavery in this District, greater than that which the female memorialists have discovered and gravely represented to us, namely, that they are prevented, by their dread of witnessing the horrors of slavery, from coming to Washington to hear the debates in Congress! Sir, this is the first time I ever heard it suggested that the right of petition imposed the duty on Congress to receive petitions acknowledgedly improper and mischievous, no matter why so improper and mischievous.

Mr. L. then proceeded to remark that, though he thought the question of the competency of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia not necessarily involved in the decision of the question proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina—though, in his opinion, if the power were conceded to Congress, the Senate ought yet to refuse to receive these petitions, it was obvious that, if Congress had no such power, that would be a conclusive objection to receiving the petitions, and, therefore, the question whether the abolition of slavery in the District was within the constitutional competency of Congress was a fair topic of discussion in this debate. It was important to the Southern States, especially to Maryland and Virginia, to understand the exact state of opinion in Congress on the point; for, if the doctrines of the abolitionists should gain ground in the non-slaveholding States, and Congress should assert its power to abolish slavery in this District, we might very well apprehend that the power will at no distant day be exercised; and the State Governments ought to be the more careful and strenuous to devise such measures, within their own competency, as would best serve to guard us against the consequences. The assertion of such a power by Congress, the failure to disclaim it, Mr. L. feared, would give new energy to the efforts of the abolitionists. The system on which they were acting was the system of agitation; a system inimical to the stability of all political institutions. It was truly astonishing to see how few men, and what sort of men, were capable of getting and keeping up such a system, and thereby poisoning the social relations of any country, shaking the foundations of Government, and dissolving the best-adjusted political compacts. Mr. L. said he held the opinion that Congress had no rightful constitutional power to abolish slavery in this District; and he should take this opportunity to lay before the Senate his views of the question; though he hoped and trusted that some occasion would be found for bringing it before this body, directly and singly, for decision, so that the slaveholding States might understand exactly the grounds they are standing on.

But first, (said Mr. L.,) let us understand the question. Nobody doubts that Congress may authorize the owners of slaves within the District to manumit them, and may facilitate the emancipation of them by the owners, by proper legal provisions adapted to the purpose. The question is, whether it is competent to Congress to emancipate the slaves in this District, without the consent of the owners, or any slave without the consent of the individual owner.

Such a power, if it exists, must be deduced from the provision of the constitution giving Congress power "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings."

I pray the Senate to consider, in the first place, that if this shall be construed a grant to Congress of an unlimited, absolute, despotic power of legislation over this District, and if, by virtue of the grant, Congress may abolish the rights of slave property in the District, they may exercise "like authority" over the forts, magazines, arsenals, &c., which they have purchased in the slaveholding States. They may not only organize the negroes they shall make free into militia regiments here, but they may form them into corps of regulars; they may station them as garrisons in the forts and places of arms established among us; they may commit to their safe-keeping the magazines and arsenals, the munitions and implements of war. The power claimed is one of most fearful import and extent; and no gentleman, I presume, will now wonder at the anxiety which the claim to such a power raises in our minds. Let us not be told that Congress will never proceed to any such dangerous extremes in the exercise of the power, let its existence be ever so unquestionable! Not a great many years have passed over my head since I thought it impossible that any set of men (but the Quakers) could seriously propose the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, in the actual state of things in Virginia and Maryland.

The argument for the power of Congress I understand to be this: That the grant to Congress of the powers of exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over the District, vests in Congress all powers which the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia may rightfully exercise within their respective jurisdictions. And I shall admit the principle, provided it is admitted, on the other hand, that Congress has the same extent of power as the State Legislatures by which the District was ceded, and no more; which, surely, is no unreasonable postulate.

I presume it cannot be contended that the State Legislature of Virginia or Maryland, or of any State in the Union, has a rightful power to make any law incompatible with a solemn, lawful compact with another State; or that Congress, in virtue of its powers of exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia, is competent to make laws directly contrary to the act of cession of the District by Virginia or Maryland; contrary to the compact which the act of cession imports; contrary to the terms on which Congress accepted the cession. There is an existing compact between Maryland and Virginia concerning the use and navigation of the Potomac, and the jurisdiction over the river; no one has ever supposed that either State can constitutionally make a law contravening that compact, in the least particular, without the consent of the other. There is a compact between Virginia and Kentucky, upon the terms of which the latter was erected into an independent State; Kentucky has passed laws which have been complained of and impugned, on the ground that they were contrary to the terms of the compact, and the question as to their validity was brought before the Supreme Court of the United States; but the only question was, whether the Kentucky laws violated the compact or not; for no jurist or statesman of Kentucky ever thought of contending that, if those laws really violated the compact, they were, nevertheless, constitutional and valid. But the cession of this District is not the only cession which Virginia has made to the United States. She ceded to the United States all her rights in the Northwestern Territory, upon terms on which Congress accepted the cession, and which, therefore, constitute a compact between that State and the United States. There is, at this moment, a most interesting question pending before Congress, between the State of Ohio and the Territory of Michigan, touching the boundary between them. Michigan insists that the act of cession of Virginia has settled the boundary, unalterably and conclusively; and Ohio contends that the act of cession gives full power to Congress to ascertain and fix the boundary, as convenience, good policy, and justice, shall dictate; but neither the State of Ohio, nor any one else, contends that, if the act of cession does determine the boundary, it is competent to Congress to disregard the compact with Virginia; the only question is, what is the true meaning and effect of the compact? So with regard to this cession by Virginia of the District of Columbia. Whatever terms the Legislature of Virginia has stipulated, Congress, accepting the cession upon those terms, is bound by the compact those terms import, and it is not within its competency to make any law contrary to the compact. Now, the act of cession of Virginia is in these words:

"Be it enacted, &c., That a tract of country, not exceeding ten miles square, or any lesser quantity, to be located within the limits of this State, and in any part thereof, as Congress may by law direct, shall be, and the same is hereby, for ever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and Government of the United States, in full and absolute right and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution of the Government of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to affect the rights of individuals therein,* otherwise than the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States."

Here, then, is a stipulation in the act of cession of Virginia of her part of the District, according to which Congress accepted the grant, and so made the stipula-

* NOTE BY MR. LEIGH.—It may be thought that the word "therein" refers to the word "soil," in the preceding member of the sentence, as its antecedent, so as to secure the rights of individuals in the soil only, and not in any other kind of property. But a little attention will show that the word "therein" has reference to the tract of country ceded. For, 1. The previous cession is "as well of the soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon;" that the proviso was intended as a qualification of the whole grant, and must be construed not only to secure rights of property in the soil ceded, but the rights of individuals resident thereon, over whom exclusive jurisdiction is also ceded. 2. As "rights of property in the soil" could be none other than the rights of individuals to property in the soil, if they alone were intended to be secured, the other member of the sentence, securing "the rights of individuals therein," will be wholly inoperative and nugatory. 3. The word "therein," in truth, belongs to both members of the sentence, though, according to the idiom of the language, it is inserted only after the last: the sense is the same as if it had been written "any right of property in the soil therein, or to affect the rights of individuals therein;" i. e. in the tract of country before ceded.

tion a part of the compact, by which the powers of exclusive legislation which Congress is to exercise are so limited that it cannot assume any right of property in the soil, or affect the rights of individuals in any property. And then the only question will be whether the right of the owner in slaves, in the parent stock and future increase, was, in the view of the contracting parties, (the Legislature of Virginia and Congress,) a right of property. I have no idea that the terms of the proviso in our act of cession were dictated by any prophetic apprehension that Congress would ever attempt to abolish slavery in the District; they are attributable to that habitual caution which marked all our legislative proceedings of that period. I say, then, that Congress is precluded by compact, in the exercise of its exclusive legislation, from abolishing the rights of slave property in the part of the District ceded by Virginia. I have looked into the act of Maryland of 1788, concerning the cession of her part of the District, and I do not find that she exercised the like caution; that she qualified her cession by any proviso or stipulation. But, in my opinion, no such stipulation was necessary to limit the power of Congress in respect to slave property in the District.

The District was ceded, not to the United States, but to Congress, which can claim no rights of sovereignty, whatever the United States may: it was ceded by the ordinary Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, which never pretended to sovereignty. We know that the sovereignty of each State resides in the people. The principle, agreed on both hands, from which we are arguing, is, that Congress, in exercising exclusive legislation over the territory, property, and people, of this District, are competent to do whatever the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia are competent to do in respect to the territory, property, and people, of those States, respectively; and (I add and insist) no more. Therefore, in order to show that Congress has constitutional power to abolish the rights of slave property in this District, it must first be shown that the Legislatures of those two States have, and had at the time of their cession, constitutional power to abolish the rights of slave property within their limits.

There has been in Virginia as earnest a desire to abolish slavery as exists any where at this day. It commenced with the Revolution, and many of our ablest and most influential men were active in recommending it, and in devising plans for the accomplishment of it. The Legislature encouraged and facilitated emancipation by the owners, and many slaves were so emancipated. The leaning of the courts of justice was always in favorem libertatis. This disposition continued until the impracticability of effecting a general emancipation, without incalculable mischief to the master race, and danger of utter destruction to the other, and the evils consequent on partial emancipations, became too obvious to the Legislature, and to the great majority of the people, to be longer disregarded. There were some who very early wrote and published plans for accomplishing a general emancipation—considerate, prudent men, understanding the subject, and too wise to overlook or disregard the political considerations that belonged to it. Mr. Jefferson suggested a scheme; and the gentleman under whose care and direction my mind was instituted in the science of the law—I mean the elder Judge Tucker—proposed another plan for the purpose, and published a tract on the subject. It has been so long since I read these works, that I do not pretend to an accurate recollection of them; but I think the authors were chiefly intent on devising a feasible plan, and did not bestow much attention to the question by what authority such a plan, if practicable in itself and expedient, was to be accomplished; which is our question.

I can venture to say that the great body of the jurists of Virginia, as well as of the people, have always denied, and do yet deny, the constitutional power of the ordinary Legislature to abolish the rights of slave property without the consent of the individual owners. I do not know what opinion has been entertained in Maryland. I only know that the same reasoning is equally applicable to the legal institutions of both States. And the reasoning is as simple as (to my mind) it is conclusive. At the time of the formation of the constitution of both States, the rights of individuals to property in their slaves existed in both, exactly as they have ever since continued, and still continue, to exist: they were universally recognised as property, to all intents and purposes; property founded in ancient laws, and clearly defined and regulated; indefeasible property, just as indefeasible as property in lands or any thing else. The people of both States, in forming their constitutions, and their delegates who framed them in convention, intended, beyond all manner of doubt, to recognise, establish, and secure, this slave property, as well as property of every other kind. They took care to make private property of all kinds, without discrimination, sacred and inviolable, and to place it beyond the power of the ordinary Legislature to assume, abolish, or impair it. This is a fundamental principle in the constitutions of both States; and it has been invariably admitted and acted on, in the ordinary legislation of both. If our Legislatures have any extraordinary powers, by virtue of which they may abolish slave property, they are certainly not to be found in our constitutions, as they have been uniformly understood by us, and practically expounded. I defy human ingenuity to invent an argument which shall be of force to establish a power in the ordinary Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia to abolish slave property, that will not be of equal force to justify them in the abolition of property in lands, and, indeed, of the very principle of property itself. If, therefore, Congress has the same power, and no more, over the subject of slave property in this District, which the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia have over slave property within their respective jurisdictions, and had over slave property in their several parts of the District at the time of their cessions, I conclude, confidently, that Congress has no rightful authority to abolish slavery in the District without the consent of the owners, or to emancipate a single slave without the consent of the individual owner.

I presume it can hardly be imagined that Congress can have derived from the acts of cession of Maryland and Virginia, that is, by virtue of those acts alone, any other or greater powers of legislation over the District than those Legislatures themselves had at the time of the cession; in other words, that the grantee has acquired, by the grant, more power than the grantors had to cede.

If the provision of the constitution of the United States, giving power to Congress "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such District as may, by the cession of particular States, and acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States," is to be taken as the only source and the only measure of the power of Congress; if this provision is to be construed as conferring on Congress absolute, sovereign, despotic authority over the people of the District, and their private rights of property, unlimited by the just measure of authority that belonged to the State Legislatures by which the territory was ceded—unlimited by any consideration of the nature, purposes, and exigencies, of the trust for which the power of exclusive legislation was given, then it will follow that Congress may, in its wisdom, or in its folly, abolish property in lands as well as in slaves; may enact an agrarian law; nay, more, may abolish the principle of property entirely, and establish a community of goods.

Abolition of Slavery.

[SENATE.]

Now, certainly, I do not apprehend any such absurd and mischievous legislation: but it is fair, it is even necessary, to pursue this claim of power to its consequences, in order to test its justice. The truth is, sir, that a grant of power of "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever," over a territory and the people in it, does not, in the just sense of that language, as used by American law-givers, import a grant of absolute, despotic, sovereign authority, or of any authority at all to assume, abolish, or impair, private rights of property. It imports a grant of the power of ordinary legislation. The proper as well as ordinary business of legislation is to regulate and secure the rights of property, never to annihilate them.

I desire the Senate to understand that I do not contend that the States of Maryland and Virginia have no power to abolish slavery within their jurisdiction—I only maintain that the ordinary Legislatures of those States have not, under their existing constitutions, any such power; not denying that the sovereignty of either State may, by an amendment of its constitution, confer such power on the Legislature. I do not deny that the two States have parted with their dominion over the District; nor do I contend that power can by no means be vested in Congress to abolish slavery in the District, in any state of circumstances. I maintain that the States ceded their dominion to the United States, not to Congress; that the sovereignty over the territory and the people is in the United States, by virtue of the provision of the constitution authorizing the State Legislature to cede, and Congress to accept; that Congress has only the power of ordinary legislation; no absolute, sovereign power whatever; no power to impair, much more abolish, any private right of property of any kind; and that the power to abolish slave property in the District can no otherwise be conferred on Congress than by an amendment of the constitution of the United States.

But, independently of this view of the subject, (Mr. LETCH said,) there were other objections to the competency of Congress to exercise the power in question, which seemed to him insuperable and conclusive. What, he asked, would be the effect of the abolition of slavery in this District? and what was, and must be, the only object of such a measure? To the consequences, he supposed, no man would affect to be blind: a large body of free negroes would at once be established in the midst of two of the principal slaveholding States; the District would become the receptacle in which other population of the same class would soon be congregated; and these people, from their position, would necessarily have opportunities of daily intercourse with the slaves of the two adjoining States, of holding out to them every motive to revolt, inciting them to continual and dangerous insurrections, and supplying them with the means of waging a servile war against us. And as to the object and design of the abolitionists in urging this measure, it could not be disguised that abolition in this District was not sought as an end, but as the means of success in other and far greater enterprises; that their purpose was to gain a point, and a most commanding point too, from which they might prosecute their schemes of abolition, first in Maryland and Virginia, and then, in regular process, in all the other slaveholding States.

It was, doubtless, the conviction that these mischievous designs were entertained, and a sense of the dangerous consequences that would probably, if not unavoidably, ensue from the accomplishment of the immediate object, which produced so general an opinion in the Senate that it would be impolitic, unwise, and unjust, to abolish slavery in this District. But the same considerations, Mr. L. thought, must lead us to the conclusion that it was unconstitutional also; contrary to the spirit, if not to the letter, of the constitution. He had always supposed that, in giving power to call out the militia to suppress insurrections, the constitution made it the duty of this Government to exert the power for the suppression of servile insurrections in any of the States; and he asked whether it could possibly be maintained that Congress could constitutionally adopt any measure, of which the manifest and acknowledged tendency, if not the certain effect, was to incite those very servile insurrections which the Government was under a constitutional obligation to suppress? If we could not look for a limitation on the powers vested in a Government in the obligations imposed upon it, where could such limitations be found? Again, it was admitted, and had always been admitted, that Congress had no power to abolish or touch slave property in any of the States. But here was a measure proposed to us for adoption, which did not, indeed, directly abolish slavery in any of the States, but which was, nevertheless the most efficient measure that could possibly be devised to bring about, and in fact to compel, general abolition in the slaveholding States—a measure which, for that reason, the advocates of universal abolition most ardently desired, as the means of accomplishing their avowed purpose. And the question was, whether it was within the competency of Congress to adopt such a measure? whether, while it acknowledged that it could not, without violating its constitutional duty to the slaveholding States, accomplish the end, it might yet authorize and provide the most efficacious means of ultimately accomplishing it? Mr. L. said it was a principle of all ethics—it was a principle especially applicable and valuable in the administration of all Governments of limited powers—that that which cannot be lawfully accomplished by direct means, cannot rightfully be attempted by any manner of indirection.

He said there were other objections to the competency of Congress to abolish slavery in the District, which he should forbear to urge, because they had already been enforced by other gentlemen in the debate. He had only to add that, in the science of Government as well as in law, all powers were trusts; and if, in fair construction, a grant of power might be extended beyond its strict literal import, to reach the exigencies of the trust, so also should powers granted in general terms be limited by a due consideration of the purposes of the trust for which they were conferred. He remembered many instances in which construction and inference had been resorted to (and some in which he thought they had been pushed to extremes) for the purpose of enlarging the powers delegated to this Government; but he knew of no instance hitherto in which they had been admitted, when resorted to for the purpose of imposing limitations.

And now, said Mr. L., I have to call the attention of the Senate to another topic, to which I feel myself bound to advert, and yet approach it with a sense of pain. I mentioned the other day that I had received a pamphlet, purporting to be a commentary on a book recently published by an eminent divine, and containing many extracts from the book, which at once afflicted and alarmed me. I have since read the book itself; its title is, "Slavery, by William E. Channing," printed at Boston, 1835. And I must say that I have never risen from the perusal of any book with a feeling of deeper sorrow. It has had the effect of weakening the chief remaining ground of hope in my mind that the incendiary schemes of the abolitionists in the Northern States, the system of agitation they have organized, the war they are kindling against the peace and happiness of the South and the harmony of the Union, would be effectually counteracted and suppressed by the efforts of our fellow-citizens of the non-slaveholding States themselves; for, whether I consult my heart or understanding, I had much rather counteraction and suppression should be their work, than that we should have to rely on our own prudence and energy to avert the danger. The hope that the legislative authorities of the non-slaveholding States would concert and adopt measures to suppress and punish the conspiracy (for such in truth it is) which has been formed against us, and which our political connexions with them serve to make more formidable, has been long waning, and is now almost gone. My chief ground of hope then was, that the great mass of well-informed, wise, and influential men, and the good sense, justice, and patriotism, of the great body of the people in the non-slaveholding States, combining to discountenance the wicked enterprises of the abolitionists, and the yet more wicked means by which they are working, could not fail to produce a state of public opinion that would alone suffice to lay the evil spirit of agitation, and restore the South to quiet and to confidence in the loyalty of our Northern brethren to their social relations with us. And, till I saw this book, this hope had not been disappointed. I have intimated this before, and I am most happy to repeat it. But here is a book published by Dr. Channing—a man whose former publications have taught me to admire, esteem, and respect him—a man eminent for his learning and abilities, and venerable for his piety; a minister of the gospel, too, than whom there is none more popular; a person who, on all these accounts, is likely to have, and (if I am rightly informed) does in fact possess, the highest influence over the public mind; a book written by Dr. Channing, of which the principal purpose apparent in every page, and, indeed, avowed, is to counteract the efforts of others to allay the excitement in the Southern States, by removing the causes of irritation; and to encourage the abolitionists to persevere in their designs, only counselling them to exercise the wisdom of the serpent, for he certainly thinks them not wanting in the meekness of the dove. I say, his purpose to counteract the efforts of those who are endeavoring to put down the schemes of the abolitionists, by embodying public opinion into efficient action against them, is avowed; and I appeal to the following passage, in which he declares the motive and object of the publication:

SENATE.]

Abolition of Slavery.

"My work is done. I ask and hope for it the Divine blessing, as far as it expresses the truth, and breathes the spirit of justice and humanity. If I have written any thing under the influence of prejudice, passion, or unkindness to any human being, I ask forgiveness of God and man. I have spoken strongly, not to offend or give pain, but to produce in others deep convictions corresponding to my own. Nothing but a feeling, which I could not escape, of the need of such a work at this very moment, has induced me to fix my thoughts on so painful a subject. The few last months have increased my solicitude for the country. Public sentiment has seemed to me to be losing its healthfulness and vigor. I have seen symptoms of the decline of the old spirit of liberty. Servile opinions have seemed to gain ground among us. The faith of our fathers in free institutions has waxed faint, and is giving place to despair of human improvements. I have perceived a disposition to deride abstract rights, to speak of freedom as a dream, and of republican Governments as built on sand. I have perceived a faint-heartedness in the cause of human rights. The condemnation which has been passed on abolitionists has seemed to be settling into acquiescence in slavery. The sympathies of the community have been turned from the slave to the master. The impious doctrine that human laws can repeal the Divine, can convert unjust and oppressive power into a moral right, has more and more tinctured the style of conversation and the press. With these sad and solemn views of society, I could not be silent; and I thank God, amidst the consciousness of great weakness and imperfection, that I have been able to offer this humble tribute, this sincere though feeble testimony, this expression of heart-felt allegiance, to the cause of freedom, justice, and humanity."

I have said, too, that the object of the author is to encourage the abolitionists to perseverance; and for the truth of that remark I might refer to a whole chapter on "abolitionism," in which he does indeed "censure" them, (as he expresses it,) but only for want of prudence; while he expresses his sympathy with them, his approbation of their motives and general designs, and his abhorrence of the persecutions they are undergoing; points out the errors they have committed, the chief of which is the adoption of an organized system of agitation; and yet assures "these persecuted abolitionists" that they "have the sympathies of the civilized world." The expression of his opinion of these "agitators," and his feelings towards them, seem, to me far better calculated to encourage them to persevere in their efforts and in their plans of operation, than his monitions can possibly be to turn them from the errors, not of their designs, but only of their ways. Hear what he says:

"I approach this subject [abolitionism] unwillingly, because it will be my duty to censure those whom, at this moment, I would on no account hold up to public displeasure. The persecutions which the abolitionists have suffered and still suffer awaken only my grief and indignation, and incline me to defend them to the full extent which truth and justice will admit. To the persecuted, of whatever name, my sympathies are pledged, and especially to those who are persecuted in a cause substantially good. I would not, for worlds, utter a word to justify the violence recently offered to a party, composed very much of men blameless in life, and holding the doctrine of non-resistance to injuries; and of women, exemplary in their various relations, and acting, however mistakenly, from benevolent and pious impulses. Of the abolitionists I know very few; but I am bound to say of these, that I honor them for their strength of principle, their sympathy with their fellow-creatures, and their active goodness. As a party, they are singularly free from political and religious sectarianism, and have been distinguished by the absence of management, calculation, and worldly wisdom. That they have ever proposed or desired insurrection or violence among the slaves, there is no reason to believe. All their principles repel the supposition."

"The persecutions which the abolitionists have suffered and still suffer!" What persecutions? Does Dr. Channing allude to the concensus omnium bonorum, that all peaceful means should be adopted to allay the rising excitement in the South, and to remove the known causes of irritation? Or does he allude to the interference of the people of Boston, and in other Northern towns, to disperse their meetings, held, it would seem, by way of bravado, in defiance of the known public sense of the mischief they were doing? Or does he allude to the few white men who were hanged in Mississippi last summer, on the charge of actually inciting insurrection? Did those men really belong to the society of abolitionists? Or does Dr. Channing only mean to give his countenance to the cry of persecution that has been raised by the abolitionists, without knowing what they well know, that the cry of persecution, if they can raise it with success, will give them new strength? "There is no reason to believe that they have ever proposed or desired insurrection or violence among the slaves." If Dr. Channing had said there was no reason to believe that they have ever avowed such a purpose, he would have stated the truth, without doubt; but if he had seen the incendiary papers, of all kinds, which they poured into the South during the last summer, I am quite sure he himself would not have required any other evidence of the malignity and criminality of their purposes.

Abolition of Slavery.

But I cannot help doubting whether Dr. Channing is sufficiently informed upon this subject to be capable of judging what publications are incendiary in their tendency. It is hard to doubt the sincerity of his professions of charity towards his slaveholding fellow-citizens of the South; it is yet harder to distrust his earnest disclaimer of intention, in what he publishes in his own book, to act at all on the minds of the slaves themselves; and I have not the heart to feel such doubt or distrust of him. I will not; I cannot. But I ask the attention of the Senate to the following passage in his work, which is one out of many of the like temper that might be quoted: "We have thus seen that a human being cannot rightfully be held and used as property. No legislation, not that of all countries or worlds, could make him so. Let this be laid down as a first, fundamental truth. Let us hold it fast, as a most sacred, precious truth. Let us hold it fast against all customs, all laws, all rank, wealth, and power. Let it be armed with the whole authority of the civilized and Christian world." Now, if Dr. Channing does not know that such language as this is in its nature and tendency incendiary, I insist that he ought not to write upon any subject he so little understands; and if he did know it—but that I cannot, will not, believe—I am not, and I will not permit myself to be, wanting in heart-felt charity towards him, however cold must be his charity towards so depraved a being as he probably suspects me to be, in common with all Southern slaveholders. Does he think that these doctrines of his can never reach the ears of the negro race? If I thought so, if I did not believe that they have already reached them, I should not have repeated them in this place.

Dr. Channing professes, in the beginning of his book, to address himself, not to the slave, but to the master race: "It is not," says he, "by personal, direct action on the mind of the slave that we can do him good. Our concern is with the free; with the free we are to plead his cause." And, towards the close of the work, in the advice he gives us as to the "means of removing slavery," he says, yet more formally, "how slavery shall be removed, is a question for the slaveholder, and one which he alone can fully answer. He alone has an intimate knowledge of the character and habits of the slaves, to which the means of emancipation should be carefully adapted. General views and principles may and should be suggested at a distance; but the mode of applying them can be understood only by those who dwell on the spot where the evil exists. To the slaveholder belongs the duty of settling and employing the best means of liberation, and to no other. We have no right of interference, nor do we desire it." And in the chapter which he devotes to the correction of the errors of the abolitionists, (who, I doubt not, understand the end they are aiming at, and the means best adapted to the end, rather better than their monitor,) he says: "the adoption of the common system of agitation by the abolitionists has proved signally unsuccessful. From the beginning, it created alarm in the considerate, and strengthened the sympathies of the free States with the slaveholder. It made converts of a few individuals, but alienated multitudes. Its influence at the South has been evil without mixture. It has stirred up bitter passions and a fierce fanaticism, which have shut every ear and every heart against its arguments and persuasions. These effects are the more to be deplored, because the hope of freedom to the slave lies chiefly in the dispositions of his master. The abolitionist proposed, indeed, to convert the slaveholders; and, for this end, he approached them with vituperation, and exhausted on them the vocabulary of abuse! And he has reaped as he sowed. His vehement pleadings for the slaves have been answered by wilder ones from the slaveholder; and, what is worse, deliberate defences of slavery have been sent forth, in the spirit of the dark ages, and in defiance of the moral convictions and feelings of the Christian and civilized world. Thus, with good purposes, nothing seems to have been gained. Perhaps (though I am anxious to repel the thought) something has been lost to the cause of freedom and humanity."

Now, let us see how Dr. Channing practises the precepts he delivers to the abolitionists, and how (professing to address himself to his slaveholding fellow-citizens) he avoids the errors he imputes to them. In the first place he says, and that, too, by way of apology for us, and as a motive of charity towards us, that "a man born among slaves, accustomed to this relation from his birth, taught its necessity by venerated parents, associating it with all whom he reveres, and too familiar with its evils to see and feel their magnitude, can hardly be expected to look on slavery as it appears to more impartial and distant observers." This is only an expression of the common opinion of the abolitionists in England and America, that they, who have no experience on the subject, are better able to comprehend the evil, and to devise the corrective, than any person born, bred, and living, in a slaveholding country; because, though we have better opportunities of information, our minds are necessarily clouded by interest and the prejudices of education and habit. But Dr. Channing has other opinions of us, which (coming with the gospel in his hand to admonish us for our own good) he thinks proper to announce to us in these words: "I approach a more delicate subject, and one on which I shall not enlarge. To own the persons of others, to hold females in slavery, is necessarily fatal to the purity of a people. That unprotected females, stripped by their degrading condition of woman's self-respect, should be used to minister to other passions in men than the love of gain, is next to inevitable. Accordingly, in such a community the reins are given to youthful licentiousness. Youth, every where in perils, is in these circumstances urged to vice with a terrible power. And the evil cannot stop at youth. Early licentiousness is fruitful of crime in mature life. How far the obligation to conjugal fidelity, the sacredness of domestic ties, will be revered amidst such habits, such temptations, such facilities to vice, as are involved in slavery, needs no exposition. So terrible is the connexion of crimes! They, who invaded the domestic rights of others, suffer in their own homes. The household of the slave may be broken up arbitrarily by the master; but he finds his revenge, if revenge he asks, in the blight which the master's unfaithfulness sheds over his own domestic joys. A slave country reeks with licentiousness. It is tainted with a deadlier pestilence than the plague."

I am not going to enter into a refutation of these imputations, or the reasonings they are founded on. I shall content myself with declaring my conscientious belief that there is no society existing on the globe, in which the virtue of conjugal fidelity, in man as well as woman, and the happiness of domestic life, are more general than in the slaveholding States. I can find an apology for Dr. Channing's errors of opinion in an apology he makes for the errors of others. "As the intellect, in grasping one truth, often loses its hold of others, and, by giving itself up to one idea, falls into exaggeration, so the moral sense, in seizing on a particular exercise of philanthropy, forgets other duties, and will even violate many important precepts, in its eagerness to carry one into perfection." But I can find no apology for his publication of such opinions of his slaveholding fellow-citizens. Surely he cannot think that it is calculated to conciliate a favorable hearing from us of his arguments and admonitions! The Tappans and the Garrisons have never (that I know of) "approached us" with any harsher "vituperation;" and Dr. Channing, too, must expect to "reap as he has sowed." But as to the reasonableness of the opinion that "a slave country is reeking with licentiousness," that "it is tainted with a deadlier pestilence than the plague," is it possible that Dr. Channing can believe that there is less temptation, of the kind he speaks of, in the Northern towns than in our Southern slaveholding country? Are they, too, "tainted with a pestilence deadlier than the plague?" Has he never read the authentic accounts of the condition of the operatives of England, touching their impurity, in the very particular as to which he impugns ours? And does he, notwithstanding, ascribe this "pestilence deadlier than the plague" to the existence of domestic slavery among us? I hope and I believe that the operatives in our own manufacturing States are in a far happier and more elevated condition, moral and intellectual.

Dr. Channing adds what is, if possible, yet more offensive to us, and revolting to others. He says: "But the worst is not told; as a consequence of criminal connexions, many a master has children born into slavery. Of these, most, I presume, receive protection, perhaps indulgence, during the life of the fathers; but at their death not a few are left to the chances of a cruel bondage. These cases must have increased, since the difficulties of emancipation have even multiplied. Still more, it is to be feared that there are cases in which the master puts his own children under the whip of the overseer, or else sells them to undergo the miseries of bondage among strangers. I should rejoice to learn that my impressions of this point are false. If they be true, then our own country, calling itself enlightened and Christian, is defiled with one of the greatest enormities on earth. We send missionaries to heathen lands. Among the pollutions of heathenism I know nothing worse than this. The heathen who feasts on his country's foe may hold up his head by the side of the Christian who sells his child for gain—sells him to be a slave. God forbid that I should charge this crime on a people! But however rarely it may occur, it is a fruit of slavery, an exercise of power belonging to slavery, and no laws restrain or punish it. Such are the evils which spring naturally from the licentiousness generated by slavery."

Dr. Channing cannot be allowed, in one breath, to make the charge and to disclaim it: he has made it in as strong terms as he possibly could. I shall not deny that there are men of depraved, cruel, ruthless hearts in the slaveholding States, and that such facts as he mentions may have occurred. But is it reasonable, is it charitable, to allege such iniquities as a reproach against our national character? Within the last year, I seen have several accounts of parents exposing their new-born infants in the city of New York—leaving them to the chance of being saved by casual humanity, or perishing of hunger and cold: is there a man in his sound senses that would deduce from such facts matter of reproach against the people of that city? No state of society has ever been exempt from crime, and atrocious crime. But I believe that the judicial records of this country will show that the number of crimes, and especially those of deepest atrocity, committed in the non-slaveholding States is much greater than those committed in the non-slaveholding States. Shall I, therefore, institute any uncharitable comparisons between the two states of society, or deduce conclusions injurious to that of the non-slaveholding States? Heaven forbid! It is the habit of my mind, it is the habit of my conversation, to avoid such comparisons and such conclusions; and I can find a reason for the fact I have mentioned in the greater density of population in the non-slaveholding States.

Dr. Channing, in considering the objections made against abolition, (as to which his information is extremely imperfect,) supposes that "the most common objection is, that a mixture of the two races will be the result;" and then he asks, "Can this objection be urged in good faith? Can this mixture go on faster, or more criminally, than at present? Can the slaveholder use the word amalgamation without a blush?" I do not quote the passage to complain (as well I might) of the taunting manner in which it is put, but only to remark that it is absolutely wonderful how little amalgamation has taken place in the course of two centuries.

The taunts of Mr. O'Connell raise in my mind no other sentiment than scorn. He, I believe, is actuated by the pure love of mischief. He is the incarnate spirit of agitation. His own country, it seems, is too narrow a field for him. He would, if he could, throw every nation on the earth into commotion, and glory in the mighty hubbub, as an exhibition of his power. But Dr. Channing is a man of very different, and, in my opinion, far higher character; and the opinions of such a man, impugning the moral character of the whole slaveholding population of this country, published to the world, and published for conscience sake, are not to be scorned. His work, so far as it is intended for the free of the non-slaveholding States, may be calculated to produce the effect he designs, though I hope he will be disappointed even there. But so far as it is addressed to the free of the slaveholding States, it can only tend to kindle new excitement; and, so far as it may affect the dispositions of the slave race, its tendency is to mischief, nothing but mischief.

It is a most ill-timed and most injudicious work. It is remarkable for a singular inattention to and disregard of the political considerations which belong to the subject, and cannot possibly be separated from it, owing, perhaps, to an ignorance of them. I may well apply the language in which Sallust portrays Catiline—not to Dr. Channing, (for I cannot with candor and truth apply such language to him,) but to his book: satis eloquentiæ, sapientiæ parum. He discusses the question of right in slave property, apparently, without the least idea of the principle in which such property originated, which, whether it is a sufficient foundation for the right or not, is yet well known and understood; he represents the cruel wrongs, the grinding oppression and misery, to which our slaves are subjected, and aggravates them by all the arts of eloquence, without considering at all the peculiar character of the negro race, without any clear understanding of the very peculiar relation between master and slave, and without any knowledge of the compensations which Providence has ordained to ameliorate his condition, and which make him, notwithstanding his bondage, contented and happy, and would keep him so, if a misguided philanthropy would forbear its officiousness. He condemns the traffic in slaves, without appearing to know that the most cruel evil that could be inflicted on them would be to attach them to the soil; that that would result in exterminating slavery, indeed, but only by exterminating the slave race.

But this is no time or place for the discussion of the subject. However, let me ask whether it never occurred to Dr. Channing to observe that the ratio of increase of the slave population is as great as that of the white race, and indeed somewhat exceeds it, (for the former is liable to fewer casualties than the latter,) and that this fact alone affords the strongest argument to prove that our slaves are not subjected to that grinding oppression and misery which, reasoning without much, if any, experience, he has deduced as an unavoidable consequence of domestic slavery? He paints in vivid colors the evils of slavery; did it never occur to him to exercise his sagacity in counting the probable evils of insurrection or of emancipation? As to insurrection, the evil consequences of that to the white race will chiefly affect the value of their property; the mischief to us, in any other point of view, however horrible, must be only partial and temporary; and though blood will flow in streams, it will not be our blood. And as to a general emancipation, if it could by any human wisdom be accomplished, it would kindle a war of extermination of which one or the other race would be the victim—which, no thinking man needs to be informed of.

The friends of abolition have only to remember the mobs in Cincinnati, Philadelphia, and New York, unaccountably incited against the very few free negroes living in those cities, to have a faint idea of the consequences which would follow from a general emancipation in the slaveholding States. It is peculiar to the character of this Anglo-Saxon race of men to which we belong, that it has never been contented to live in the same country with any other distinct race, upon terms of equality; it has, invariably, when placed in that situation, proceeded to exterminate or enslave the other race in some form or other, or, failing in that, to abandon the country. [Here Mr. L. recounted several historical instances.] But enough. I hope, in what I have said of Dr. Channing, I have not been wanting in charity towards him. But as for this book of his, he will neither be surprised nor offended if I should be unwilling that my brethren, either of the non-slaveholding or of the slaveholding States, much more that my own children, should believe that I admit his opinions of the slaveholding country to which I belong are well founded in fact.

Mr. CALHOUN called for the reading of the petition, and it was accordingly read.

Mr. C. then observed that he did not rise to say one word on the subject of these petitions, which he considered had been sufficiently elucidated by the very able argument just heard, of his friend from Virginia. He did not know when he heard an argument more forcible, more full, more modest, and more comprehensible. He rose to make some remarks on the particular petition then before the Senate, which had been selected from the others, to induce a part of the Southern delegation to consent to receiving it. It was certainly, he admitted, less objectionable in its language than the petition coming from the ladies of the same State. This memorial, however, contained language highly reprehensible. It spoke of "dealing in human flesh." Will our friends of the South, said Mr. C., agree that they keep shambles, and deal in human flesh? And this petition was selected from the others, and pushed forward, in order to obtain the votes of gentlemen from the South. There was another phrase in the petition to which he objected. It speaks of us, said Mr. C., as pirates. Strange language! Piracy and butchery? We must not permit those we represent to be thus insulted on that floor. He stood prepared, whenever petitions like this were presented, to call for their reading, and to demand that they be not received. His object was to prevent a dangerous agitation, which threatened to burst asunder the bond of this Union. The only question was, how was agitation to be avoided. He held that receiving these petitions encouraged agitation, the most effectual mode to destroy the peace and harmony of the Union.

Mr. WRIGHT said he considered it to be his duty to trouble the Senate with a very few remarks before the pending question was put. He did so with extreme reluctance, arising from the deepest conviction that this whole subject had better not have been debated at all; that these petitions had better have been suffered to take their usual course, the course they had taken every year when he had been a member of either House of Congress; the course of other petitions: of being permitted to be read at the Clerk's table, and referred to the appropriate committee. His reluctance was greatly, and perhaps he might say principally, increased by the consciousness that the whole subject was surrounded with difficulties; that it was excitable in every aspect; that the different sections of the Union were liable to different affections from the expression of the same sentiment; and that some unmeasured phrase, or some imprudent remark, might fall from him, which, unintentionally on his part, might increase, rather than allay excitement, in the one portion or the other of the country.

Yet he felt that he should not discharge the duty incumbent upon him, or properly represent his constituents, if he permitted this question to be decided without saying any thing. Had he been able, otherwise, to content himself to give a silent vote, he could not do so now, since the extracts read by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEIGH,] from the late publication of the Rev. Dr. Channing, a book he had never seen, and of the contents of which he was wholly ignorant, any farther than the very limited quotations of that honorable Senator had made him acquainted with them. He was prepared, however, from those extracts alone, to say that, however distinguished, however pure, however pious, and however well intended, the author of that work might be, in issuing to the public such a book, he had shown himself as ignorant of the opinions and feelings of the great mass of the citizens of the non-slaveholding States, as he had, in the quotations made, of the merits and virtues of the people of the South. He (Mr. W.) was ready to pronounce, in his place, that the publication, in the spirit in which it seemed to be written, as grossly abused the Northern feeling as its language did the Southern morals.

When such representations of the sentiment of the North came from such sources, it was incumbent upon him to convince the Senator from Virginia, the Senate, and the public, that a belief in them, as the sentiments of the non-slaveholding States, would be doing violent injustice to those States, and to the patriotism and opinions of their citizens.

Mr. W. said he was not to discuss the subject of slavery in the abstract. He knew it, and the people of the North, as a body, knew it only as it existed under the constitution of the United States, and was sanctioned by it. They thought of it in that light, and in that light only, so far as its existence in these States is concerned, and so far as the quiet of the country and the preservation of the Union are involved in any agitation of the subject. In that sense, it was not a question for discussion in that body.

Neither, said Mr. W., was he to debate the question of slavery in the sovereign States of this Union. The sacred and invaluable compact which constitutes us one people, had not given to Congress the jurisdiction over that question. It was left solely and exclusively to those States, and, in his humble judgment, it ought never to be debated here in any manner whatever.

Mr. W. said he would go farther, and say that he did not purpose to trouble the Senate with a discussion upon the propriety of any action on the part of Congress in reference to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in regard to the constitutional power of Congress over that subject. He had listened with pleasure and profit to the able argument of the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEIGH,] upon the powers of Congress, and had marked his concessions of power equal to that possessed by the Legislatures of the respective States of Maryland and Virginia over the same subject within those States. He had not studied the question himself, because he was able to mark out his own course, with perfect satisfaction to his own mind, without examining either the constitutional powers of Congress, or the powers of those State Legislatures. He was ready to declare his opinion to be, that Congress ought not to act in this matter, but upon the impulse of the two States surrounding the District, and then in a manner precisely graduated by the action of those States upon the same subject. Had the constitution, in terms, given to Congress all power in the matter, this would, with his present views and feelings, be his opinion of the expedient rule of action, and entertaining this opinion, an examination into the power to act had been unnecessary to determine his vote upon the prayer of these petitions. He was ready promptly to reject their prayer, and he deeply regretted that he was not permitted so to vote without debate.

SENATE.]

Abolition of Slavery.

The refusal to receive the petitions, Mr. W. said, was, to his mind, a very different question. That was the question now presented. If the refusal should be sanctioned by the Senate, upon the broad ground of the subject prayed for, and not upon the distinct objection of indecorous language or matter in the petition itself, it would be considered and felt, in many sections of the country, as a denial of the constitutional right to petition, and, as such, would be infinitely more calculated to produce and increase, than to allay, excitement. The prompt rejection of the prayer of these petitions would express the sense of the Senate, in the most marked and decisive manner, against the objects of the petitioners. The refusal to receive the petitions would raise a new issue, infinitely more favorable, as he deeply feared, to the schemes of these mad incendiaries than all which had gone before this proposed step.

He entreated, he said, his brethren of the South to reflect before they gave this immense advantage to the agitators. He was aware that the Southern feeling must be sensitive, perhaps beyond his ability to estimate, upon this subject of domestic slavery. The constitutional rights, the personal and private interests, the domestic peace and domestic security, of the people of the slaveholding States, compelled them to feel deeply and keenly upon every agitation of this delicate question. He could not be insensible to the existence of these feelings, or to their justice. Yet, might he not appeal to members of this body from those States, and ask them to remember that excitement, growing out of the same subject, was also prevailing in the non-slaveholding States? That the public mind in those States had become aroused to the subject? That a limited number of individuals, from what motives he would not attempt to say, were making it their calling and business to increase that excitement, and to make it universal? And might he not claim that the action of the Senate should be such as would be most likely to calm the excitement in all the States and in every section of the Union?

What, then, Mr. W. asked, was the action most likely to produce this result, a result, he must believe, most highly desired by every member of the Senate? To answer this inquiry he must detain the Senate with a short examination of the true state of public opinion in the non-slaveholding States, in relation to the movements of the abolitionists, as manifested and published to the world since the last adjournment of Congress. He should confine his statements upon this point to the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent here, because his information in reference to that portion of the North was more minute and authentic, and because he was satisfied that the general feeling of the citizens of his State, upon this point, was equally the general feeling of all the non-slaveholding States.

He would then say that he did not know of a single meeting of citizens in his State; convened for the purpose of considering the civil and political condition of the country, during the whole summer and autumn now last past, of whatever political party the meeting might be, one single instance to which he should have occasion hereafter to refer being alone excepted, which had not made the most distinct and firm expressions against the efforts of these agitators. In addition to this evidence of the almost entire feeling of the citizens of the State, obtained from these ordinary assemblages of citizens, he need only remind the Senate, to bring the fact to the distinct recollection of every member of the body, that immense public meetings, composed of men of all grades of talent and influence, of all parties in politics, and of all sects in religion, had been held in almost every populous town in New York, for the express purpose of giving to the country, and especially to their brethren of the South, the public sentiment and public reprobation of the efforts of the few fanatics whose exertions to agitate the question of slavery were considered as infringing upon the constitutional rights of the slaveholding States, as calculated to disturb the peace of those States, and, what was considered of infinitely more importance, to endanger the harmony and perpetuity of the Union. The expressions of these meetings (Mr. W. said) had neither been weak nor equivocal. They had breathed a spirit of patriotism, of generous feelings towards their brethren of the South, and of attachment to the Union, which he was sure his Southern friends would appreciate and reciprocate.

It became now his duty, and he performed it with no small degree of mortification, to speak of the exception to which he had referred. All within the hearing of his voice would recollect that, during the summer or fall, notice was given to the public of a State convention of abolitionists, to be held at the city of Utica, in the State of New York, in the month of October last, according to his present recollection of the time. The notice appeared formidable, from the array of names appended to it, they being several hundred in number, and exhibiting among them a large proportion of the names of preachers of the gospel of peace. It gave him unfeigned pleasure to say that time proved that many of these names, and those of individuals by no means the least respectable in character and standing and influence, had been appended to the notice without the consent or authority of the persons whose names they were, and, in many instances, in open and direct opposition to the wishes and feelings of the individuals.

Still the notice had the effect of causing delegates to be appointed to attend the proposed convention, from too many places in the State, and the design of holding the convention was persevered in. A short time before the day fixed for assembling this body of agitators, application on their behalf was made to the municipal authorities of the city of Utica, for leave to use a public building within the city, erected at the expense of the citizens of the town, as the place for the meeting of the convention. Through an excess of complaisance, or a mistaken feeling of indulgence, the required permission was given by the Common Council of the city. No sooner was this fact made known to the citizens, than a public meeting was called, and resolutions of the most distinct and decisive character passed, declaring that the public building in question, erected at their expense, and for their use, should not be prostituted to so mischievous a purpose; and that the proposed convention should not occupy it. This meeting was a voluntary assemblage of the inhabitants of the town, and of course unauthoritative; but, to make themselves sure of their object, and to carry their resolves into certain effect, the meeting was adjourned to reassemble in the same public building proposed to be occupied by the abolition convention, and on the same day when that convention was to meet. At an early hour of the day designated, the public building in question was filled with the citizens of the town, and not an abolitionist was known to enter it. Soon, however, the assemblage was informed that the proposed convention was assembling at a church in the vicinity, for the purpose, as it was believed, of showing upon paper, the proceedings of a State convention of that character. A committee, consisting of twenty-five members, selected from the most respectable and influential inhabitants of the town, was instantly appointed, and instructed by the meeting of citizens to repair to the church and inform the convention of the wishes and determination of the inhabitants of Utica, that their city should not be made the headquarters for their mischievous movements. The committee obeyed the order of the meeting; made their way into the church, and announced their errand and their instructions to the assembled convention, when, fortunately for the peace of the community, the convention dispersed, without attempting to proceed with their business.

Abolition of Slavery.

[SENATE.]

Such, Mr. W. said, substantially, was the history which had been given to him by eye-witnesses of the most respectable character, of the attempt to hold a State convention of abolitionists at Utica, and of its results; and, for the credit of his usually orderly and peaceable constituents, he wished he could stop here, and give the full evidences of the feelings manifested on that occasion. The whole truth, however, went further; and he believed it due to the present occasion to give the whole truth. During the night of the day on which the convention had been thus dispersed, he had been further informed that some disorderly persons forced their way into a printing office in Utica, supposed to be owned by some of the agitators, and certainly devoted to their cause, and committed depredations upon the property of the office; among other acts of violence, throwing the types into the street. These persons, for this offence, had been brought before the magistracy, and put under recognisance to appear at the then next court to be held for the county, and answer for the act. Recent information told him they had appeared; that their cases had been presented to the grand jury, and that that jury, acting upon their oaths, had reported no bills against them.

There was one further fact, Mr. W. said, he ought not to omit, in giving the evidences of the correct state of public opinion, elicited by this attempt to hold an abolition State convention at Utica. One member of the committee of twenty-five appointed by the citizens to repair, and who did repair, to the church, and aid in dispersing this convention, was, at the time, before the people as a candidate for the State Senate. In about two weeks from the time of the transactions he had detailed, the name of this gentleman was presented at the polls throughout his Senate district, a district comprising from 250,000 to 300,000 of the population of the State, and not a shadow of opposition was made against his election from any quarter. Could this have happened if these agitators had possessed any hold upon the feelings of that people, the very people among whom they had proposed to raise the standard and commence their proceedings as a State society? Most assuredly it could not.

Again: Another individual of that committee was a distinguished member of the New York delegation in the other branch of Congress, and information just received announced his appointment by the Legislature of the State, by a strong and almost unanimous vote, to the highly responsible and important office of attorney general of the State. Such had already been the expressions of public opinion as to two of the members of the committee of the citizens of Utica, who were put forward, at an important moment, to suppress the agitators. Could there be any thing equivocal in expressions like these? Would the honorable Senator from Virginia, would any member of the Senate, or any citizen of the country, after such manifestations, permit their confidence in the soundness of the public feeling at the North to be shaken by such a publication as that referred to from Doctor Channing? He could not think they would. He most earnestly hoped they would not.

Mr. W. said he had mentioned these facts, and he might mention many others of a somewhat similar character, to show that the determined feeling of resistance to these dangerous and wicked agitators in the North had already reached a point above and beyond the law, and, if left to its own voluntary action, decisive of the fate of abolitionism in that quarter. Why, he would ask, were such manifestations of feeling found among those who were wholly uninterested in slave property? The answer was single and palpable. Their attachment to the constitution and the Union prompted it; and, if left to govern themselves by that attachment, there was no cause to apprehend danger. He appealed, then, in the kindest manner, and with great confidence, to the representatives of the slaveholding States to say whether it was now desirable, whether it was now wise, to attempt to force this feeling further.

For himself, Mr. W. said, he must say he considered it immensely important that the action of the Senate should be calm and considerate; that nothing should be done rashly; that no step should be taken which could by any, the most sensitive, be considered violent. He must repeat that any such action would put a weapon into the hands of the agitators more powerful, and much more to be feared, than all their efforts of a voluntary character. Such, he most deeply feared, would be a vote of the Senate, that petitions upon this subject, without regard to their language and character, should not be received by the body. He was not disposed, at the present time, even to discuss the question of the extent of the constitutional right to petition Congress, so strongly did he feel that discussion or debate of any sort upon this topic could produce only unmixed evil to every portion of the country. He was willing, for his present purpose, to place the question of reception or rejection upon the ground taken by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] and to consider it as a question of mere expediency; and he hoped that, in that sense, he had said enough to satisfy every member of the Senate that there would be great danger in the course proposed by the motion under consideration. Without discussing the question, he thought that every Senator would concede that a general impression prevailed among our whole people, of every portion of the Union, that the right to petition Congress, in respectful terms and a respectful manner, was one of the broadest rights secured by the constitution. Refuse it upon the broad principle, as relating to this subject, and these malignant agitators will seize upon the act to draw to themselves and their cause the public sympathy. They will represent themselves as having been denied their constitutional rights, and as being the subjects of unjust and unreasonable persecution; and, once able to occupy that ground plausibly, they will become vastly more dangerous than they can ever make themselves by any efforts of their own.

Mr. W. said it appeared to him that a unanimous expression of the Senate, if that could be secured, was of the greatest importance, as being much more calculated to allay excitement, in every portion of the country, than any peculiar form of expression which might be preferred by any sectional interest. Under this impression, he had hoped that the liberal and patriotic proposition of his friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] would have been adopted by universal consent; that these petitions, and all others upon the same subject, if not clearly exceptionable in their language and manner, would be received, be permitted to be read at the Clerk's table, if desired, and then that the prayer of each would be promptly rejected, without one word of debate, and by the vote of every Senator. He yet hoped the Senate would consent to take that course. Its effect would be, in his judgment, most eminently calculated to allay excitement every where, and every where that effect was most desirable. A political or geographical vote could not have that effect any where; and therefore he hoped not to see such a vote.

A single other remark, (Mr. W. said,) and he would occupy the attention of the Senate no longer. The gentlemen from the South assure us they have no apprehensions for their safety, and for the safety of their respective States, let the present excitement result as it may. It was pleasant to him to hear these assurances. They were calculated to do good every where; but he must say, in sheer justice to the non-slaveholding States, that they should not be made in a manner to carry with them the implication that our fellow-citizens of the South are to meet enemies in the great body of the citizens of the North. Such is not the fact—they are friends to the South; friends to the constitutional rights of the South; friends to the peace of the country; friends to the preservation of the Union of these States; and they will, upon all occasions, and in every place, perform all their constitutional duties as pointed out by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEIGH.] They will, upon every call, most cheerfully lend their aid to quell insurrection, not promote it, they will open their arms, not present their bayonets, to all their fellow-citizens, of whatever section of the Union.

Mr. CALHOUN could not concur with the gentleman from New York that so much delicacy was to be shown to the very small part of his own State he referred to, that these petitions were not to be rejected, lest the refusal to receive them might be considered as a violation of the right of the citizen to petition Congress. But, (said Mr. C.,) does the gentleman look at our side of the question? If his constituents (continued Mr. C.) are to be treated with so much respect, that their petitions are to be received, what is to be considered as due to our constituents? The Senator considered the petition before the Senate as moderate in its language—he did not say otherwise—language (said Mr. C.) which treats us as butchers and pirates. The Senator said that they must receive this petition, and reject it, lest it might be considered as violating the right of petition. To receive it, and immediately reject it. This looked something like juggling. Was the petition of sufficient consequence to be received, and at the same time of so little consequence as to be immediately rejected? Was it intended merely that this petition was to be put on the files of the Senate as a record to show the opinion entertained of the people of the South by these abolitionists? The Senator told them that this abolition spirit had subsided at the North. He told them that this convention of Utica, which he spoke of as an exception to the general in his State, was compelled to disperse. Well, within a few days a newspaper, published at Utica, had been handed to him, called Oneida Standard and Democrat. He supposed the gentleman was acquainted with its character; it was headed "For President, Martin Van Buren, of New York; for Vice President, Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky." This paper contained a most violent attack on the Southern States and their institutions.

[Mr. WRIGHT explained. He only wished to state that it was the office where this paper was published which had been forcibly entered, and the types thrown into the street, as he had before related; that it was for that offence against this paper, when the grand jury of the county refused to find bills of indictment; that neither himself nor his friends could be responsible for the names which such a paper might choose to place at its head; but that of this one fact he could assure the Senator, of his own knowledge, that no other paper in the whole State was more universally or distinctly understood to be hostile to the political party to which he belonged than this paper, and he did not doubt that its columns would establish his position.]

Mr. CALHOUN continued. He had always supposed that there was something inexplicable in the politics of New York, and the explanation of the gentleman confirmed the opinion. But to return to the petitions. The gentleman said that unanimity of opinion in the Senate was very desirable. He said so too. Let the gentleman and his friends join us, (said Mr. C.,) and in that way we can obtain unanimity of opinion. If, as the gentleman said, the petition was to be immediately rejected, why receive it at all? Would the gentleman say that a refusal to receive the petition would press in the slightest degree on the constitutional right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances? If the gentleman had made up his mind to reject the petition, he could have no insuperable objection to refuse to receive it. He repeated, that so long as these petitions could be received in the Senate, so long would agitation on the subject continue. The question must be met on constitutional grounds, or not at all.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH observed that it seemed to be the wish on all sides to dispose of this subject. And the question was, what proposition was most likely to effect that object? If they received these petitions, they would be flooded with others of the same kind. If they rejected them, it might be imputed to something offensive in their language, and others would come in differently framed. When these petitioners see (said Mr. G.) that we act upon a proposition over which you cannot leap; they will say, here is erected an insuperable barrier to our applications, and our further efforts will be vain, and would end it. It is the desire of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to meet this proposition (said Mr. G.) on his motion not to receive these petitions. He was willing to vote so as to meet this single proposition; but not if it was to be considered as decisive of the action of the Senate upon the whole subject. He had another proposition, which he intended to bring forward for that purpose.

Mr. CALHOUN would only remark that these petitions might be rejected on various grounds. First, on the unconstitutionality of their object; second, for containing improper and disrespectful language; third, for the impropriety and unreasonableness of their prayers, and for the inexpediency of granting their requests.

Mr. MORRIS observed that, in presenting these petitions, it was his sincere desire to avoid any thing like agitation or excitement in that body. Although he had had these petitions in his possession for some days, he refrained from presenting them until he had an opportunity of observing what was done with others of a like tenor. The question now assumed a grave aspect. The constitutional rights of the people peaceably to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances was involved. On the subject of these petitions, it was not his desire at present to say one word; his wish was that the great question as to the right of the people of this Union to petition Congress might come up unembarrassed by the objections as to the language in which the petition was drawn. It seemed that these objections did not apply to the petition presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] and he wished the question to be taken on that petition. He concurred with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that there was no difference in substance between the last-named petition and those he (Mr. M.) had presented; that those who voted against receiving the one ought to vote against receiving the other. His wish was to disembarass this question of the right of petition of the difficulties as to the language of the petitions, and he would therefore ask leave of the Senate to withdraw the one he had presented.

Mr. CALHOUN said the petition could not be withdrawn, if the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The SECRETARY (who was referred to) replied that the yeas and nays had been called for, but had not been ordered by the Senate.

The CHAIR said that the Senator from Ohio could undoubtedly withdraw a petition presented by himself before any question had been taken on receiving it. The yeas and nays, he understood the Secretary to say, had not been ordered.

Mr. MORRIS then withdrew the petition; when,

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the Senate took up the petition presented by that gentleman from the Caln Quarterly Meeting of Friends, of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to abolish slavery within the District of Columbia, together with the motion of Mr. B. that the petition be rejected. The question pending was the one raised by Mr. CALHOUN—"Shall the petition be received?"

Mr. CALHOUN called for the reading of the petition, and it was read accordingly.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the language even of this petition was very strange. It held up the buying and selling of slaves in the Southern States to be as flagrant a wrong as the slave trade itself on the coast of Africa; declaring "that it was as inconsistent in principle, as inhuman in practice, as the foreign slave trade." The foreign slave trade, Mr. C. said, consisted in seizing on the Africans by violence, and selling them into slavery. Now, he was not willing to admit the parallel between slavery in the Southern States and this foreign slave trade. We ourselves, said he, have denounced this African slave trade, and made it piracy; though he did not himself believe that the offence could be properly designated as piracy, and ever should regret that this term had been applied to it in our laws. With regard to the petition, if he had no other objection to it than that of its using this language, he would not on that account receive it.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said the question was now upon the reception or rejection of the petition presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the society of Friends. Ever since he had known of this society he had considered them an orderly and peaceable people, and their petition was couched in respectful terms. He wished, as an individual and as a representative, to give all the individuals of the Union, of every class, a full enjoyment of the rights secured to them by the constitution. If we, said Mr. K., from the whim or excitement of the moment, refuse to receive these memorials, might they not abridge the right of petitioning? When the language was decent and respectful, it was the duty of every Senator to show it every mark of respect due to its character. And then, when it was received, if it was found to ask for an intermeddling with the constitutional rights of any of the States, to stamp it with the disapprobation it deserved.

The book of Mr. Channing to the contrary notwithstanding, he believed that nineteen twentieths of the people of the non-slaveholding States were as decidedly opposed to the agitation of this subject as those who were more immediately interested in the subject. If he doubted it he would have very different feelings from what he now entertained. He would then take a very different course in common with the people of the South to sustain their rights, and the matter would not be settled on this floor. He was happy, however, to say that he believed that day was far off. He believed those miserable fanatics would yet become enlightened, and the spell of their delusion would yet be dispelled. It might be philanthropy that actuated them, but if it was, it was philanthropy run mad. Anxious as he was that no excitement should grow out of this matter, his design was to give every individual his rights, he would vote for the reception of this petition. The magnanimous and patriotic stand taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] on this question, was worthy of himself and of the great State he represented, and was an earnest to him of the disposition of that and other Northern States to arrest the course of those deluded people in producing mischief here and elsewhere. After this petition was received, he was prepared to take the most efficient and energetic action to put a stop to this fanaticism.

Mr. CALHOUN had heard, with much regret, the argument of his friend from Alabama, [Mr. KING.] He understood the gentleman to put this question of receiving the petition on constitutional grounds. He asked the Senator if he was aware of the extent to which this doctrine would carry him. Was he prepared to receive petitions to abolish slavery in the navy yards and arsenals of the United States, in the Southern section of the Union? Was he prepared to receive petitions couched in abusive and indecorous language?

[Here Mr. KING said, No!]

The Senator answered no. Then I ask him, said Mr. C., to show the distinction between such petitions as he had described and the one before the Senate. If the right to have petitions received was constitutional, then there could be no qualification of that right. The Senator from Alabama, by saying no, surrendered the ground he had taken. Then, by what possibility, he asked him, was he prepared to receive petitions to abolish slavery in this District? If he was prepared to receive such petitions, what was to prevent him from receiving petitions to abolish slavery in every arsenal and navy yard in every State in the Union.

He confessed he was astonished at the gentleman's arguments. The right of petition was cautiously guarded in the constitution: "Congress shall make no law prohibiting the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances." By these plain terms it was expressly limited; and yet, when gentlemen came to the petitions of these fanatics, for abolishing slavery in this District, they were disposed to enlarge the construction. I know, said Mr. C., that the Senator from Alabama represents constituents more deeply interested in this question than mine. The Southwestern States were more deeply interested than the South Atlantic States, as the former had a growing slave population, continually augmenting by purchases from Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia; and he was, therefore, the more astonished at his argument.

Not to receive these petitions was considered wonderfully disrespectful to these petitioners; but to receive and reject them immediately was considered entirely respectful. What did gentlemen mean? He could not, for the life of him, make out why gentlemen were so anxious to receive these petitions, when they were determined to reject them.

Mr. MOORE did not rise to procrastinate this discussion. He desired more time for reflection before he recorded his views, particularly since his colleague had indicated the course he intended to pursue. He could not see the propriety of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in offering the petition he had presented, and forthwith moving to reject it. If I had a petition to present here, said Mr. M., the consideration that would induce me to move its rejection would induce me to withhold it.

Mr. M. then moved an adjournment, and
The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20.

During the transaction of the business of the morning,

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of such parts of the special message of the President of the United States as relate to the augmentation of the navy, and the subject of defences on our maritime frontier. He was not instructed to move the reference of these subjects to any other committee, as such motion did not seem to come within the duty of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The committee was accordingly discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, so much of the special message as relates to the augmentation of the navy was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and so much as relates to fortifications to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADMISSION ON THE FLOOR OF THE SENATE.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. KING, of Alabama, was taken up and considered:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted on the 7th ultimo, admitting certain public officers of the United States, and others, to the floor of the Senate, as spectators, be amended by inserting "the Solicitor of the Treasury."

Mr. LINN moved to amend the resolution by adding "the paymaster general, quartermaster general, commissary general, principal of the topographical bureau, principal geologist, principal of the engineer bureau."

Mr. CLAYTON moved also to add "the clerk and the reporter of the Supreme Court."

The amendments were agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The resolution submitted by Mr. BENTON, for appropriating the surplus revenue to purposes of national defence, was taken up as the order of the day; when

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that the remarks he should make on the question then pending would be very few in number, and very circumscribed in their extent. The message which had just been received from the Executive, containing such important matters for the consideration of that body, rendered it the less necessary for him to enlarge on the subject, even had it been his intention to do so. He should, therefore, occupy but little of the time of the Senate on the present occasion. As all discussions of this subject must, from its peculiar character, be of a delicate nature, it was proper for him to wish to avoid giving offence by any expressions which he might use in the heat of debate. He would, therefore, express it as his opinion that there breathed not one American who was desirous of a war with the French nation; that there breathed not one American who would not avert it if in his power; that there was not one who would not consider it an unnatural conflict between two nations bound to each other by the powerful ties of interest and feeling; and that there breathed not an American who would, even for the sake of peace, with all its blessings, be willing to sacrifice the honor of his country. With these qualifications, he begged that no construction of an offensive nature might be put on any phrases or expressions he might inconsiderately use in the hurry of debate. Let me, then, (said Mr. C.,) urge to those gentlemen who may be considered in opposition to the Government, but who, in reference to that body, solely, (the Senate,) were the Government itself, and regulated all its movements, that the part they had to act was an important one, and deeply concerned the honor and interests of their country. It was their duty to prevent any foreign nation from falling into the delusion that this might be a divided people; it was doubly their duty to do so, for they had taken it upon themselves to act as moderators in the controversy between their own Government and that of another country. If (said Mr. C.) they have thus taken it upon themselves to act as moderators, they ought to show to the foreign nation that they will preserve a proper portion of firmness with their mildness, and that, although they are anxious to conciliate, they will maintain, at all hazards, the honor and interest of their country. Was this observation a just one? It was. Did it carry its force to every American bosom? It did. And it was with this view of the subject that he should briefly occupy the attention of the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts, as chairman of the Committee on Finance, on the last day of the last session, reported a bill which had been returned with amendments to the other House; which had come back with an additional amendment to the Senate; and which amendment having been rejected, and the rejection adhered to, the bill was lost. It had been made a question on this very principle, that foreign Governments were not to be deluded with the idea of any division here, whether the course of the gentleman was a correct one. He thought it was not. He had always thought that, in the defeat of the bill commonly called the "fortification bill," the course of the gentleman on the last evening of the last session was, to say the least of it, indiscreet. The gentleman declared to the Senate, and to all the world, that it was not by his means that a bill so important to the nation, and in such a doubtful posture of our foreign relations, suffered a failure. He (Mr. C.) thought otherwise. The Senator had appealed to the lateness of the hour at which the bill was brought into the Senate. Was he not as much aware then that the session was approaching its close as he was now? If so, was the tone of his remarks such as was calculated to preserve the bill, and further its passage through both Houses at that late hour? Was his course the happiest that could have been taken to facilitate the legislation of Congress on matters of such various extent and interest as were embraced in the bill? If it was his object to have saved the bill, peculiarly important to the country at that crisis, what should have been his course with regard to a measure with which his committee was peculiarly concerned?

[Here Mr. WEBSTER explained. The gentleman, he said, was mistaken in every fact he had stated since he got up. He (Mr. W.) never reported the bill. He had no more to do with it than any other member of the Senate, till he moved to reject the amendment, and the Committee on Finance had no concern with the amendments, or the disagreement between the two Houses.]

Mr. C. continued. He accepted the correction of the gentleman. Voluntarily, then, the gentleman stepped forward; voluntarily did he make those forcible remarks which accompanied his motion to reject the amendment of the other House; and voluntarily did he cause the failure of this important bill, if he did so cause it. How do I (asked Mr. C.) establish these facts? If the gentleman had been desirous of saving this bill, or preventing the loss of so many and important necessary appropriations, and of avoiding the embarrassments which that loss has occasioned, what should have been his course? He would have admonished the Senate that the session was approaching its close, and he would have advised them to avoid all angry discussions and irritating topics, as calculated to cause the defeat of the bill. Was this true, or was it not? It was. This would have been the kind of admonition to the Senate, calculated to save the bill, and to promote objects so vitally important to the interests of the country. If there were vices in the form and manner of the bill which had been created in the representative branch of the national Legislature, which affected the gentleman's mind, what might have been expected of him if he was so desirous of facilitating the progress of the national business? That he would calmly and distinctly have pointed them out; have suggested the remedy, and aided by his influence and example in applying it, so that the bill might pass both Houses in time to become a law. Was this the course of the gentleman from Massachusetts? He thought not. He believed that there was not a member of the Senate who was not forcibly struck by the manner of the gentleman on that occasion—a manner so different from the grave and authoritative tone which usually distinguished him in that House. Abandoning the grave and authoritative manner in which he had been accustomed to address the Senate, he assumed a violence and ardor of expression new to him and to the Senate. Suddenly he gave way to an excited feeling, and seemed to be seized with suspicions of the deepest and darkest character. Nay, more. He seemed to speak as if he had taken his political opponents at an advantage, and was determined to use that advantage to the utmost. He relapsed into the habits in which his party had often indulged, of representing this people as suffering under the dominion of a terrible tyranny, which aimed at the destruction of their liberties. Then, what must have been the necessary consequence of the language accompanying such a motion as the gentleman had made? Why, to provoke debate; to make that debate an angry one; to render the contest doubtful, and endanger the passage of the bill.

Such was, and such ever must be, the consequence of a course of conduct like that pursued by the gentleman from Massachusetts. But it did not end here. The amendment made in the representative branch of our Legislature was rejected on the motion made by the gentleman—a motion made with a tone of indignant scorn which could hardly have a happy influence on the feelings of the members of the other House, including some of the gentleman's own political friends. The bill so returned to the other House; what followed? That body insisted on their amendment, and returned it to the Senate. Then was the time for the gentleman to have signalized his anxiety for the appropriation, by suggesting a mode of dispelling the difficulties which stood in the way, and of bringing the two Houses to an easy accommodation. The gentleman could have pointed out some conciliatory course of procedure, for saving a bill acknowledged by all to be so important and so necessary. What was his course? Did he recommend any mode, either formal or informal, to attain that desirable end? Did he ask the other House to go into a conference with a view to accommodate the difference between it and the Senate? No; he made that motion so harsh, so abrupt, and so uncompromising, that the Senate should adhere to its disagreement; and when he made that motion to adhere, he preserved the same tone of indignant scorn that had characterized his first motion to disagree to the amendment. Was he right there? Then, what was there in this appropriation of the House of Representatives which so deeply stirred up the ire of the gentleman? Those who heard him on that occasion, and who were not so well read in the constitution as he was, must believe that some express clause of that instrument had been deeply violated by the House. Was this the case? He had looked into the constitution for the purpose of finding some clause with which this appropriation might conflict, and which had been so deeply wounded; but he had looked in vain. He then supposed that the circumstance which had so deeply excited the gentleman's ire was, that the appropriation covered two distinct items of expenditure; one for the navy, and the other for the fortifications. Was it this, then, which had so greatly agitated the gentleman's love of liberty? Was it this which had created such an alarm in his breast as to induce him to believe that the constitution was endangered, and to move him from his balance and dignity? Ah! but the constitution must be saved, and the gentleman divides the appropriation, three hundred thousand for one, and five for the other, and the difficulty is surmounted. Here we have the arch-magician, who holds up the magic lamp, by whose light all darkness is dispelled, and we see the dangers that encompass us. Luckily, the magician has the talisman before whose touch all these dangers vanish.

The sagacity of the Senator had left him in no doubt as to where the battle on this question was to be fought. He alluded to his own warm expressions and his violent opposition to the appropriation, and declared that, although the foot of the foreign soldier was on our soil, though the cannon of the enemy was pointed at the Capitol, he would not make the appropriation while the danger to the constitution that he apprehended was in existence. What! because he cannot make a verbal amendment, he is willing, through the shrieks of dismay of affrighted virgins—through the burnings of our dwellings—through blood and devastation—that the enemy shall make his way to this Capitol. It appeared that, because the appropriation was not specific, because a long-established practice of the Government (and a very proper one it was) had not been followed on that occasion, the gentleman could suggest no mild and conciliatory way to restore the ancient practice, and save the bill from a failure. Now, if any thing coming from him could have any weight, he would venture to give some wholesome admonitions to those who were such ardent lovers of liberty as to reject an important appropriation because it was not to their view sufficiently specific. Did the gentleman believe that he would preserve liberty against the hard grasp of the Executive, by refusing to that Executive the means of defending his country? He would tell the gentleman to refer to that history with which he was so well acquainted, and he would find that, whenever a Government was so embarrassed by opposing checks that it wanted the power of defending its country from foreign aggression, the people would rally to its aid, and vest the Chief Magistrate with unbounded power. Was this proposition admitted by the gentleman? He presumed it was. Thus, then, the gentleman, in seeking to defend liberty, sacrifices liberty; thus, then, in indulging those fastidious scruples, he gives a blow to that liberty where it was the most dangerously to be assailed. This was so perfect a truism that he would not dwell on it for a moment.

The institution of Governments had generally been traced to the desire of preserving such domestic order in the conduct of individual citizens to each other as would best preserve the rights of the whole; but, truly speaking, Governments had more frequently arisen from the necessity of protecting the State against foreign aggression; for where would be the wisdom in providing for the liberty of the citizen until he was guarded against subjugation by a foreign enemy? The foreign enemy invading the country, his march traced by violation, murder, plunder, and conflagration, of what value was individual liberty, when it had not been protected against calamities like these? Thus the scruples of gentlemen might draw down upon their country a desolating and wide-spread calamity, in seeking to guard against dangers existing only in their own imaginations. Was he right or was he wrong? So firmly right, that he seemed to be trifling with the Senate in urging truths so obvious.

The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] whom he did not see in his seat, but who was probably in the chamber, pronounced the other day, in relation to this resolution, one of those speeches which always created a powerful effect. But never was there a more forcible example of how an imposing manner and fluency of language might cover the greatest absurdities—how the graces of elocution and the ornaments of style might accompany the weakest arguments, than in this instance. Had the gentleman, too, discovered a clause in the constitution which forbids the two Houses of Congress from making an appropriation without the recommendation of the President? Did he suppose that there, in that hall, where existed the censorship of the Government, (if he might use an expression of the gentleman's,) the safety of the country could not be provided for without executive recommendation? Here (said Mr. C.) is that censorship which is to stand between what is adverse and all that is valuable in our institutions, and guard them from danger. Here was the part of the Government that with reflection and contemplation provided the best means of securing all that was good, and guarding against all that was evil; and yet the Senator from South Carolina has discovered that those who constituted this censorship were not to be trusted. All at once we are (said Mr. C.) to be sunk into a state of apathy and stupor; to have eyes and not to see, to have ears and not to hear, and to have hearts and not to understand. Oh! happy condition of passive obedience to which they have arrived; and wonderful by whose means they had been brought to it. The gentleman reminded him (if he might indulge in a pleasantry in a grave debate) of a termagant wife, who, finding out a new way of provoking her husband, replied to him on all occasions, "whatever is your will is my pleasure."

Then, there was no clause in the constitution, as he had read it, declaring that the two Houses of Congress should have no opinions as to the foreign relations of the country; none declaring that when the enemy's fleet was on our coasts, and his army on our soil, or, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, when the Gaul was at the Capitol; there was no language in the constitution prohibiting Congress from providing the means of defence. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he understood him right, was for waiting for executive recommendation; that is, when his house was in flames, and his wife and children shrieking with dismay, he would not go to their rescue till his neighbor advised him to do so. The gentleman must go to the President and get his sanction, before he can provide against approaching danger.

There was but one point more that he wished to refer to. Being already exhausted with the slight effort he had made, affected peculiarly by disease, and lately disused to public speaking, he might not have made the most appropriate arrangement of the subjects he had touched on, and this might not therefore be brought out in its proper place. The Senator from South Carolina seemed to have a strong confidence, proceeding with him to certainty, that there was no possible danger of a war with France, unless it arose from our own conduct. What sort of evidence warranted the gentleman in making these predictions with such presumption? Has the course of the French (said Mr. C.) proceeded on such sure calculations that you cannot doubt, from what has passed, what will follow? Did any man suppose that the treaty of 1831 would not be carried into execution? There happened what had not been anticipated by any one. Was there any member of that body, was there any individual in the nation, who could have anticipated the strange condition that was attached to the fulfilment of the treaty by a member of the opposition in the French Chambers, and the sudden acceptance of that condition by the French ministers? What, then, warranted the prediction of the gentleman from South Carolina, that there would be no war with France unless caused by our Government? He denied that there was any certainty in calculating on the future course of France towards this country; he denied that the movements there depended on any course of conduct that might have been pursued at a former period. There was a mass of feeling, a chaos of discordant elements, in the French Chambers, which must produce results that no human foresight could calculate on. There was the republican party, ardently desiring for their country the enjoyment of those equal rights and free institutions which they saw producing such blessings on this side of the Atlantic; there were the imperialists, burning under a sense of defeat, and looking back to the glories and triumphs of the reign of the great Emperor; there were the Carlists, anxiously longing to exalt the white flag over the tri-color; and all these embarrassed in a greater or less degree the operations of the party in power.

There was another feature in the composition of the French Chambers worth attending to. They (the Chambers) refused to appropriate the money required to fulfil the stipulations of a solemn treaty entered into by their Government, without the compliance with an extraordinary condition, thereby manifesting a want of experience in the principles of government, that they may yet attain, but which they must attain as all other Governments have, after long and laborious application.

The gentleman from South Carolina referred to the friendly disposition of the King of France, Louis Philippe, towards this country. He tells us, said Mr. C., of the perfect good faith and sincerity with which the King and his ministers have entered into this treaty, of their anxiety to have its stipulations carried into effect, and of their exertions to get the necessary appropriation through the Legislative Chambers. But of what avail is the friendship of the King, without a corresponding disposition on the part of the legislative branch of his Government? We cannot rely on the good disposition of the French King, because he cannot control the various conflicting elements of which his own Government is composed.

In the entire want of the habit of public speaking, (Mr. C. said,) he had passed over one or two topics which could have been profitably referred to. He would, however, but briefly call the attention of the Senate to one fact, and then close his remarks. Was there a man there who did not understand one important principle in European politics, and one that had more than once been acted on by this very French nation? It was, that, in commencing a war, it was their policy to strike the first and most decisive blow, unexpected to their enemy, and without giving him time for preparation. While consuming time here (said Mr. C.) with unnecessary scruples, and combating dangers that exist only in the imagination, your commerce may be swept from the ocean, your gallant seamen may be dispersed, and your navy, which has added so much to the nation's glory, be left unmanned when called on for action. If it occur to France, said Mr. C., that there is to be some signal advantage in striking us some decisive blow, what was to prevent her seizing this advantage, if the arguments of gentlemen prevail? Come what might, he (Mr. C.) did not fear the result, though he was of opinion that both honor and policy demanded that every necessary preparation should be made. There was a zeal, an energy and promptitude, in this young and growing nation, equal to any emergency, and capable of encountering and overcoming the greatest of dangers. He relied with the utmost confidence on the spirit and gallantry of the American youth, who, without experience, but stimulated by love of country, and their country's honor, could rush unprepared into the greatest dangers, and by their chivalrous daring add new renown to their country's flag. It was with the deepest interest he had read the romantic story of the gallant and youthful Blakely, who, with a crew of youthful and inexperienced seamen, proceeded to the British Channel, there cut up the British commerce, and by his victorious conflicts with the enemy furnished the brightest pages of our naval history, and shed an imperishable lustre over his early grave.

When Mr. CUTHBERT had concluded,

Mr. HUBBARD addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: The Senator from Georgia, who has just resumed his seat, has undertaken to narrate the events of the last evening of the last session of Congress as they transpired in this hall with reference to the progress and fate of the "fortification bill." He has also undertaken to inform us of the temper and spirit which characterized the debate in this hall upon that bill. I was not then a member of the Senate, and from my own knowledge can neither affirm nor disavow the correctness of the statements made by the Senator from Georgia. I have no recollection that I visited this hall in the course of that evening. As to what took place upon the subject of the appropriation bills, from the time they were introduced here until the final action of the Senate upon them, I shall be guided by the journals of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and I hope to be able from the records to show that neither the House of Representatives, nor any committee of that body, deserve the rebuke, the censure, the blame, which has been imputed to them in the course of this debate. This is all I have to offer now, all that I have to state, before I proceed to present the precise question now submitted to the consideration of the Senate. What is that question? What are the resolutions offered by the Senator from Missouri? And what is the amendment proposed to those resolutions by the Senator from Maryland? They are as follows:

Resolved, That the surplus revenue of the United States, and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States, ought to be set apart and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the country.

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause the Senate to be informed of—

1st. The probable amount that would be necessary for fortifying the lake, maritime, and gulf frontier of the United States, and such points of the land frontier as may require permanent fortification.

2d. The probable amount that would be necessary to construct an adequate number of armories and arsenals in the United States, and to supply the States with field artillery, (especially brass field pieces,) for their militia, and with side-arms and pistols for their cavalry.

3d. The probable amount that would be necessary to supply the United States with the ordnance, arms, and munitions of war, which a proper regard to self-defence would require to be always on hand.

4th. The probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and to the welfare of the Union.

To the foregoing resolutions, proposed by the Senator from Missouri, the following amendment was offered by the Senator from Maryland:

To strike out all after the word "resolved," in the first line, and to insert: "That the general defence and permanent security of the country are principal objects of the national care, and therefore adequate and liberal specific appropriations from the public revenues ought regularly to be set apart and applied to these purposes."

I feel no particular solicitude whether the resolutions offered by the Senator from Missouri, or the substitute offered by the Senator from Maryland, be adopted. They both look to the same object. They both contemplate the same purpose—"the general defence—the permanent security of our whole country." In the event of this Senate agreeing to the resolutions or to the amendment, it can have no other effect than to pledge this body to give their support to such legislative measures, consequent upon the adoption of the resolutions or of the amendment, as shall have for their object the accomplishment of the great purpose in view, viz: the general defence and the permanent security of the country. Regarding the subject in this light, it is a matter of entire indifference to me whether the resolutions or the amendment be adopted. I should wish, in case the resolutions offered by the Senator from Missouri should be preferred, so to alter the terms of the first resolution as to require such a part only of the surplus revenue of the United States to be set apart for the objects in contemplation, as may be necessary, proper, and expedient. With such an alteration in the terms of the first resolution, I should not hesitate to give to them my hearty support; I should feel myself bound, by every consideration of public policy and of public duty, not only to vote for them, but to vote and to support any legislative measure necessary upon their adoption.

The resolutions following the first call merely for information—information which would be in any event desirable, if not indispensable, for the action of Congress upon this all-important subject of general defence and permanent security.

It was not my main purpose, in addressing the Senate at this time, to discuss at length the resolutions offered by the Senator from Missouri, or the amendment proposed to those resolutions by the Senator from Maryland. I had another object in view; but before I proceed to state that other object, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate in submitting some few general remarks upon the propriety, the policy, the urgent necessity, of adopting, in extenso, the resolutions of the Senator from Missouri, or the substitute offered by the Senator from Maryland. What, sir, is intended to be accomplished by the adoption literally of those resolutions? It is proposed, in substance, that as much of the surplus revenue of the United States as may be necessary shall be set apart and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the country. The amendment proposes to appropriate adequate and liberal sums for the accomplishment of the same objects. The first question which must present itself to the mind is, are appropriations at this time necessary for the general defence and permanent security of the country? On this point, I presume there can be no difference of opinion, here or elsewhere. The state and condition of our maritime and inland frontiers call upon us, as the representatives of the nation, loudly and imperatively, to provide efficiently, promptly, and without delay, for the general defence and the permanent security of the country. I well remember the untiring efforts of a distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, no longer a member of Congress, but who was then a member of the House of Representatives, and at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs, in the furtherance of these objects: He labored hard, he accomplished but little, and from that time to this the work has progressed slowly; it remains undone. Whether, Mr. President, we are to have war, or whether we are to enjoy a continuation of peace and prosperity, I would engage, forthwith, in putting our country, our whole country, in perfect defence; to place it in permanent security; every consideration of public policy demands it. It is the voice of wisdom, of experience—it is the lesson of history—that we should even in peace prepare for war. Who can bring to mind the disastrous, the disgraceful events of August, 1814, without feeling his pride as an American citizen humbled to the dust? Who can bring to mind that the very heart of our country was made accessible to the enemy; that, unobstructed and unopposed, he crossed our Hampton roads, passed up the Chesapeake and the Potomac, visited the city of Washington, laid waste our Capitol, and dined at our palace? Even at this late day, the rehearsal of that occurrence cannot fail to fill our hearts with chagrin and sorrow. It is past. But should we not take counsel from our experience? Ought we not to consider whether the “long sword of France” may not, in the same way, reach through the same city, in the event of a war with that nation? God forbid that we should ever be disgraced by the repetition of such a scene! That the fair page of American history should ever again be stained by such a record! I would then, Mr. President, with all possible despatch, make our maritime frontier impregnable to any and to every foreign enemy. I would, with all possible despatch, complete every fortification, man and arm every fortress connected with the public defence, for the permanent security of the country. I would, with all possible despatch, increase our navy, so that we could float into every sea and into every ocean a sufficient force for the protection of American commerce, and for the maintenance of American honor. I would do all this, sir, at every hazard, and under any circumstances. I would do it from the highest consideration of public policy. I would do all this from a solemn sense of public duty; a duty which we owe to ourselves as well as to posterity. I should not, therefore, be embarrassed as to the course which I should pursue, even if we had less available means than we have. But, fortunately, we shall not be called upon, in the execution of the great work of general defence, to resort to direct or to indirect taxation. We have an overflowing treasury; we possess an abundance of available means for the accomplishment of all the objects contemplated for the permanent security of the country. Then, sir, I would adopt the resolutions which have been offered; I would follow up those resolutions with such direct legislation as should effectuate, without delay, the objects contemplated.

I have said, Mr. President, that I would do this under any circumstances; so I would. But after the message of the President on the subject of our relations with France, which was communicated to this Senate very recently, (Monday,) I should consider further delay as fraught with imminent danger. I heard that communication with every feeling of pride and of patriotism. It was well worthy of its author and of the occasion, and I was surprised to hear that any Senator could have heard it with “profound regret.”

In pursuance, then, of the recommendation contained in that message, I would promptly put our whole country in a state of defence; the exigency of the times demands it; our relations with France demand it; a proper respect to ourselves demands it. I was utterly astonished to hear it asserted on this floor, that, under existing circumstances, to arm would be equivalent to a declaration of war. Can it be that to prepare for the controversy, if controversy must come, between us and our ancient ally, to put our beloved country in a state of safety, to arm our fortifications, to equip our public ships, would be regarded by her as the commencement of hostilities on our part?

Such may be the sentiments of some of the members of this Senate. They are not the sentiments of my mind, and I cannot yield my assent to them.

Whether war or peace is to be the fate of this land, my voice is, be ready—be prepared—be well prepared for any and for every possible exigency. What! shall we, the freest nation on the globe, unembarrassed with debt, rich in resources, powerful in means, shall we, for fear of giving offence to his Majesty, fold our arms, and submit to every exaction which he may see fit to impose? Shall we hesitate to prepare to assert our rights—to maintain our honor? Shall we stand still, let patience have her perfect work, and whenever it shall be the gracious pleasure of his Most Christian Majesty “Louis Philippe” to pay us the debt France so justly owes us, to receive it with a submissive thankfulness, to bring it home, and to distribute it among the claimants? God save us from such a scene of humiliation. I say, then, Mr. President, let us, regardless of consequences, fearlessly do our duty, and all will be well.

My main purpose in addressing the Senate at this time was to answer some remarks which fell from the Senator from Massachusetts in relation to the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress at the last session upon the appropriation bills. In the commencement of his remarks, the Senator passed a high encomium, well merited I presume, upon the industry and punctuality of the Senate at the last session; and I cannot suppose that the gentleman intended, in doing this, to make any insinuations or cast any reproach upon the industry and punctuality of the last House of Representatives; if he does, he certainly does that House great injustice. I was a member of that House, and by its presiding officer was placed on the Committee of Ways and Means, as well as upon the committee of conference, which has attracted so much notice, and called forth so much severity of remark, during the present discussion; and all I have to say in defence of the industry and punctuality of that body is, that the journals will show the mass of public and of private business which was originated in that body during the last session; the disposition which was made of it, the number of bills which passed that body and were sent to the Senate, in addition to their proceedings upon the bills which came from the Senate. A reference to the journals of the House will satisfy the public mind on this point. I will only add that, for habits of industry, for punctuality and promptness, sure I am that it cannot suffer when put in comparison with the Senate itself.

The Senator proceeds and notices what he regards as a somewhat unparliamentary proceeding, an unusual course at least, on the part of the House, in failing to give the Senate any information in reference to certain bills which had originated in the Senate, and which had passed that body, and been sent to the House for their concurrence. It so happened that I remained in this city nearly a week after the last session of Congress, and I then felt a deep mortification in reading from one of the newspapers of this city the following editorial article, under the date of the 5th of March. It contains the same sentiments which the Senator from Massachusetts has seen fit to present to the Senate in reference to this matter. I subjoin the extract.

“Last day of the session—Unfinished business—West Point Academy—Loss of the fortification bill.—The two Houses of Congress adjourned the night before last, their functions then ceasing: and what a wreck of public business ensued!

[SENATE.]

"In our two or three last papers we expressed our opinion respecting the state of the public business in the House of Representatives. It would have been as just had our intimation respected the state of the House.

"With a great deal of talent, and we have no doubt, too, a great deal of patriotism, the late House of Representatives had been brought into a condition, by various causes, in which it seemed incapable of getting on with the business of the country. Attentive observers had noticed a tendency of this kind from the early part of the session; but its last days forced the truth on the minds of all. Long debates; the endless perplexity of the rules; contests, every moment, about priority of business; and an eagerness of discussion, which seemed entirely to disregard the comparative importance of subjects, were among these causes. There were others, of which we could speak, of which indeed we shall feel it our duty to speak, and to speak freely, hereafter; but which we at present forbear to mention.

"The melancholy result of the whole is, that Congress has broken up, leaving almost every great measure of the session unfinished, and therefore totally null and void. The following bills, originating in the Senate, most of them passing that body by large majorities, and some of them quite unanimously, have shared the general wreck and ruin:

"The Post Office reform bill, (passed unanimously in the Senate;)

"The custom-house regulations bill, (passed nearly unanimously in the Senate;)

"The important Judiciary bill, (passed by a vote of 31 to 5 in the Senate;)

"The bill regulating the deposits of the public moneys in the deposit banks;

"The bill respecting the tenure of office and removals from office, (a most important bill, supported in the Senate by men of all parties;)

"The bill indemnifying claimants for French spoils before 1800.

"These half dozen; (not to speak of the bill for the relief of the cities of the District of Columbia; the bill providing for the increase of the corps of engineers; the bill to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Spain; and the bill to improve the navigation of the Mississippi in the vicinity of St. Louis,) are among the bills which were sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives, 'and never heard of more.'

"The fate of two of the appropriation bills, however, originating, as such bills always do, in the House of Representatives, is still more remarkable.

"Hitherto it has been usual to make the appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point in the same bill which contains the general appropriations for the army. This year an innovation was indulged. The army appropriation bill was sent to the Senate with no appropriation whatever for West Point. This circumstance was noticed at the time in the Senate, and its attention called to it as an extraordinary omission.

"A separate bill, however, containing the usual appropriations for the academy, was brought forward in the House, but suffered to sleep. Up to the last day for sending bills from one House to the other, it had not passed. The House took no step whatever to pass the bill, by suspending the operation of the rule, as to sending bills from House to House, or in any other way. In this predicament, individuals of the House brought the committee of the Senate to interfere; and, in some extraordinary way, help to pass the ordinary appropriation through Congress. The Senate, accordingly, attached the whole Military Academy appropriation bill to the bill making provision for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the year, and in this form it passed into a law; and but for the adoption of this mode, there could have been no appropriation at all, and the school would have been broken up. We may add that, when this bill for covering civil and diplomatic expenses went back to the House, with amendments, the occasion was eagerly seized to add to the Senate's amendment other amendments respecting totally different matters; thus giving the bill a tail as long as that of a comet.

"Thus the bill pending in the House making provision for the repairs of the Capitol and President's house, improving the public grounds, paying the President's gardener, &c., was tacked on the bill as being among the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government. This bill, however, and we rejoice at it, had the goodness to pass with all its length of tail; and, thanks to the Senate, and no thanks to the House of Representatives, the West Point Academy, therefore, was kept alive."

The gentleman expressed surprise that the House should not have given to the Senate information about the bills enumerated in the preceding extract. The reason is, that there had been no final action of the House upon these bills; they had been received from the Senate, it is true, but such was the mass of public as well as private business upon its own calendar, that it was next to an impossibility for the House to have acted upon these particular bills; they had come to the House at too late a period of the session for that branch to have definitively acted upon them. Most, if not all of them were not reported to the House until after the 10th of February; and the only bill of the number which was ever taken up and considered to any great extent was the one in relation to the General Post Office. Certain the fact is, that there was no final action upon them; they were neither rejected, laid upon the table, nor indefinitely postponed; and hence no information became necessary to be communicated to the Senate in relation to them. What possible benefit could result for the House to inform the Senate by message that they had received various bills, but had come to no decision upon them? Such a communication would seem to me to be in itself not only unparliamentary, but altogether unprofitable and unnecessary. Certain the fact is, that such has not been the usual practice of the two branches of the Government. I therefore say, sir, that the House is not obnoxious to any charge of neglect of duty on this account.

The Senator from Massachusetts has rebuked the House for its course of proceeding with reference to the general appropriation bill, and particularly with reference to its course upon the bill making appropriations for the support of the West Point Academy. The article which I have just presented to the Senate contains similar charges against the House, for the same pretended omissions of duty. How is this matter? Is it true that the last House of Representatives stands properly charged for any omissions of duty? What are the facts in relation to the appropriation bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government? It was a leading object with the Committee of Ways and Means, in reporting that bill, to introduce into it no appropriation, except it had the warrant of some existing law. It was distinctly remembered how, and for what reasons, the general appropriation bill for the first session of the last Congress was opposed. It was kept in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for more than a month, it was most violently attacked, and most resolutely and perseveringly opposed. The Committee of Ways and Means of the last session intended to prevent, if possible, the recurrence of any such scene. The bill was reported, speedily acted on in the House, and on the 2d day of February it was sent to the Senate for their concurrence, and on the 2d day of March it passed the Senate with a little less than half a hundred amendments. In this form that bill for the support of the Government came from the Senate to the House of Representatives. Among the amendments agreed to by the Senate was a Senate bill "confirming claims to lands in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes." A Senate bill "for completing the road from Line creek to the Chattahoochee, and for the erection of bridges on the same." A Senate bill "for granting six hundred and fifty thousand acres of land, in addition to former appropriations, for the satisfaction of revolutionary bounty land warrants;" together with various other amendments of less importance, but containing entirely new appropriations, foreign from the title as well as the intent and purport of the bill. When it passed the House, its title was "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1835." And after it had been amended in the way and in the manner it was; after the Senate had attached to it bills entirely incongruous, originating in their body; after incorporating in the bill appropriations having not the remotest connexion with the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, it did, indeed, become necessary to change its title, but the alteration of the title, be it remembered, was the act of the Senate; and when it reappeared in the House of Representatives its title was "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for 1835, and for other purposes."

I will not undertake to say what could have induced the Senate, twenty-four hours before the close of the session, to send to the House the general appropriation bill, amended by adding to it bills which had originated in the Senate, and which had not received the consideration of the House. How it happened I know not; it certainly must be regarded as a proceeding somewhat extraordinary. But, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts has further rebuked the House of Representatives for not having incorporated in the army bill the appropriations necessary for the support of the West Point Academy. And, sir, it would occur to any man who should read this part of the speech of the Senator, or should read the article which I have read to the Senate, that there had been a most palpable omission of duty on the part of the House with reference to the appropriations for the West Point Academy. This imputation, cast upon the House of Representatives, is unmerited. What are the facts connected with that matter? The West Point Academy bill was reported with the other appropriation bills; it was confided to the care of one of its warmest friends on the Committee of Ways and Means, without objection, and without opposition on the part of the committee. Whatever may have been the opinions of individual members of that committee upon the propriety of continuing that institution, certain the fact is, that a bill for its support was seasonably reported, and committed to the charge of Mr. BIXNEY. I have no doubt that gentleman managed the bill with his usual ability and foresight. He saw, beyond doubt, that there would be no opposition to it if it was attached by way of amendment to some one of the appropriation bills then pending in the Senate. He undoubtedly supposed that such a course was the safest and the most advisable course for him to take. He took it. But the House is charged with suffering this bill to sleep; and that the West Point Academy was saved by act of the Senate, and that no thanks are due to the House, but to the Senate, for keeping this institution alive. This is most unjust and most unmerited. There is not to be found a vote upon the journals of the House going to show any decided opposition to the measure. This amendment of the Senate to the general appropriation bill was readily agreed to by the Committee of Ways and Means, and as readily adopted by the House of Representatives. So much for this matter.

The Senator from Massachusetts has concluded his remarks upon this bill by adverting to an amendment which the House made to one of the numerous amendments of the Senate. He has amused us by giving an account of the incongruity of that amendment with the title and design of the bill. The House, it is true, did amend the amendments of the Senate by adding "a bill making appropriations for the public buildings and grounds, and for other purposes;" and it was upon some of the items of this bill that the Senator saw fit to display his pleasantry and wit. I would ask, sir, if there were any thing out of the way, more strange, in providing "for the salary of the gardener employed in superintending the Capitol square and other public grounds," than in providing for the balance of the salary of Valentine Giesey, late superintendent of the Cumberland road; any thing more extraordinary for improving Lafayette square, than in compensating Lemuel Slater for his services. None, unless it be in the quarter from whence those amendments proceeded. The first and third were included in the amendments proposed by the House. The second and last were amendments proposed by the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts next proceeds to give us what he calls a narrative of the proceedings of the two Houses upon the fortification bill; and it was the fate of that bill which has elicited this debate. The recollection of the Senator and my own do not in all particulars agree. After having read the Senator's speech, I felt myself called upon, from the circumstances to which I have already referred, that of being a member of the last House of Representatives, of the Committee of Ways and Means, and also of the committee of conference, to give my account of the rise, progress, and final loss, of that bill.

The fortification bill was reported to the House, from the Committee of Ways and Means, on the 2d January, 1835; it passed that body on the 20th of January; it was on the same day received by the Senate, and on the 24th day of February, thirty-five days after it was first received by the Senate, it passed that body with amendments. The Senator says, and says truly, that it was sent back to the House on Tuesday, the 24th day of February, a week before the adjournment of Congress, and asks how it happened that this bill remained from the 24th of February until the evening of the last day of the session. Sir, I can only answer this inquiry by referring to the journals. Within this period of time the House was called on to consider the amendments which the Senate had made to the general appropriation bill; the amendments which they had made to the bill making appropriations for building lightboats, beacons, &c.; the amendments which the Senate had made to the bill making appropriations for Indian annuities, &c.; with a mass of other public as well as private business, together with the absorbing questions connected with the resolutions which had been reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations upon the subject of our affairs with France. There was no delay which could be avoided; and if, by unavoidable occurrence, the action of the House on this bill was delayed until the very last day of the session, the greater the necessity for a conciliatory and an accommodating spirit, the greater the necessity for not being over nice and scrupulous touching the forms of proceeding. It is true that not until the last day of the session did the House come to any agreement upon the amendments proposed by the Senate to the fortification bill.

Since I came to the Senate this morning I have procured from the files of the Senate the original bill with the amendments reported from the Committee on Finance. The first amendment recommended was to increase the appropriation for rebuilding Fort Delaware,

JAN. 20, 1836.]

National Defence.

[SENATE.]

from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The second amendment proposed was for the armament of fortifications, one hundred thousand dollars. The third amendment made was upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri, for an appropriation for the repair of Fort Mifflin. The fourth, fifth, and sixth amendments were reported from the Committee on Finance, and were as follows:

"That the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards the repair of the fortifications on Castle island, in the harbor of Boston, according to the plan submitted by the board of engineers on the thirteenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, the same to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

"That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be applied or expended, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in improving the defences within the State of Maryland."

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase six acres of land adjoining Fort McHenry, near Baltimore, being the same rented from the heir of the late Philip Swartzance."

When the House of Representatives first acted on these amendments proposed by the Senate, they agreed to the second, third, and sixth amendments; and ultimately agreed to the first and to the fifth, with an amendment, leaving only the fourth amendment, which had also been agreed to in the first instance by the House, with an amendment embraced in the following section, which the House proposed to add:

"That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy: Provided, Such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

It follows, then, from all this, that the House felt an anxious solicitude for the passage of this bill; that, so far from opposing its passage, they assented to the various amendments of the Senate; and it is matter of history in relation to the proceedings of the two Houses upon this very bill, that the House had yielded the objections which it at first entertained as to the propriety of the very appropriations embraced in the amendments, and ultimately agreed to pass each of those with one amendment.

It will appear, distinctly appear, by a reference to the House journals, that while the fortification bill was under consideration, Mr. Everett, of Massachusetts, moved the following amendment:

"For the preservation of Castle island, and for repairing the fortifications on Castle island, in Boston harbor, &c., seventy-five thousand dollars."

That Mr. McKim moved to amend the bill by adding, "For repairing Fort McHenry, at Baltimore, and for putting the same in a proper state of defence, fifty thousand dollars."

Both of the propositions were rejected on a vote by yeas and nays in the House; the first by a majority of thirty-three: Yeas 87, nays 120; the second by a majority of sixty-three: Yeas 66, nays 129; and yet, after the Committee on Finance had kept in their possession this very bill thirty-five days, they reported it to the Senate with amendments; and two of the amendments proposed were, in truth, the amendments which had been rejected by the House. Yet, sir, the House gave up their objections to these very items, so anxious were they to secure the passage of the fortification bill. They not only agreed to the other amendments, but they reversed their former decision, and agreed to one and all the amendments proposed by the Senate, with an additional section, proposing an appropriation of three millions of dollars for the defence and permanent security of the country. Is there a man within our republic who does not regret, most deeply regret, the loss of the fortification bill of the last session? Is there a man in office or out office, on the seaboard or in the interior, who does not now regret, most deeply regret, that the appropriation proposed by the House at the last session, "for fortifications, for ordnance, and for increase of the navy," did not become a law? I will not believe, I cannot believe, that there is an individual between Maine and Florida, between the lakes and the ocean, who does not, in truth and in soberness, regret it.

The House, in perfect good faith, and under a deep conviction that the state of the country required that a large amount should be appropriated for the purpose of general defence, proposed this appropriation as an amendment to the Senate's amendment. At that late period of the session it could not have accomplished this object in any other way; it was not for the reason that the House objected to the fourth amendment of the Senate, but it was merely and solely for the purpose of obtaining a large appropriation for the objects specified in the amendment, which induced the action of the House—an appropriation which not only the defenceless state of our whole maritime and inland frontiers demanded, but which the peculiar exigency of the times, the state and posture of our affairs with France, called loudly and pressingly on Congress to make.

How was this feeling met? How was this proposition treated by the Senate? There could be no misapprehension—no mistake about the object; and yet, no sooner was the communication made, no sooner was the amendment read at the table of the Secretary, than the Senator from Massachusetts moved to disagree to the amendment. The motion was carried. The House were informed of this proceeding of the Senate. A motion was then made for the House to recede from their amendment. That motion was negatived by a decided majority. Information was at once communicated to the Senate; and, without any intervening motion, the Senator from Massachusetts moved that the Senate adhere to their vote of disagreement. This proceeding on the part of the Senate has been justly commented upon by the Senator from Georgia.

It is unnecessary for me to add to his remarks. Certainly it was, considering the lateless of the hour, a most embarrassing, a truly unfortunate motion. On this information being communicated to the House, a motion was again made that the House do recede; it was attended with the same result. Anxious to save the bill, if possible, a motion was made that the House do insist on their amendment. A conference was asked; it was voted; and conferees were appointed. The Senator from Virginia has stated that when the conferees on the part of the Senate left the hall of the Senate, it lacked fifteen minutes or twenty minutes of eleven o'clock; and when the conferees returned, it was about the same number of minutes after the hour of eleven. If, sir, the Senator from Virginia be correct in point of time, there must have been a great difference between the time of the House and the time of the Senate. It is utterly impossible for me to account for this difference. If the gentleman had, in the course of the evening, regulated his own watch by the uncertain dial over his head, there would be no difficulty in accounting for the great difference between the time as indicated by the watch of the Senator from Virginia, and the time as indicated by the watches of other gentlemen. The Senator from Massachusetts, who was the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate, remarked that he had no particular recollection of the exact time, having taken no note of it. Sir, am I entirely mistaken as to the occurrences which took place in the committee after the committees of conference had assembled? I must be, or else the Senator is entirely mistaken. While the committee were together, and trying to agree upon a report, the Senator from Massachusetts drew from his pocket his own watch, if I do not altogether misrecollect, and reminded us that it lacked but a few minutes of twelve, and that we had but a few minutes to spare. He did this, as I then supposed, and as I now believe, to induce a speedy action of the committee upon the subject which had been referred to them. The committees did agree upon a report. Mr. Cambreleng dissented. Mr. Lewis and myself, constituting a majority of the committee on the part of the House, did agree to the report. I have no doubt but that the Senator from Virginia is correct in the statement that the committee of conference must have been absent at least one half hour; this fact is inferrible from his account of the time. But, sir, it cannot be correct, in my opinion, that the committee could have have reappeared in the Senate until past the hour of twelve o'clock. I am not without some record to confirm me in this statement—a record made by one of the reporters of the House, and published in one of the journals of this city, after the adjournment. I subjoin the following extract from the National Intelligencer:

The amendment made to the fortification bill was then under discussion. The House had been informed of the vote of the Senate to adhere, and after some debate, according to the Intelligencer, and in perfect accordance with my own recollection, the following is the order of the subsequent proceedings:

"Mr. HUBBARD said, if the House adhered, the bill would be lost. He moved that the House appoint a committee of conference.

"Mr. LEWIS said it was not the amount of the appropriation, but the principle, which was objected to by the Senate. A committee of conference might, therefore, adjust the disagreement. The manner of the appropriation was too loose. It was not specific. It put every thing into the hands of the Executive. He asked what would be the effect of the previous question.

"The CHAIR replied, only to preclude debate.

"The motion for the previous question was withdrawn. The motion to ask a conference was agreed to; and Messrs. CAMBRELENG and LEWIS were appointed the committee of conference on the part of the House.

"Mr. HARDIN asked if the House was not virtually dissolved by the expiration of the term for which this Congress was elected.

"The CHAIR said it was not a question of order, and the Chair could not decide it.

"The Cumberland road bill was taken up and read a third time.

"Mr. McKAY moved that a message be sent to the other House, informing them that this House, having completed its business, is ready to adjourn.

"The CHAIR said the motion was not in order, the question being on the passage of the bill.

"The Clerk proceeded to take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill to continue and repair the Cumberland road, and

"Mr. GILMER, when his name was called, rose and said he considered that he had no right to vote, the term for which he was elected having expired at twelve o'clock this night; and he therefore declined voting."

It will appear that Mr. Cambreleng and myself both voted against the passage of the Cumberland road bill, and before the committee of conference was organized.

There can be no mistake in this matter. The order of proceeding published in the Intelligencer, as noted by the reporter, is, beyond all question, correct; and it distinctly appears, from the journals of the House, that the committee of conference was appointed immediately before the vote of the House upon the "Cumberland road bill," and there can be no doubt that, while the yeas and nays were taking on the motion to pass that bill, Mr. Gilmer, of Georgia, objected, when his name was called, to voting, for the avowed reason that the hour of twelve had arrived, and that the functions of the House had terminated. He did not vote, and one, if not more, of his colleagues, entertaining the same views, did not vote on the passage of that bill. It even appears, from the publication in the Intelligencer—an authority which neither the Senator from Virginia nor the Senator from Massachusetts will, I presume, question—that, before the consideration of that bill was moved, Mr. Hardin, of Kentucky, made a question whether the House could constitutionally proceed in the transaction of business, as the hour of twelve o'clock had arrived. From all this, I submit whether the Senator from Virginia could be correct as to the precise time when the committees entered upon the discharge of their respective duties, and when they returned to their respective Houses.

It is important, in my view, and will be regarded as important by others, to fix, with as great a degree of certainty as possible, the time when the report of the conferees was agreed on, and when it could have been presented to the two Houses; for if it was past twelve o'clock, the House could not, consistently with their duty, have received it. After that hour, they no longer existed as a legislative body.

This was an opinion conscientiously entertained by many members of that House. If the time of the House was necessarily consumed, if a delay was occasioned by any extraordinary vote or proceeding on the part of the Senate in relation to this bill, ought its ultimate loss to be imputed to the House of Representatives? Ought they to be made answerable for its failure? I think not. When Mr. Cambreleng appeared in the House with his report, the yeas and nays were then calling on a motion, I believe, of Mr. Mason, of Virginia, to allow Robert P. Letcher his pay as a member of the House at the last session. He was in time to answer to the call of his name; but, from the result of that vote, it appeared that no quorum was in attendance; and from that time until the last moment of the session no quorum of the House could be procured, for the reason that it was believed that the House had no authority to act. Hence the bill, with all its amendments, was lost. And having faithfully given a narrative of the occurrences as they took place, I leave to the nation, to the American people, to decide whether the loss can with justice or with propriety be imputed to the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the House, or to the members of that committee, or to the House itself. It will be recollected that this last amendment to the fortification bill, and which was attended with such fatal consequences to that bill, was proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was supported on the ground that the peculiar state of our affairs with France rendered it proper and expedient.

The amendment was not regarded by its friends in the House as unreasonable, on the ground of the amount of the appropriation. It was believed to be no more than would be necessary, in a certain event, for the objects specified in the amendment. Nor was it regarded as objectionable in its terms or extraordinary in its character, nor was the proposition regarded as invading any principle of the constitution.

And why was this amendment opposed in the Senate?

for had it not have been for the opposition from that quarter, the amendment would have been incorporated in the bill, and the bill would have been passed; and at this period of time our fortifications would at least have been well supplied with ordnance; our ships would have been put in readiness for actual and active service; and we should have been prepared for action, if action should have become necessary.

I again ask, on what ground was this amendment resisted in the Senate?

The Senator from Massachusetts, in his argument, stated two grounds of objection to the amendment of the House, appropriating three millions of dollars for the objects stated in the amendment. The first ground was, "That no such appropriation had been recommended by the President or by any of the Departments." And it could not have been known that the appropriation was in accordance with the views of the Executive. The duty devolving on the President, in relation to this subject, the Senator states, is plainly and explicitly set forth in the following clause of the constitution: "He shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." And this appropriation was opposed, this amendment was objected to, in the absence of such a recommendation.

It was said by the Senator from Tennessee, "it is not asked for by those who best knew what the public service required; how, then, are we to presume that it is needed?" Let us examine this matter, and see whether the objection be well taken. At the commencement of the last session of Congress, it is to be presumed that the President of the United States communicated all the information touching the state of the Union which it was in his power to communicate. That message not only contained a full account of our foreign relations, but also of our domestic concerns. Every piece of information connected with, or having relation to, the state of the Union, was communicated to both Houses of Congress at the same time; and, in the same communication, he recommended for adoption such measures as he deemed necessary and expedient. In that message he very fully and explicitly made known to Congress the precise and exact state of our relations with France. Among other things, he communicated as his "conviction that the United States ought to insist on a prompt execution of the treaty;" and after having expressed his own views fully and explicitly upon the subject of our relations with France, he remarked that, "having submitted these considerations, it belongs to Congress to decide whether, after what has taken place, it will still await the further action of the French Chambers, or now adopt such provisional measures as it may deem necessary, and best adapted to protect the rights and maintain the honor of the country. Whatever that decision may be, it will be faithfully enforced by the Executive, as far as he is authorized so to do." And it further appears that, on the twenty-sixth of February, 1835, within less than one week before the necessary termination of the session, the President communicated to both Houses of Congress the following message:

"I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of all the letters received from Mr. Livingston since the message to the House of Representatives of the 6th instant, of the instructions given to that minister, and of all the late correspondence with the French Government, in Paris or in Washington, except a note of Mr. Serurier, which, for the reasons in the report, is not now communicated.

"It will be seen that I have deemed it my duty to instruct Mr. Livingston to quit France with his legation, and return to the United States, if an appropriation for the fulfilment of the convention shall be refused by the Chambers.

"The subject being now, in all its present aspects, before Congress, whose right it is to decide what measures are to be pursued on that event, I deem it unnecessary to make further recommendation, being confident that, on their part, every thing will be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country which the occasion requires.

"ANDREW JACKSON.

"WASHINGTON, February 25, 1835."

The object of this communication cannot be misunderstood—there can be no mistake about the matter. It was to put the two Houses of Congress in possession of all the information in possession of the Executive upon the subject of our relations with France, which had come to his knowledge after his message at the opening of the session; and this information was communicated at the latest possible period, to enable Congress to act upon the subject, if they deemed any action expedient and necessary; expressing, in the conclusion of his message, his entire confidence in Congress, and that, on their part, every thing would be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country which the occasion required. There was a peculiar propriety in making this communication at the time it was made—it had become necessary; it was near the close of the session; it was, in all probability, the last communication which the President would be able to make to that body upon that absorbing subject. The Senate had, also, more than one month before this communication was made, upon the report of their Committee on Foreign Relations, unanimously come to the resolution "that it is inexpedient at present to adopt any legislative measure in regard to the state of affairs between the United States and France."

The House of Representatives had the subject before them at the time this last message was communicated; and on the very day next following the receipt of this message the Committee of the House on Foreign Relations reported the following resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That it would be incompatible with the rights and honor of the United States further to negotiate in relation to the treaty entered into by France on the 4th of July, 1831, and that this House will insist upon its execution, as ratified by both Governments.

"2. Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to commercial restrictions, or to reprisals on the commerce of France.

"Resolved, That contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France."

And, at a subsequent day, as late as the second of March, the House finally came unanimously to the resolution "that the treaty with France of the fourth of July, 1831, ought to be maintained, and its execution insisted on"—yielding the last resolution which the committee had reported on the twenty-seventh day of February, for the reason, as expressly stated by the chairman of that committee, to produce a unanimity in the vote of the House upon the adoption of the first resolution; at the same time communicating that he should offer an amendment to the fortification bill, then pending in the House, appropriating, conditionally, three millions for the purpose of national defence. These proceedings on the part of the House had become matter of history; they were published in the papers of this city; and they must have been known to the members of the Senate. The amendment then proposed by Mr. Cambreleng, as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to the fortification bill, which is now the subject of debate, was what that committee deemed and the House considered expedient and necessary to do upon the subject of our affairs with France. The question was then pending in the Chamber of Deputies; whether they would or would not pass the bill of indemnity was unknown; whether they would pass it untrammelled with conditions was alike unknown. This amendment, then proposed, comprehended all that the House regarded as necessary to be done under all existing circumstances. It was the action of that body. It was agreed to by a very decided majority of that body. Among the yeas are included the names of some of the most distinguished members of that House, who were opposed to the administration. That this amendment was offered, not to defeat the fortification bill, but to carry out the message of the President of the 26th of February; that it was offered as a precautionary measure, considering the attitude and the position of our affairs with France, no person conversant with the facts can for one moment doubt.

The gentleman from Massachusetts remarked "that the proposed grant was defended, so far as it was defended at all, upon an alleged necessity growing out of our foreign relations." The terms of the grant, of the amendment itself, leave not a shadow of doubt upon the mind how it happened to be offered; and the history of the proceedings shows clearly and explicitly why it was proposed at the time as an amendment to the fortification bill. If, then, I am correct, the President had communicated, not to one House, but to both Houses, the very information which he was required to communicate under the clause of the constitution to which the gentleman has referred.

He not only had at the opening of the session sent in his message, giving full information of the state of the Union, but as late as the 26th of February he communicated, by special message, the then state and condition of our relations with France: that the Chambers had not then passed the indemnity bill, and the instructions which he had given to our minister at that court. He had done all that could by any possibility be required of him to do. By the message he left it for Congress to decide upon the measures to be adopted. All that the constitution required of the President, all that a patriotic regard to the state of the country required of him, had been done; all that the peculiar and embarrassing attitude of our affairs with France had suggested was faithfully communicated to both Houses of Congress; and it was this message, it was the exposed and defenceless state of our country, it was the necessity growing out of our relations with France, that induced the House to propose and adopt the amendment. It was all this which made the amendment necessary, expedient, and proper.

How, then, could the honorable Senator from Massachusetts urge as an objection, that Congress were in the dark—that no information had been communicated from the Executive—that we had no executive recommendation—whether the measure was or was not required—whether it was or was not necessary and proper. Sir, can the gentleman show to this Senate that it has ever been the practice of the Executive to do more than what was done by him in relation to this subject? Would the gentleman have had the Executive call in direct terms for an appropriation of three millions of dollars, the expenditure of which to be committed to his discretion? I presume not. Would he have had the Executive, after having communicated, through his Departments, the precise condition of our navy, the state of our fortifications, the amount of our ordnance, and every information necessary for the action of Congress, gone further, and, in this message, have stated that the further sum of three millions of dollars is now required to arm our fortifications, and to have in readiness such a naval force as the exigency of the times demand? I trust not. The President had properly submitted the whole matter to Congress, leaving it with them to do whatever they should deem necessary, expedient, and proper to do. He had stated, in his message at the opening of Congress, what particular measures he considered advisable. In his last message he left, where it should have been left, the whole matter with the Congress of the United States; and yet we are told that we have had no executive communication upon this subject, and on this ground the appropriation was opposed—on this ground it was successfully resisted by the Senate. The position of the gentleman, that this appropriation was opposed on the ground that it did not come recommended by executive authority, strikes me to be wholly untenable; it proves too much. The appropriation was three millions of dollars, for fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy—opposed, and successfully opposed, says the gentleman, for the reason that it was without executive recommendation. Well, sir, was there any executive recommendation for the substitute reported by the committee of conference? The gentleman certainly assented to that report; he was himself the chairman of that committee. I am unable to see any real difference between the amendment of the House to the fortification bill and the report of the committee of conference, except in the amount, and except, also, that the expenditure of the three millions, in whole or in part, was left to the discretion of the President. The sum recommended by the committee of conference was an absolute and unconditional appropriation. But it is proper here to remark that the expenditure of the three millions, in whole or in part, left to the discretion of the President, was not particularly excepted to by the gentleman from Massachusetts. If, then, the great objection really was, that the appropriation of three millions had not the sanction of executive authority, that it was not recommended by the President or by either of the Departments, does not the same objection apply with equal force to the report of committee of conference? Where was the authority for reporting, as an additional appropriation for arming the fortifications of the United States, three hundred thousand dollars? We had passed the fortification bill, we had introduced into that bill all the appropriations which were recommended to us, and which we considered necessary and expedient. And how, then, did it happen that a further sum of three hundred thousand dollars was proposed? Nor in pursuance of any executive recommendation, says the Senator, but solely in pursuance of the recommendation of the committee of conference. The same committee proposed, as an additional appropriation for the repair and equipment of the ships of the United States, five hundred thousand dollars: we had passed the usual bill for the naval service, and no such appropriation was then believed necessary or proper. How did it happen that this large appropriation was recommended at that particular time? Not in pursuance of any executive recommendation, the gentleman from Massachusetts contends. How, then? Something must have occurred within the short period which had elapsed between the passage of the bill for the naval service and the time when this large additional appropriation was recommended and proposed. I say, then, sir, there is no more, but just as much authority for the amendment to the fortification bill, as proposed by the House, as there was for the eight hundred thousand dollars proposed as a substitute by the committee of conference; there was an influence, there was a reason, there was a consideration, for the action of the House; the same influence, the same reason, the same consideration, must have operated upon the committee; and what was it, sir? What induced the House to propose an appropriation of three millions of dollars at the time it did? What induced the committee of conference to strike out the three millions of dollars, and to substitute eight hundred thousand? for this is all the real essential difference between the action of the House and the action of the committee. I ask, what had occurred to induce this action of the House and this action of the committee?

National Defence.

The answer is at hand; it was the message of the President of the 26th of February, 1835, giving information of the posture of our affairs with France; of the determination of the Executive, in the event that the Chamber of Deputies should neglect to pass the bill of indemnity. Disguise it as you may, it was the then existing relations between the United States and France which called for this large appropriation. It was our defenceless maritime frontier, it was the unarmed state of our fortifications, it was our unpreparedness to meet a possible contingency, which induced the House of Representatives, upon the communication of that message, in the exercise of its proper discretion, to propose an appropriation of three millions of dollars, to be expended in a certain way, if the expenditure should, in the discretion of the President, become necessary. It was the same consideration which induced the committee of conference to substitute the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars in lieu of the three millions. Then, Mr. President, I cannot fail to come to the conclusion that the first ground of objection made by the Senator from Massachusetts was not well taken. That the facts showed clearly that we were not only not without executive recommendation in this matter, but that it was the Executive's communication which produced the action of the House, and I presume also the action of the committee of conference.

The appropriation embraced in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the fortification bill, which was rejected by the Senate, was a contingent appropriation—its expenditure confided to executive discretion—and I am unable to conceive what more could have been done by the Executive, with reference to this subject, than was done. From my examination, I have not been able to find a precedent where the Executive has done more than was done on this occasion. He brought the subject-matter to the consideration of Congress. He confided in their discretion. He left it for Congress to do whatever they might think proper to do. He called for no definite, no precise appropriation. He asked for no distinct action on the part of Congress. Such a course would, in my view, have been wrong. He committed wisely, judiciously—properly committed—the whole matter to Congress, relying that every measure would be adopted which the honor, the safety, the interest of the country demanded.

At this point, Mr. CLAY moved that the Senate adjourn: Ayes 15, noes 22.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to lay the subject on the table, for the purpose of going into executive business. The motion was out of order, as Mr. HUBBARD had the floor. On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the resolutions were then laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. When the doors were opened,

The Senate adjourned.

[The subject coming up again the next day, Mr. H. resumed and concluded his speech as given below.]

When the Senate adjourned last evening, I had submitted all the remarks which I had intended to have submitted in relation to the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress at the last session upon the appropriation bills, and particularly upon the fortification bill, as it has been familiarly called in the course of this debate. I had endeavored to answer the first ground of objection taken by the Senator from Massachusetts in his opposition to the amendment of the House to that bill. I can assure the Senate that, in doing what I have done, in doing what I have to do, I have felt impelled by a sense of duty which I owed to my constituents, to myself, as well as to the last House of Representatives, of which I was a member. Whether I have been able to set history right touching the proceedings of the two Houses of the late Congress on the last evening of the session I leave for others to decide. It has been my purpose faithfully to state the facts, in the order in which they transpired. It cannot be denied that the fortification bill was lost. It had passed the House of Representatives; it had passed the Senate, with amendments; those amendments were principally concurred in; one was agreed to, with an amendment; and the consequent action of the two Houses, upon the subject of this last amendment proposed by the House of Representatives, terminated in the sacrifice of the bill itself. It is but an act of justice to the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the House, to say that, so late was the hour of the night, so determined was a portion of the House that the constitutional power of that body had ceased long before the chairman came in with his report, that it was in my opinion utterly out of his power, and out of the power of any other person, to have induced any action of the House upon the subject of that report, for this plain reason, that a large and respectable number of that House conscientiously believed (if their declarations be credited) that they had no right under the constitution to act upon any subject of legislation; they believed that their functions had ceased. This was, sir, the sentiment, as I remarked yesterday, of Mr. Gilmer, of Georgia, and also of one or more of his colleagues. This opinion, whether right or wrong, influenced the course of many members of that House. The gentleman from Georgia to whom I have referred, stated in his place, before even the committee of conference was organized, that the hour of twelve had arrived. Before that committee could have even agreed upon any report, Mr. Jarvis, of Maine, offered a resolution, "That, the hour having arrived when the term for which this House was elected has expired, we do now adjourn." I say, then, sir, in justice to the chairman of the committee, that there was no quorum of the House in attendance, which fact was ascertained by taking the yeas and nays as well as by tellers, after he came into the House with the report of the committee of conference. And, Mr. President, after the message of the Senate was communicated to the House,

"Mr. Cambreleng, the chairman of the conferees on the part of this House, then rose and stated that he declined to make a report of the proceedings of the committee of conference aforesaid, on the ground that, from the vote on the resolution granting compensation to Robert P. Letcher, which vote was decided at the time the committee returned into the House from the conference, it was ascertained that a quorum was not present; and, further, that he declined to make the said report on the ground that the constitutional term for which this House had been chosen had expired."

Mr. Lewis, from the conferees, then made a report, as follows:

"The conferees had agreed to recommend to the respective Houses that the House of Representatives recede from its amendment containing an appropriation of $3,000,000, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President, for the military and naval service, including fortifications, and ordnance, and increase of the navy; and that, in lieu thereof, the bill be amended by inserting therein the following, viz:

SENATE.]

National Defence.

[JAN. 20, 1836.]

"As an additional appropriation, the sum of three hundred thousand dollars shall be appropriated for arming the fortifications of the United States, over and above the sums provided in this act; and that the sum of five hundred thousand dollars shall be, and hereby is, appropriated for the repairs and equipment of the vessels of war of the United States, in addition to previous appropriations; the said sums to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"The item proposed by the conferees in lieu of the amendment of the House was then read, and the question was stated that the House do adopt the same, when it was objected that a quorum was not present; and, thereupon, Mr. Cambreleng and Mr. Lewis were appointed tellers to return the House; and the House being counted, the tellers reported that a quorum was not present."

The Senator from Virginia, in the conclusion of his speech, remarked, "why or how it happened that the result of the compromise was not reported to the House of Representatives, why or how that House was induced to suffer a bill of that importance to be lost by its own inaction, he did not pretend to know; he had heard something, and he had his suspicions or conjectures, but it was not proper or decent, it would be disorderly, to say what he suspected." For one, Mr. President, I know not, I cannot conceive, to what the Senator refers, unless it be to an allegation made about the time through the public journals. What reliance could be placed upon that statement may be gathered from a publication inserted in one of the newspapers in the city of Philadelphia, made as late as the first of May last. I have subjoined the following extract from the National Gazette. The charge made, and the answer to the charge, are inferrible from a perusal of the extract.

From the National Gazette.

"Last week we gave, in an editorial article, a statement of the causes of the failure of the fortification bill at the last session of Congress. That statement was derived from several highly respectable sources; we believed it to be correct, and we are sure that the particulars were deemed certain by the informants. In substance, it had appeared in other newspapers; and, as the loss of the fortification bill was a serious wrong and evil, we endeavored to ascertain the real history of the case. Yesterday we received from Mr. Forsyth, the Secretary of State, a letter, in which the statement is contradicted in the part that relates to him and Mr. Van Buren. We subjoin the text of his contradiction.

"The course pursued by Mr. Cambreleng is imputed, in that article, to advice given to him by Mr. Van Buren and myself, to prevent the responsibility of the failure of that bill from falling upon the President of the United States. I am sorry to be obliged to inform you that your paper has been made the instrument of an imposition upon the public. The statement, as regards Mr. Van Buren and myself, is in every respect untrue."

"With reference to this groundless charge, Mr. Cambreleng himself addressed a letter, which I also subjoin:

"To the Editor of the National Gazette.

"MANSION HOUSE, March 31, 1835.

"SIR: On my arrival in this city I find, in the National Gazette of the 27th instant, an editorial article, which appears to be founded upon information derived from some of 'the most respectable members of the House' and 'Senators, too, of the highest character,' concerning the proposed appropriation of three millions, and the fortification bill.

"In regard to the notice I gave the House of my intention to move to lay the third resolution on the table, as I proposed to offer an amendment to the fortification bill, authorizing a conditional appropriation of three millions for the defence of the country, it is stated in the article referred to that 'it is denied by some of the most respectable members of the House, who were in positions to know what passed, that any such notice was heard or heard of in the House. Senators, too, of the highest character aver that they were not apprized of it.' I regret, sir, that you should have been imposed upon, no doubt unintentionally, by authority so respectable. By referring to the files of the Globe, and also of the Intelligencer, you will find the notice reported in both papers, in language which could not have been misunderstood, and in ample time to have given the information to every member of both Houses.

"The other statement, that 'Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Forsyth advised Mr. Cambreleng to abstain from reporting the compromise, and to let the bill die in the House,' is unequivocally false, whether founded or not on the same 'most respectable' authority, or on the statements of gentlemen of 'the highest character.'"

"I am very respectfully, &c.

"C. C. CAMBRELENG."

All that I have to say with reference to this matter is, that I had no knowledge of any such occurrence, and if any such transaction ever did take place, let the authors and the abettors be exposed, that the public indignation may rest where it should rest. If it be scandalous, pitiful, contemptible, miserable scandal—then let the odium rest on its malignant author, be he whom he may.

The Senator from Massachusetts, speaking of the course of the President in relation to a vote of the Senate indefinitely postponing the nomination of a judge of the Supreme Court, remarked "that this vote of the Senate was carried to the President's room by the Secretary of the Senate," and the "President told the Secretary that it was more than an hour past twelve o'clock, and that he could receive no further communications from the Senate, and immediately after, as I have understood, left the Capitol. The Secretary brought back the paper containing the certified copy of the vote of the Senate, and endorsed thereon the substance of the President's answer, and also added that, according to his own watch, it was a quarter past one o'clock.

"There are two views, sir, in which this occurrence may well deserve to be noticed. One is a connexion which it may perhaps have with the loss of the fortification bill; the other is its general importance, as introducing a new rule, or a new practice, respecting the intercourse between the President and the Houses of Congress on the last day of the session.

"On the first point, I shall only observe that the fact of the President's having declined to receive this communication from the Senate, and of his having left the Capitol, was immediately known in the House of Representatives; that it was quite obvious that, if he could not receive a communication from the Senate, neither could he receive a bill from the House of Representatives for his signature. It was equally obvious that if, under these circumstances, the House of Representatives should agree to the report of the committee of conference, so that the bill should pass, it must, nevertheless, fail to become a law, for want of the President's signature; and that, in that case, the blame of losing the bill, on whomsoever else it might fall, could not be laid upon the Senate."

What does this statement of the gentleman show? One fact, most distinctly, that this communication from the Senate was made as late as a quarter past one o'clock in the morning of the 4th of March. Another fact, also, is drawn from this statement, that the circumstance was immediately known in the House of Representatives, and that it produced an influence upon that body in relation to their proceedings on the report of the committee of conference. The fact that the President had refused to receive a communication from the Senate at a quarter past one o'clock, says the gentleman, was known in the House of Representatives, and influenced the action of that body with reference to the report of the committee of conference; and for what purpose? To save the President from the blame which would necessarily attach to him, in the event that the report should be agreed to, the bill should pass, and his signature should be withheld. This is certainly an assumption somewhat extravagant and extraordinary. The gentleman does not tell us how the President became acquainted with the then condition of the fortification bill, or how the House became informed of the decision of the President, in refusing to receive the communication from the Senate. I had supposed, from the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, as well as from the remarks of other gentlemen, that it was contended that this report of the committee of conference was made to the two Houses before the hour of twelve o'clock, and therefore should have been acted on. I now learn from the statement of the gentleman, that as late as a quarter past one o'clock the determination of the President was known; and that sealed the fate of the bill. Sir, this is far-fetched. The decision of a majority of the House, with reference to the fortification bill, and with reference to every other public measure, was fixed and determined long before the hour of one of the clock in the morning. The last public business which was done in the House of Representatives that night was the passage of the Cumberland road bill; and, upon the passage of that bill, many gentlemen believed that it was then twelve o'clock, and refused to give their votes accordingly; other gentlemen entertained a different opinion, and did vote on that bill. I did not, for one, believe that it then was twelve o'clock; my watch did not so say. I did not believe that twelve o'clock had arrived when the committee of conference assembled in the committee room; but I must believe that, before the committee reappeared in their respective places, it was past the hour of twelve o'clock. And, sir, when the gentleman speaks of the decision of the President, and of the effect of that decision, he reverses the order of things, he sets forth a cause for an effect, when the effect had been produced before the cause could have operated. He assigns a reason for an event, when the event had transpired before ever the reason existed. Sir, I cannot believe that one Congress can, with any propriety or countenance, continue to transact the public business of the country after the commencement of the term of another Congress. I cannot believe that one Executive can, with propriety, with a strict regard to the constitution and the law, continue to do business after the election of another Executive. I cannot believe that my predecessor could have continued to discharge the duties of his office after the commencement of my term of office. The gentleman from Massachusetts says:

"There is no clause in the constitution, nor is there any law, which declares that the term of office of members of the House of Representatives shall expire at twelve o'clock at night on the 3d of March. They are to hold for two years; but the precise hour for the commencement of that term of two years is no where fixed by constitutional or legal provision. It has been established by usage and by inference, and very properly established, that, since the first Congress commenced its existence on the first Wednesday in March, 1789, which happened to be the 4th day of that month, therefore, the 4th of March is the day of the commencement of each successive term, but no hour is fixed by law or practice. The true rule is, as I think, most undoubtedly, that the session holden on the last day constitutes the last day for all legislative and legal purposes. While the session commenced on that day continues, the day itself continues, according to the established practice both of legislative and judicial bodies. This could not well be otherwise. If the precise moment of actual time were to settle such a matter, it would be material to ask, who shall settle the time? Shall it be done by public authority, or shall every man observe the tick of his own watch? If absolute time is to furnish a precise rule, the excess of a minute, it is obvious, would be as fatal as the excess of an hour."

Now, sir, the very statement of the gentleman is, although the constitution is silent upon this subject, although there is no law fixing the precise hour for the commencement of a congressional term, yet it has been established by usage and by inference that the 4th day of March is the day fixed on for the commencement of the term. Whether it be by positive enactment, whether it be by common law, by common usage, it makes no manner of difference in principle; one term ends when the other begins. The Senator admits that the commencement of the term is on the 4th day of March. And when does the 4th day of March begin? Clearly, when the 3d day of March ends. It is strictly true, that, commencing with 1789, on the 4th of March of every second year thereafter, a new Congress, a new House of Representatives, is elected—a new Senate is organized for the public service. It follows, then, that the public functions of the preceding Congress must have ended with the end of the 3d of March—must have closed with the close of that day. Sir, suppose the President of the United States had called the new Senate together, to meet at the Capitol, at one o'clock in the morning—suppose some extreme case had occurred to have made such a call necessary and proper, who would have been entitled to have occupied these seats at that hour—the members of the old Senate, whose term of office had expired, or the new members, who were to constitute the new Senate? Certainly the latter; their term of office commences with the commencement of the fourth—the term of the old Senate ceases with the close of the third. Sir, the gentleman says it has been not unusual for both Houses to continue in session after the hour of twelve o'clock at night on the third. This may have been so, and it may again occur, no one objecting; but does that fact settle the right? By no means. Do the journals of Congress, do the acts upon the statute book, show that any business was ever transacted after the close of any congressional term? Never, never, sir. The acts passed all purport to be approved on the third—the journals of both Houses show that all the business was done on the third. The official proceedings of an expiring Executive never bear date after the third of March. The true rule is, the Senator says, that the session holden on the last day constitutes the last day for all legislative and legal purposes; while the session commenced on that day continues, the day itself continues. Then, sir, if the two Houses shall assemble on the 3d of March, and shall continue in session, without adjournment, until the fourth at mid-day, it is to be regarded as a session on the third, and therefore constitutional.

Well, sir, by the same rule, may not the old Congress continue in perpetual session? If they can continue in session one day beyond the period fixed for the close of the term, may they not two upon the same principle? May they not weeks and months upon the same principle? All that they would be required to do to legalize the transaction would be to prevent any adjournment; to suffer no such proceeding; to see that the session commenced on the third day continues. While the session commenced on that day continues, according to the Senator's doctrine, the day itself continues. A session, then, commenced on the 3d of March, 1836, may be continued to the 3d of March, 1837, without intermission, and, according to the doctrine of the gentleman, it would be a session of the 3d of March, 1836, and therefore constitutional and obligatory. Sir, I cannot yield my assent to any such doctrine; there is a fixed, a known, a well-established time, for the termination of one Congress, and for the commencement of another; and there is no conceivable time between the two periods. Whenever the 3d of March ends, the 4th of March begins. It is the natural division of time; there should be no fractional part of a day. Whenever the term of one Congress ends, the term of the next begins. This is common sense; this has been the usage, the common law of the land, since the meeting of the first Congress in 1789. The authority of this regulation cannot be impaired at this late day of our history by any construction which ingenuity can devise. Sir, we are not without book upon this subject; the subjoined extract from the journals of the first Congress show what was then done; the history of the legislative proceedings of the several States show that they have strictly conformed to the resolution of the first Congress in relation to this matter.

"30th April, 1790. Mr. Benson, Mr. Clymer, Mr. Huntington, Mr. Moore, and Mr. Carroll, were appointed a committee on the part of the House, to report 'when, according to the constitution, the terms for which the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives, have been respectively chosen, shall be deemed to have commenced.'

"12th May. Mr. Benson made a report.

"May 14. The Senate informed the House they had agreed to the report.

"May 18. The House agreed to the resolution reported, which is in these words:

"That the terms for which the President, Vice President, Senate, and House of Representatives, of the United States, were respectively chosen, did, according to the constitution, commence on the 4th of March, 1789; and so the Senators of the first class, and the Representatives, will not, according to the constitution, be entitled to seats in the next Congress, which will be assembled after the 3d of March, 1791."

"August 9. The Speaker was directed to transmit to the executive authority of each State an authentic copy of the resolution of the 18th of May."

This is all, sir, that I wish to say upon the subject of the functions of the last Congress, with a view to justify that body for the course they pursued in relation to the fortification bill.

The Senate will pardon me for this digression. I felt disposed to state with more particularity than I did yesterday the last scene in the fortification bill. I was desirous to put the Senate in possession of all the facts connected with the loss of that measure. It would be of no avail for me to say how its defeat might have been prevented, or to whose agency its final loss should be attributed. I will not do it. My own opinion would be worth no more than any other person's. I hope it would be worth no less. The American people will judge for themselves. With that judgment I shall be content.

But, sir, while we mourn the demise of this bill, let us profit from this untoward occurrence; let us remedy the evil; let us now make full amends; let us, in truth, one and all, be resolved that we will now do our duty, and that the nation shall no longer suffer by our neglect. I do, as sincerely, I trust, as any other man, lament the fate of the bill. It cannot but be regretted in every point of view. But, Mr. President, the grounds on which the amendment was opposed in the Senate ought to be examined and well considered. The grounds of objection, as taken, must be regarded as matters of no little consequence to those who were its friends in the House of Representatives. It was objected to, it was opposed, and successfully opposed, mainly on constitutional grounds. If, then, the grounds of objection were well taken, it follows that those of us who supported the amendment infringed, by that act, the federal constitution. Now, sir, I wish to satisfy my own people, if I can be so fortunate, that I am not obnoxious to this charge; that I have not advocated, that I have not supported, this amendment in disregard of the provisions and injunctions of the constitution. I must, therefore, still further examine the grounds of objection taken to this amendment.

The Senator from Maryland remarked that, "by reference to the proceedings of the Senate of last session, we shall find that, upon due consideration, the Senate unanimously resolved that it was 'inexpedient to adopt any legislative measure in regard to the state of affairs with France.'" By looking at the history of the proceedings of the other branch of Congress, as now upon record, we find that the House, so late as the 2d March, after a full view of all the despatches sent by the Executive, unanimously decided that the "treaty with France should be maintained, and its execution insisted on," and said no more; and we see also that a resolution, "That contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France," introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in that House, was by that chairman, on the same day, 2d of March, laid upon the table, where it quietly reposed during the short remnant of the session.

I have already stated how it happened that there was no action of the House on this contingent resolution proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations; and if the journals of Congress could contain a faithful record of the speeches, as well as of the votes of the members, there would be now no difficulty—there would be now no misapprehension in relation to this whole matter. But, sir, in confirmation of what I said yesterday, I would quote the declarations of Mr. Cambreleng, published in one of the papers of this city, by the agency of the gentlemen who act as reporters in Congress.

"Mr. Cambreleng said it was his object to avoid debate on this question: if we were to have peace with France, which he sincerely hoped and expected, the less that was said the better; if war, the next Congress would have enough to say upon the great question. As to the first resolution, he cared not for the form, provided the substance could be preserved, and the rights and honor of the country be maintained. He would concur in any modification which the House might deem expedient. He should also, to secure unanimity, disembarass the question of our relations with France, by relieving gentlemen from the miserable question concerning the Bank of the United States. His sole motive in introducing that subject was to show not only to this country, but to France, that, if driven into a war, we had the means of carrying it on without recourse to taxes or loans.

"He proposed that the third resolution, declaring that preparation ought to be made, should be laid upon the table, as he designed to take a more effective course. He should offer an amendment to the fortification bill, when returned from the Senate, appropriating one million for the army, and two millions for the navy, in case it should become necessary before the next meeting of Congress. This, he understood, would be all that was required by the executive branch of the Government. With these modifications, he hoped the resolution would meet the approbation of the House."

[SENATE.]

This proceeding, I stated, must, in all probability, have come to the knowledge of the members of this branch of the Government. Certain the fact is, that it was that very proceeding—the vote to lay the contingent resolution upon the table—which induced the chairman of the same Committee on Foreign Relations to propose as an amendment to the fortification bill the appropriation of the three millions of dollars.

The honorable Senator from Virginia has very distinctly stated his grounds of objection: he regarded the amendment as an infraction of the constitution.

It was not the amount which alarmed either the Senator from Maryland or the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Virginia has very distinctly stated that his objections to the amendment were on constitutional grounds; that he regarded, of course, the proposed amendment as an infraction of the constitution. The following extract from his speech shows his views:

“The opposition to it was founded principally on constitutional grounds; it was objected that it was in fact a general vote of money to the Executive, for the defence of the nation, to be used at his absolute, unlimited discretion. That the proposed appropriation was not sufficiently specific; that the amendment would place this large sum of money in the President's hands, with power to apply every dollar of it to whatever arm of the national defence he thought proper, and judge when defence would be proper; in other words, to determine the question of war or peace. The objection was not so much to the amount, though no estimate had been laid before us, and we had no data on which we could judge of the reasonableness of the appropriation. Nor was the objection rested on any distrust of the Executive in the exercise of such a discretion.”

The objection, then, of the Senator from Virginia, was, in substance, that the appropriation was too general, too indefinite, not sufficiently specific. He did not distrust the Executive in the exercise of the discretion confided to him. He made no objection to the amount of the appropriation; but it granted to the Executive a power too unlimited. The terms of the grant were too unqualified. This is also the second ground of objection assumed by the Senator from Massachusetts; and it is my object, before resuming my seat, to undertake to answer this objection. Before proceeding, however, to consider this objection, I would, with reference to another ground of objection, and on which I have already submitted some remarks, ask what, sir, has been the history of the legislation of Congress upon the subject of appropriations. What has been the course of both Houses ever since the adoption of the constitution? I appeal to the journals. I appeal to the recollection of those within the reach of my voice for the correctness of what I now state, that three fourths of the bills appropriating money from the treasury originate in one or the other of the two Houses of Congress, not only without executive recommendation, but without executive knowledge. Such bills have never been opposed on the ground that they have not been recommended, that they have not been urged by executive influence. A proceeding of such a character on the part of any Executive, would, I trust, furnish good ground of objection. Such an interference would not and should not be tolerated by the representatives of the people. I would ask whether the Senator himself, when he recommended the large appropriation, when he procured the passage of a bill making that large appropriation for the adjustment and final satisfaction of the claims of our citizens for French spoils prior to the year 1800, had the authority of executive recommendation. No, sir. In the nature of things it cannot so be. The Senator from Massachusetts has well and truly remarked “that the two Houses, and especially the House of Representatives, are the natural guardians of the people's money;” “they are to keep it sacred and to use it discreetly.” And it is, sir, on this very ground that an appropriation coming voluntarily, unasked, and uninfluenced, from the representatives of the people, carries with it a stronger claim for support than any appropriation would, when proposed by executive recommendation.

When the representatives of the people, when the popular branch of our Government, the natural guardians of the people's money, in the exercise of their sound discretion, on their responsibility, ask for an appropriation, it strikes me as novel, as extraordinary, as passing strange, that the Senate, the other branch of Congress, the co-guardians with the House of Representatives of the people's money, should oppose it, because the appropriation is not called for by executive recommendation.

This appropriation, sir, was asked, was constitutionally asked, by the highest authority under our Government. It was asked by the House of Representatives; and, if proper, if expedient, if necessary, it ought to have been granted.

The view, then, which I have taken of this subject has rendered that part of the message communicated to Congress at the commencement of the present session unexceptionable. The appropriation was made in accordance with the views of the Executive. Not that the Executive had in express terms asked for this appropriation.

He had communicated by his message information upon the subject of our affairs with France; he had left it to the discretion of Congress to devise such measures as they might deem expedient. The House of Representatives had proposed to appropriate, conditionally, three millions of dollars, to be expended upon certain objects, if the President should consider the expenditure of the whole or of a part called for. Such a disposition, then, of this subject, such a proposition, was undoubtedly in accordance with the views of the Executive, and was clearly, in my judgment, made necessary by the then existing circumstances.

There is no mystification, there is nothing extraordinary, in that clause of the President's message.

What was the particular paragraph in the message of the President at the opening of the present session which has provoked such severe animadversion? It is subjoined:

“Much loss and inconvenience have been experienced in consequence of the failure of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, which passed one branch of the national Legislature at the last session, but was lost in the other. This failure was the more regretted, not only because it necessarily interrupted and delayed the progress of a system of national defence, projected immediately after the last war, and since steadily pursued, but also because it contained a contingent appropriation, inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive, in aid of this important object, and other branches of the national defence, some portions of which might have been most usefully applied during the past season. I invite your early attention to that part of the report of the Secretary of War which relates to this subject, and recommend an appropriation sufficiently liberal to accelerate the argument of the fortifications, agreeably to the proposition submitted by him, and to place our whole Atlantic seaboard in a complete state of defence. A just regard to the permanent interests of the country evidently requires this measure, but there are also other reasons which, at the present juncture, give it peculiar force, and make it my duty to call to the subject your special consideration.”

I shall not notice any other part of this extract from

SENATE.]

National Defence.

[JAN. 20, 1856.]

the message, except that which speaks of the regret entertained for the loss of the fortification bill, because "it contained a contingent appropriation, inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive." And what is the plain, straight-forward English of this clause? That the Executive made an official communication to one branch of Congress which he withheld from the other? By no manner of means. He might, or he might not, have said that, to make such an appropriation, under existing circumstances, would be all that Congress could do. He might, or he might not, have said that such a contingent appropriation would, in all probability, meet the exigency of the times. But it cannot be said that it is inferrible that he exerted his official influence to procure the passage of that appropriation. He had laid the subject before both Houses of Congress, upon which the amendment was predicated, and this was all that he had done. And when his message, at the opening of the session, speaks this, that the appropriation was in accordance with his views, he says no more and no less than that the action of the House upon this subject met his approbation. The Senate had the same lights upon this subject with which the House were favored. It was the message of the 26th of February. It was the state and condition of the country which induced the appropriation; that message was alike communicated to the Senate; the state and condition of the country was alike known to them.

I will now, Mr. President, proceed to notice the principal objection stated by the Senator from Virginia, and the last objection stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, to the amendment.

The gentleman from Massachusetts states his second objection to the amendment of the House to be, that "the constitution declares that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. What is meant by 'appropriations?' Does this language not mean that particular sums shall be assigned by law to particular objects?" That the proposed appropriation was too general in its character. "It was as general as language could make it. It embraced every expenditure that could be called either military or naval. It was to include 'fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy,' but it was not confined to these. It embraced the whole general subject of military service. Under the authority of such a law, the President might repair ships, build ships, buy ships, enlist seamen, and do any thing and every thing else touching the naval service, without restraint or control.

"He might repair such fortifications as he saw fit, and neglect the rest; arm such as he saw fit, and neglect the arming of others; or build new fortifications wherever he chose. But these unlimited powers over the fortifications and the navy constitute, by no means, the most dangerous part of the proposed authority; because, under that authority, his power to raise and employ land forces was equally absolute and uncontrolled. He might levy troops, embody a new army, call out the militia in numbers to suit his own discretion, and employ them as he saw fit."

The first answer to this objection is, that if it was too general in its character, if it was not sufficiently specific, it would have been clearly within the power of the Senate to have made its phraseology entirely unexceptionable.

Not that the Senate could have offered any amendment to the amendment of the House, because that was but an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senate to the fortification bill. But if the Senator from Massachusetts had excepted to the terms of the amendment, he could have effected his object most readily by asking a conference at the time he made his motion to adhere, there would then have been a sufficient time to have accomplished any such purpose. The friends of this amendment in the House were not so very tenacious of the style and phraseology that they would not have made any alteration whatever, if they could have secured the object; the appropriation for fortifications, for ordnance, and for the increase of the navy. Therefore, there could have been no difficulty in making the terms of the amendment perfectly unexceptionable, entirely conformable to the taste and to the judgment of the Senator himself.

The gentleman has favored us with his construction of that clause of the constitution which provides that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. Clearly so, sir. But would it not have been an appropriation by law, if the public money had been set apart for any purpose, with the approbation of the representatives of the people and of the States in Congress assembled? Is not Congress to decide for what purposes the public money shall be appropriated? I have yet to learn that, if the amendment, as adopted by the House, had passed into a law, that the law could have been regarded as unconstitutional, for the reason that the appropriation in the terms of the amendment was not sufficiently specific.

The amendment states with perfect distinctness the amount to be appropriated; it defines the objects upon which the appropriation shall be expended, if expended at all; and it clearly sets forth on whose responsibility, and at whose accountability, the expenditure should be made. What more could be required? The amount, the object, the accountability, well defined. The Senator says, "it was as general as language could make it." Is it so, sir? I ask, what would be the fair, straight-forward construction which would be given to the amendment of the House? It proposes an appropriation of $3,000,000 for the military and naval service, including "fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy;" in other words, it proposes for those objects, and for those objects alone. No one charged with the execution of a law containing, in precise terms, such an appropriation, no one to whom such an expenditure should be confided, would presume to lay out a single dollar of the appropriation except upon the very objects specially enumerated in the amendment, "fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy." If the amendment had not contained the word "including," there would be no room for doubt. If the amendment, instead of the word "including," had used the word "meaning," there could be no doubt.

In my apprehension, then, without committing any violence upon language, such a construction, plain common-sense construction, could be fairly made as to the amendment; which would, in effect, entirely exempt it from the objection stated by the Senator. But, take it as it is, in its broadest sense, and accept the description of the Senator from Massachusetts, "that it is as general as language could make it," yet it is no departure from the authority of precedents. Our statute books are replete with appropriations as general, as undefined, as unlimited, as the appropriation proposed by the amendment of the House to the fortification bill. I will here give to the Senate precedents to show what has been the legislation of Congress upon this subject ever since the adoption of the constitution. At the very first session of Congress, immediately after the adoption of the constitution, when its provisions must have been familiar to every man who composed that assembly, an appropriation bill was passed, and approved by Washington himself, for the service of the year 1789, from which I make the following extract:

"That there be appropriated for the service of the present year a sum not exceeding two hundred and

National Defence.

[SENATE.]

sixteen thousand dollars, for defraying the expenses of the civil list under the late and present Government; a sum not exceeding one hundred and thirty-seven thousand dollars, for defraying the expenses of the Department of War."

And on the 2d of March, 1801, an appropriation bill was passed and approved by the then President, from which I make the following extract:

"For the fortification of ports and harbors within the United States, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars.

"For the fabrication of cannon and small arms, and the purchase of ammunition, being the balance of appropriations unexpended, which have been carried to the surplus fund, four hundred thousand dollars."

It would seem that no language could be used more general, less specific, than the language used in the two preceding extracts, and the appropriations proposed by them as unlimited as the appropriation proposed by the amendment in question.

The Senator has referred to the doctrines of Mr. Jefferson upon this subject, and asks, "What have the friends and admirers of Mr. Jefferson to say to this appropriation? Have they forgotten, all forgotten, and wholly abandoned, even all pretence for specific appropriation? If not, how could they sanction such a vote as this?" There is nothing in the writings of the individual to whom the Senator has referred, conveying a sentiment that appropriations like the one proposed by the House in their amendment, is an infringement of the constitution. In his first message to Congress, he holds that—"In our care, too, of the public contributions intrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition, by disallowing all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount, by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money, and by bringing back to a single department all accountabilities for money, where the examination may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform."

The whole amount of the doctrine of Mr. Jefferson was, as deducible from the preceding extract, that specific appropriations should be encouraged with a view to a corresponding accountability. Examine the proposed amendment of the House, and there is no doubt that there is not only "designation of object," but a clear accountability created. The purpose of Mr. Jefferson is well secured by the appropriation contained in the amendment of the House. But we are not without authority, even in the days and under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, for this proceeding of the House. In 1802 an appropriation was made "for erecting and completing fortifications and barracks, seventy thousand five hundred dollars." Without defining what portion of this sum should be expended upon fortifications, and what portion should be expended upon barracks—without defining in what State fortifications should be erected, and in what they should not—confiding the whole expenditure to the Executive. In 1803 a bill passed appropriating "for fortifications, arsenals, magazines, and armories, one hundred and nine thousand six hundred and ninety-six dollars and eighty-eight cents;" and in 1807 Congress passed an act, which was approved by Mr. Jefferson, as general and as undefined as the amendment in question. It gave to the President authority to expend the whole appropriation upon what port or upon what harbor he might please. He had power to expend it in fortifying the harbors upon the lakes, or in protecting the ports upon the seaboard. There was one all-important and essential ingredient in every appropriation clearly preserved; and that was accountability to Congress—responsibility to the nation.

Precisely so in the amendment to the fortification bill, as proposed by the House. It not only fixed the sum, and with sufficient degree of certainty the objects, but a clear responsibility, a direct accountability, upon the person charged with the expenditure. I would ask any candid person to show the difference between the following appropriations, made by Congress in 1807:

"That a sum of money, not exceeding one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in addition to the sums heretofore appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to enable the President of the United States to cause the ports and harbors of the United States to be better fortified and protected;" and that contained in the amendment of the House.

As late as 1812, when the honorable Senator before me [Mr. CALHOUN] was in Congress, aiding with all the powers of his mind to advance the interest, by maintaining the honor of his country, an appropriation bill was passed, providing "that the sum of five hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, in addition to the sums already appropriated, for the purposes of fortifying and defending the maritime frontier of the United States; and that the same be paid out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

No proposition could be more general in its terms, no one could be more comprehensive in its objects; it embraced the whole subject of fortifying and defending the maritime frontier of the United States, in just the way and manner the Executive should determine. This bill was strenuously opposed in the House of Representatives, but was finally passed by a large majority, and among those voting for this appropriation will be found the name of the Senator before me, and also the name of Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, whose views upon constitutional power are well known. If possible, a still more undefined and unlimited appropriation was made under the same administration, providing "that the sum of five hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, in addition to the sums already appropriated, for the purposes of fortifying and defending the ports, harbors, and maritime frontier of the United States."

From the cases cited from the precedents which have been referred to, there seems to be no lack of authority for the proceeding of the last House of Representatives upon this subject. There is an indispensable necessity, growing out of the complicated and multifarious business of Congress, to make general appropriations, confiding the expenditure to persons of responsibility. It is not the sum of an undefined appropriation which makes it unconstitutional; if you appropriate ten thousand dollars for contingencies, without specifying any object, it is just as, and no more, unconstitutional, than it would be if you appropriate ten millions of dollars for like purposes.

We are in the habit, year following year, of granting money for contingent expenses to every Department, and to every subordinate bureau under the Government; and to both Houses of Congress such appropriations are made: they are not specific; they could not be so; but are they less constitutional?

The very amendment proposed by the Senator himself to the fortification bill has not the character of a specific appropriation—"one hundred thousand dollars for improving the defences within the State of Maryland."

In all these appropriations the great principle to be preserved is accountability. No matter what may be the terms of an appropriation bill, keep alive a due responsibility in the expenditure of the people's money, and you will not fail to preserve inviolate the letter and spirit of the constitution.

SENATE.]

National Defence.

[JAN. 20, 1836.]

The Senator from Massachusetts, in conclusion, remarked that he dare not prophesy how long the Senate could bear this partisan warfare; that unless there be an adherence to the constitutional principles which the Senate have sustained, unless "we can give to true principle its superiority over party," then there are among the living those in the land who will record the last days of the republic. Where does the Senator perceive ground of apprehension? Where exists the cause of alarm? Not in the spirit of enterprise which is abroad in the land; not in the unexampled prosperity of our common country; not in the extraordinary success which crowns the efforts of every class of our citizens; not in the elevated character and condition of the moral, religious, and literary institutions of the Union. These realities are within the range of every man's observation. It would indeed be difficult to imagine where are concealed the fires which are to consume the free institutions of the republic.

It would, indeed, be difficult to imagine where exist the imminent dangers which are besetting us and threatening to involve in one common ruin the labors, the intelligence, the experience, of half a century. Where is the destroying wave; the overwhelming cataract? Mr. President, there is more fancy than fact, more poetry than prose, in the description of surrounding dangers. We are constantly reminded of the great contest now waging between power and liberty; we are told, day following day, of violations of the constitutional compact. But, thanks be to Heaven, the country is safe; the people prosperous and happy. When the Senator adverts to the untiring efforts of the Senate to maintain sacred and inviolate "the stern and sturdy principles of the constitution," does he intend to say that the other branches of the Government are less faithful in the way of duty? Will he assert that the representatives of the people disregard the provisions of that instrument? Sir, I cannot believe it. The frequency of elections is the political thermometer in the hands of the people, by which the character and fidelity of every public servant is determined. If the representative fails to execute the trust confided to him, there will be no failure on the part of the constituent in the discharge of his duty.

I am free to say, Mr. President, that I for one have no fears, no apprehension, for the permanency of our institutions, for the peace and security of this republic, and for the preservation and perpetuity of the federal constitution. Sir, I do not believe that there are among the living those who will record its last days. There is too much intelligence, too much virtue, too much patriotism, abroad in the land to warrant any such declaration, or to justify any such conclusion. I will not believe that there exists any party, in any section of our happy country, who would, if they could, sow the seeds of disunion; who could, if they would, produce a dismemberment of this confederacy. The bond of union is too strong to be severed by light causes. It is a union of interests, established by the services and sealed with the common blood of our revolutionary fathers. Such a union will continue unbroken, undissolved, unimpaired, as long as virtue and intelligence shall find a resting place in our land.

What remains to be done? What is the voice of wisdom and experience? What are the lessons derived from history? All combine to teach us, in time of peace, of general tranquillity, to prepare for the greatest of all calamities—a national war. What, then, remains for the Congress of the United States, the representatives of more than fourteen millions of people, to do now, promptly and efficiently? Sir, nothing less than to put our whole country in a state of perfect defence—of entire security. It is not yet, Mr. President, half a century since the nation commenced an existence under our constitution; and although we have incurred the expenses and charges of two protracted wars, yet we now present to the world the imposing, the great moral spectacle of a nation free from debt, rich in resources, with a population zealous in the cause of popular rights, determined to maintain public liberty at every hazard, resolved that the constitution of their choice shall never be surrendered, except with the surrender of honor, of life, of every thing sacred. Yet, sir, it is a lamentable, a melancholy fact, that in our full tide of successful experiment, that in our day of unexampled prosperity, we have, year following year, been deaf to the voice of wisdom and experience. We have not, in these days of our glory, prepared for that exigency, for that dreadful scourge, for that dire calamity, which has occasionally happened between sovereign nations since the commencement of time. We have not prepared for war. Sir, at this very moment our whole maritime frontier is defenceless. We have here and there a fortification, dilapidated and ruinous, without men and without guns. It is not yet, sir, sixty years since we declared ourselves a free and independent people; and yet, one fifth part of that period we have actually been engaged in war with our mother country.

It cannot be supposed that another sixty years will come without the occurrence of some of those conflicting and embarrassing causes between nations which tend to war. I would, then, Mr. President, be prepared, be well prepared, for such an event. I would be prepared, as a precautionary measure, as a preventive of that worst of all evils. I would fortify every weak and vulnerable point. I would strengthen the arms of national defence. I would increase our naval power. In a war with any transatlantic Power, it would be our reliance, our security. Our ships of war should be increased as our wealth, as our commerce, and our population, increases. We should be ready, in any possible emergency, on the shortest possible notice, to float a naval force sufficient to protect our commerce, and to maintain our honor, in every sea and in every ocean. I would put our whole maritime frontier, by an unbroken chain of fortresses, well armed and well manned, in perfect security. I would render the country from Maine to Florida, I would render our frontiers from the lakes to the ocean, impregnable to any foreign enemy. And now, Mr. President, is the fit, the accepted time to carry on these great works for national security and defence; we are supplied with an abundance of available means; we have given encouragement to one of the great interests of our country that we will not disturb a measure appertaining to that interest for half a dozen years yet to come. We are every day and every hour adding to our resources. There cannot, then, be a more opportune period for completing the great works for national defence and for national security. Such expenditures would cement more strongly the bond of national union, would fasten together the ties and the cords of this great confederacy. The Senator from Massachusetts remarked, "that if the proposition were now before us, and the guns of the enemy were battering against the walls of the Capitol, he would not agree to it." Such a sentiment, such a feeling, I could not, if I would, entertain. France has her sixty sail hovering upon our coast—a fleet come hither to observe our course, to watch our movements, to see that we offend not her honor; and with such realities, could an American Senate long debate about an appropriation which necessity, imperious necessity, demands? Should we stand here to inquire of each other, whether the appropriation came to us upon the authority of executive recommendation? Should we stand here to criticise the terms of the grant, whether they be general, or whether they be specific? No, sir. We should do our duty—our whole duty—regardless of form, untrammelled by ceremony. We should look to the state of our beloved country, ascertain her wants, acquaint ourselves with her condition, and promptly and energetically apply all the means within our power for her defence—for her security. There should be, sir, no two ways about it. Shall we speculate here about the checks, the provisions, the injunctions, of the constitution, with an enemy at our door? We should lay aside our speculations, and with one heart, with one mind, go forth to do our duty, to defend and to save the republic. This, sir, should be the feeling, and this should be the course, in the day of danger. And I will do no Senator so great injustice as to suppose that he would be backward in the way of his public duty. For one, I should be most unfaithful to the patriotism of my own State should I fail to do all I can do for the defence and the permanent security of our country. The sacrifices of the fathers of the Revolution, the founders of this great confederacy, remind me of my bounden duty to do all that I can do to preserve the inheritance purchased by their valor and preserved by their virtue. My own native State, which boasts of “her light infantry Poor, and her Yorktown Scammel,” would rebuke me, should I hesitate to do all that I can do for the defence and permanent security of their beloved country. My own sense of duty would condemn me, should I suffer myself to be embarrassed by ingenious hypercritical exceptions to constitutional power. I will do my duty, when occasion requires, as the exigency of the times and the circumstances of the country may demand. I will do my duty, regardless of consequences; not doubting that I shall always find ample authority, sufficient warrant, in the constitution, for any and for every public act having for its object the preservation of the confederacy, the defence, the permanent security, of the country.

Mr. President, we have nothing to fear from external or from internal enemies, from foreign collisions or from domestic excitement, if we, the representatives of the States and of the people, are faithful to the country, faithful to ourselves, faithful to the constitution. The fidelity of the North will never tire; the patriotism of the South will never keep back. They will go together; they will on all occasions present an unbroken force in resisting every enemy, and in putting down every excitement. Our Southern friends may be assured that there is no disposition existing in the free States to break in upon the compromise of the constitutional compact, to invade their rights of property. That slavery is regarded as a great evil by the philanthropist, in every section, cannot be doubted; but that the good men of the North, that nineteen twentieths of her moral and of her physical power will, on all occasions, and at all times, be put in requisition to defeat the mad and visionary schemes of fanaticism, is alike free from doubt.

Let us, then, with a common feeling of patriotism, unite in the prosecution of this work of national defence. Let us lay aside party considerations, and go forth in our might to do our whole duty for our country. Let us rally around the Government of our choice, and sustain and support our institutions by the exertion of every moral and intellectual power.

Let us bear constantly in mind the injunction of one of the great political fathers of the republic, “That the preservation of the federal Government in its whole constitutional vigor, is the sheet anchor of our peace at home and our safety abroad.”

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21.

After transacting some other business,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions offered by Mr. BENTON.

The question being on the motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH to amend,

Mr. HUBBARD resumed and concluded the remarks which he commenced yesterday; the whole of which are given in preceding pages.

On the suggestion of Mr. CALHOUN,

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH withdrew his motion to amend.

Mr. GRUNDY moved to amend the first resolution, by inserting, after the word “that,” the words “so much of;” and in the third line, after “States,” the words “as may be necessary;” so as to make it read, “that so much of the surplus revenue as may be necessary shall be applied,” &c.

Mr. BENTON accepted the amendment as a modification of the resolution.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the further consideration of the subject was postponed till Monday.

The resolution, as amended, was ordered to be printed;

And the Senate adjourned to Monday.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the credentials of W. D. EWING, elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois, in the room of Elias K. Kane, deceased.

Mr. EWING was then introduced and qualified.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions introduced by Mr. BENTON.

Mr. SOUTHWARD asked for the reading of the resolutions, as they had been amended on the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, with the approbation of the mover; and they were read by the President in these words:

“Resolved, That so much of the surplus revenue of the United States, and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States, as may be necessary for the purpose, ought to be set apart and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the country.

“Resolved, That the President be requested to cause the Senate to be informed of—

“1st. The probable amount that would be necessary for fortifying the lake, maritime, and gulf frontier of the United States, and such points of the land frontier as may require permanent fortifications.

“2d. The probable amount that would be necessary to construct an adequate number of armories and arsenals in the United States, and to supply the States with field artillery (especially brass field pieces) for their militia, and with side-arms and pistols for their cavalry.

“3d. The probable amount that would be necessary to supply the United States with the ordnance, arms, and munitions of war, which a proper regard to self-defence would require to be always on hand.

“4th. The probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam or floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and to the welfare of the Union.”

Mr. SOUTHWARD. The Senator from Missouri has not informed us whether the objects mentioned in the call which he proposes to make on the Executive are each to have part of the surplus revenue expended upon them, or whether it is to be confined to them. We are left, therefore, to infer that they are all to be accomplished, and that they are the means and the only means to produce the “strength and respectability which are due to the security and to the welfare of the Union;" and that the surplus is to be pledged to them, and them only, until they are all completed. They are, certainly, numerous enough, and of sufficient magnitude, to attract our admiration. Ports, on the lakes, ocean, gulf, and inland frontier—armories, and arsenals, sufficient to construct artillery, side-arms, and pistols—ordnance, arms, and munitions of war—increased of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam batteries: these are to be provided for, to the exclusion of other objects of interest which may hereafter be presented. The scheme is sufficiently large. It will answer exceedingly well for purposes of speculation, comment, and applause before the public, but is not very likely to produce much good. Such magnificent schemes generally end in small results. The money necessary to complete the one under consideration must be counted by tens of millions, and the time by scores of years. But while the people cannot doubt that its friends are devoted to their interests, it is to be hoped that those who cannot elevate themselves to its magnitude may not be regarded as less anxious for "the general defence and permanent security of the country." I do not, however, object to the inquiries. They may procure from the Executive information which may be useful when the Senate is called to act upon less extensive and more unpretending plans.

Before I vote for the resolution in its present shape, I wish some explanation of its terms. What is the "surplus revenue?" It is generally understood to be that amount of money which remains in the treasury after all the appropriations have been made and expended. Now, these appropriations are for such objects as are deemed by Congress necessary for the support of the Government, and for the general defence, security, and prosperity, of the country; for the civil and diplomatic list; the army; the navy; the fortifications; for each and every object for which it is the duty of Congress to provide. Does the resolution, then, mean to declare that, after Congress shall have granted whatever is necessary for forts, army, navy, &c., so much of the remainder as is necessary for those same objects shall be pledged to them? They are first to receive all the support which is necessary for them, in the opinion of Congress, and, after that, to receive as much more as shall be necessary for them. Who is to judge what more is necessary, after Congress has applied what they deem necessary? The resolution has something of the aspect of the fortification bill of last year. Congress applied by it what was necessary for them, beyond the estimate of the Executive, and then the bill gave three millions more, if that same Executive should think it necessary.

The mover of the resolution has informed the Senate that it is modelled, "on purpose," after the resolution devoting the revenue to the national debt. But the want of parallel between the cases is quite apparent. The national debt was not an object of ordinary appropriation, as are the fortifications, the navy, and other matters enumerated in this resolution. They were then, if they are now, the fit subjects for appropriations; and after they were provided for, the surplus was with great propriety devoted to the extinction of that debt; but if appropriations such as Congress deemed necessary for that debt had been made, it would have seemed strange to those who passed that resolution to have declared that so much more of the surplus as was necessary should be pledged for its payment. That debt is no longer a burden to the nation, and the credit of our relief from it is due to those who wisely devised and put in operation the plan for its extinction; not to those who happened to be in power when the last payments were made, and who, with so much self-complacency and imposition upon the public, have claimed the whole merit. They have one merit only, that of not having actually violated the law which commanded them to make the payments; and this is no ordinary merit, I admit, in times like these.

But if I understood the Senator aright, he declared that he had "on purpose" presented this resolution as a mode of resisting the plans proposed by the Senators from Kentucky and South Carolina. The proposition of the Senator from Kentucky would direct a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States; and is founded upon the idea that these proceeds belong of right to the States, and that they are the proper authorities to select the objects on which they shall be expended. That of the Senator from South Carolina proposes that all the surplus revenue, after the ordinary calls of the Government have been satisfied, shall be divided in the same mode. These are, at least, practicable schemes of public usefulness, and I am not willing that their consideration should be put aside by one like that contained in the present resolution. They ought, at least, to be fairly met, fully discussed, and decided on their merits; not defeated by propositions which, with high pretensions, can lead to no useful end, much less by a plan which leaves the whole surplus revenue to be expended by agents of the federal Executive, with all its instruments of corruption and extravagance.

But, Mr. President, the argument by which the resolution was sustained is calculated to attract more attention, and deserves to be examined. It seemed to me to consist, principally, in three propositions:

1. We shall probably have war with France.
2. The nation is without defence, and unprepared for war. And,
3. The Senate is to blame for this condition of the country.

This is the chain of argument by which we are to be led to the conclusion that so much of the surplus revenue as may be necessary for the purpose ought to be set apart and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the Union. Let us look at it.

We shall soon have war. It may be so. But I am not disposed, now, to speculate on its probabilities, nor argue respecting its causes. When the question shall be fairly presented to our consideration, it shall meet from me the anxious deliberation which its nature demands.

For the present I confess my inability to form an opinion whether we shall or shall not have war with France. The rapid changes in our positions, the strange involutions of diplomacy which have been exhibited, put ordinary calculation at defiance, and no one can reach a safe conclusion upon the subject, who is not admitted to a knowledge of the secret designs of the Executives of the two countries.

It may be that two great and powerful nations, boasting of their civilization, in this age of Christian light, are about to commence a sanguinary and destructive warfare, and squander their blood and treasure, about a debt of $5,000,000; a warfare which, in a single year, will cost to each nation ten times the amount of the sum in dispute, and blood for which no money can pay. It may be that ancient alliances and friendship are to be broken up and forgotten, and substituted by the bitterness of hatred and the malignity of revenge; that the peace of the civilized world is to be destroyed, and the progress of free principles jeopardized, by a conflict between nations who profess the most regard for those principles. It may be, too, that our own institutions approach an extraordinary trial. When our constitution was formed, one great object of its founders was to remove the power of producing and declaring war, as far as possible, from the action of one man—the Chief Executive Magistrate. They knew, for they had felt, the sufferings, distress, and crimes, which it produces. They had seen, too, in the history of other nations, how often it had resulted from the ignorance, the folly, and the ambition, of princes and rulers; and they resolved to guard themselves and their descendants from such an evil. Hence the provision of the constitution, "Congress shall have power to declare war." But it may yet appear that their caution was vain; that the people and Congress may be driven to it against their interests and judgments; and that the Executive has still the capacity, by the language which he uses, and the mode in which he conducts negotiations, to place us in conditions in which we have no alternative, and in which the best friends of peace may be compelled to yield themselves to sustain the honor and the interests of the country against the arms and the assaults of a foreign nation. We may have war; but if we do, there will be tremendous guilt somewhere. It can have resulted only from the folly or the crimes of those who have conducted the negotiation on the one side or the other, or on both. There is nothing in the cause of dispute which ought to have led to such a termination. I fear that we shall be compelled to trace it to the boastful vanity of one man, the petulance of a second, and the fitful violence of a third; and these met by ill-disciplined national pride, and mistaken notions of national honor. If it do come, it will be no common struggle, and produce no ordinary results. We all know what our own countrymen can and will do when the scabbard shall be thrown away; and we cannot be ignorant of the capacities of modern France, regenerated as she has been by the controlling genius of the last age, and possessing, as she does, a navy inferior in science and discipline to none which has existed in any age of the world; superior in numbers and power to all but one, whose flag is now upon the ocean. For such a struggle there ought to be adequate cause and full preparation.

Are we prepared? The Senator from Missouri informs us, and very correctly, that we are not. But he seemed unwilling to speak of our situation, lest he should give to the enemy a knowledge of our want of defence. He may relieve himself from all fears on that point. Our actual condition is as well known in Paris as in Washington. We have not a fort upon our seaboard, the precise location and strength of which is not as well understood by them as by us. Our navy, both the scattered portions which are at sea and the remainder at our dock yards, has been the subject of their diligent study. Our coast, with all its inlets, bays, and harbors, is familiar to them. The most accurate maps and charts of our whole seaboard, and especially of its most defenceless portion, the Gulf of Mexico, are not only known, but regularly published in the French capital. Our revenue and materials for defence and attack are examined by them with intelligent care. All this is due to their own interests, by those who control the movements of their Government, and this knowledge would be acquired by them, whether peace or war was their object. Our debates, here, will give them no light on such subjects as these. The Senator may safely declare to the nation the truth, and the whole truth, in regard to them; and I unite with him in the declaration that the country is without the necessary and proper defences. Are your fortifications erected, armed, and manned? Is any one of all the entrances into your ports sufficiently defended? What guards have you provided for Pensacola, the Chesapeake, the Delaware, and the other portions of your coast? How is your little army disposed of? Look at Florida, now ravished by a band of Indians, and your Executive, either strangely ignorant of their strength and their intended incursions, or criminally sleeping over its duties and the demands which the security and protection of the inhabitants have upon the Government, waiting until desolation has covered a part of the Territory, and unable for weeks to bring rescue and relief. And yet talking largely about war with France.

Where is your navy? You have, in actual service, in the Mediterranean, two frigates, one sloop, and one schooner, the ship of the line being on her return. In the West Indies, one frigate and three sloops. In the Pacific, one frigate and two schooners. In the East Indies, one sloop and one schooner. On the coast of Brazil, one sloop; and one somewhere on or near the African coast. This is the whole force now employed in the protection of your commerce, which extends to every portion of the globe.

What is the condition of Pensacola and Key West? They are positions of indispensable necessity, in possession of which an enemy may seal hermetically the mouth of the Mississippi, destroy your whole commerce on the Gulf, watch your coast, and be prepared for a descent upon its most unprotected points, at any moment. Why have they been so much neglected? Why have not sufficient preparations been made for the repair and sustenance of your vessels at one or both those places? Has their importance escaped the notice of those whose views are directed to "the general defence and permanent security of the country?" It was long since predicted by one of our ablest and most valuable naval officers, that the first naval battle in which our country would be engaged, would, in all probability, be in the neighborhood of Key West. Yet what is its condition? Unprotected for the relief of our own navy; fitted for the rendezvous of an enemy. Every thing which relates to the efficiency of the right arm of your defence has been treated with cold indifference; and no man who is attached to it, as I am, can look at its condition without pain and mortification. Sir, cast your eyes where you will, we are unprepared for war. The Senator from Missouri is right.

And why are these things so? In whose hands have been the resources of the country for the last seven years? Who have governed and directed the energies and the treasure of the nation? Your wondrously energetic Executive! To whom, then, is due the security and the glory of our present position? To him and his friends. They have possessed the power to dispose of your treasury as they saw fit. They have so disposed of it. They have had the care of your interests, and they have never called, without success, for a dollar for the defence and security of the country. No obstacles have been thrown in the way by any effort of the opposition. Look back through the period of this administration, and see if you can find an estimate for your navy—your fortifications—for any object of defence, which has been defeated by the opposition. I know of none. The records of this administration exhibit none. They have had all for which they have asked. The appropriations have been made liberally. The last year, for naval purposes, more than $3,600,000; a larger sum than was ever before granted. The average of the appropriations for all such objects has been greater than at any former period. Why is it, then, that we are in our present condition? And who must answer for it? And what, during this period, have been their employments? They have been very busy. They have had employment enough in fighting the bank; talking about a specie currency; taking the treasury out of the hands of Congress; securing offices and jobs and deposits for partisans; sustaining a profligate administration of the Post Office, whose criminality is now admitted; weakening the popular respect for the Judiciary; and warring against the Senate. And now an Indian war takes them by surprise; and they are endeavoring to rush into condict with a powerful nation, and, by way of preparation for it, assail the Senate, as faithless to their duty. The charge is destitute of plausible justification, but may serve as a cover to their own delinquency.

Mr. President, it gives me no pleasure to refer to such a state of facts. We may be near to war. We shall have war if more prudent counsels do not prevail. You would have had it ere this, but for the Senate. If it come speedily, it will find us unprepared, but not unequal to its exigencies, in the end. France should make no miscalculations on that point. We shall suffer losses, defeats, perhaps, but there is power and energy enough to bear them, and to triumph still. This nation has been yet unconquered, and is unconquerable. With a free country, possessing such resources and such a population as ours, nothing but the folly and weakness of those who direct its means of defence can hazard ultimate success. On the principal theatre of conflict we may, we shall, probably, for a time, be defeated; but on our own shores a hostile foot cannot long remain, and our little neglected navy will do all that may be hoped from human exertion. Even in defeat its still unfurnished honor will be secure. While it carries the "flag of the ocean" and "the land," "flag of the free heart's only home," it will bear it aloft in triumph, or, if subdued, still unstained and undisgraced.

But, sir, is the criminality the less with those who, without the most ample cause, shall force us unprepared into such a conflict? Will the sufferings, the losses, the agonies of humanity be unfelt, because we may and shall escape final overthrow? No; execrations, deep and lasting, will be the lot of those upon whose heads shall rest that guilt.

We have been told that the Senate has been criminal on this subject, not in urging the nation into war, but in refusing to prepare for it; and an effort is made to hold us up for the rebuke of the nation. I did not anticipate the course of observation of the Senator upon this point, in discussing the merits of this resolution. I did not perceive the application of the argument to the subject. But I had expected that, at some period of the session, the Senate would, in some way, be put upon its defence. The official herald of the Executive had sounded to the charge; the trumpeters of the phalanx, reckless of the justice of the cause, had aped their leader, and the people were assured that the delinquency was in us. At the opening of the session, the President from his high station announced to the country and the world that we were guilty. It was not to be doubted that some members of the Senate might think as the Executive thought; and, if they did, that they would feel it their duty, in some form, to exhibit the indictment against us. It was as well, perhaps, that it should be done in supporting these resolutions as upon any other subject. I do not regret that the accusation has been made by the Executive, but I meet it, and deny its truth and justice; and beg, while I investigate the facts, that it may be recollected by Senators that this contest has not been sought by us. The investigation has been forced upon us. The country is, if possible, to be urged into war; and, if unprepared or unsuccessful, the blame is to be cast upon the Senate. It is one of the movements of the war upon this body, which has been waged with such unrelenting severity.

The President, in his message of the 7th of December last, says: "Much loss and inconvenience have been experienced in consequence of the failure of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, which passed one branch of the national Legislature at the last session, but was lost in the other. The failure was the more regretted, not only because it necessarily interrupted and delayed the progress of a system of national defence, projected immediately after the last war, and since steadily pursued, but also because it contained a contingent appropriation, inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive, in aid of this important object, and other branches of the national defence, some portions of which might have been usefully applied during the past year."

In the importance of the ordinary appropriations for this object I entirely concur. The system of defence demands support. But the allegation here made is, that the contingent appropriation was inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive, and that the bill containing it and the ordinary appropriations was lost in one House, (the Senate,) after it had passed the other, (the House of Representatives.) This allegation has been made by the first Magistrate of the nation, manifestly with a view to cast reproach upon this body; and, sir, it will be believed by thousands. It is made by him, and that is enough for blind credulity. They will inquire no further, and ask no other evidence. No effort made here can reach them, no demonstration exhibited here will meet their eyes. Their oracles will hide the truth from them. But, so far as depends upon me, I will repel the accusation; and if they choose to believe without evidence and against evidence, it shall not be from my silence. The Senate, upon that bill, did its duty, and its whole duty, fully, firmly, fearlessly; and, whenever justice shall be done, will be more than acquitted at the bar of its country.

Is the accusation true?

I ask, in the first place, if the three millions had been granted, ought it to have been expended? And would the situation of the country be now more safe? What is there which would have justified its expenditure previous to the meeting of Congress? War does not exist, cannot be declared but by Congress. To have forced us into it, without our approbation, would have been treason against our institutions and our rights. And if war had been commenced by France, what could the Executive have constitutionally done without assembling Congress? And what would three millions have been in such an emergency? You would have needed ten times that amount before the end of the year. It may be that the Executive thinks otherwise. The present head of the Committee of Ways and Means is reported to have assured the House, at the last session, that "he understood" that one million for the army, and two for the navy, "would be all that would be required by the executive branch of the Government." And he was probably sincere in thinking it enough. When a proposition is made to devote the interest of the nation in the Bank of the United States, amounting to seven millions, to national defence, in order that France might learn therefrom that we had resources for war, independent of taxation, what calculations may not be expected about the means necessary for preparation? (Globe, 2d March.) The passage of the ordinary appropriations for fortifications was important; the grant of the three millions for defence in war was absurd.

The first piece of evidence offered by the Senator from Missouri, by which the guilty purpose of the Senate is to be proved, and its designs, in the rejection of the item of three millions, exhibited, is the treatment bestowed upon the resolutions of that Senator at the last session. Those resolutions are declared to have had the same object as those now under discussion, and I beg the attention of the Senate to them, as they appear on page 167 of our journal. They are twelve in number, and relate to a multiplicity of objects: to the reduction of revenue on dutiable articles—the amount to be received from public lands—the payment of the stock in the bank—the probable expenditures of the Government—the state of the fortifications—expenditures upon them—expense of armories and arsenals—amount expended on naval objects. But they are all inquiries of the Executive for information only. They express no opinion, they declare no principle, they disclose no object. The mover did not explain his purpose, and the Senate was never called upon to express an opinion, or take a vote, in regard to them. When they were offered for consideration, Mr. Poindexter moved to lay them upon the table, and it was so ordered, without debate or vote, so far as I can discover. (Journal, p. 168.) The mover had it in his power to call for their consideration at any time, yet he did not do it. When and how, then, did the Senate express any opinion in regard to them? How was its guilty purpose to defeat the national defence proved by the treatment of them? How was the Senate to learn the object with which they were offered? Besides, these resolutions were not offered until the 16th day of February, within fifteen days of the end of the session, and were not to be answered until the commencement of the present session of Congress. By the argument, we were now to have information to guide upon a bill to be passed nine months ago. Yet such is a part of the evidence of our criminality, which the Senator spreads before the American people, unexplained and unaccompanied by the resolutions.

The next piece of evidence against the Senate is the loss of the item of $500,000. The history of this item has been fully stated by other members. It was moved in committee to add that sum to the appropriations, not by the Senator from Missouri, but by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON.] It was reported on the 18th February. (Jour. p. 172.) On suggestion by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, it was withdrawn by the Senator from Missouri himself. There was no debate, and no vote upon it. Is it not, then, somewhat extraordinary that this should be proclaimed as a rejection of the patriotic purposes of the Senator from Missouri, and of the evil intentions of the Senate? I leave others to draw their own inferences about such an allegation.

But these matters are unimportant, compared with the loss of the fortification bill. Such a bill is at all times of magnitude to the public interests, and it is deeply to be deplored if it should be lost (if such a result may be considered possible) from party servility on the one hand, or party hostility on the other. Let us examine the facts, to see what is the truth in relation to it. Its importance will justify some repetition. The President has charged this body, before their constituents and the world, with the loss of the bill; the charge has been repeated by a Senator in his place, and we are exhibited as unwilling to defend the country. Let the whole truth be told, and let the nation understand how their agents have acted, and do justice to their conduct. I need not quote the message at the opening of the last session, (Journal, page 13.) It details our difficulties with France, recommends reprisals as a measure of peace, against which France had no right to complain, and closes by submitting "to Congress to decide whether, after what has taken place, it will still await the further action of the French Chambers, or now adopt such provisional measures as it may deem necessary, and best adapted to protect the rights and maintain the honor of the country. Whatever that decision may be, it will be faithfully enforced by the Executive, as far as he is authorized so to do."

This message contains the opinions, recommendations, and action of the Executive; and it is to be remarked—

1. That it contains no recommendation of any appropriation for fortifications or arming. The documents accompanying it contain the ordinary and common appropriations for ordinary years, and nothing more.

2. It was not understood by the friends or opponents of the administration as recommending appropriations for a state other than that of peace. No Senator or Representative in his place suggested that such a construction was to be put upon it. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HURBARD] is entitled to the credit of the discovery, but it comes rather late. He did not make that discovery, so far as I know, during the last session. His own actions, as will appear presently, show a different opinion at that day.

3. The measure which it did recommend was reprisals, as a measure solely of peace. And these he recommends to be placed at his discretion, by the passage of a law "authorizing reprisals upon French property, in case provision shall not be made for the payment of the debt at the approaching session of the French Chambers." (Jour. p. 17.) If a law in this form had been passed, it is apparent that the power of peace and war would have been in the hands of the Executive. How he would have used it, may be learned by his "well-settled principle of the international code." He would have used his power, and we should have been at war. What would have availed the dictum of books? If French property had been forcibly seized to pay the debt or avenge our wrongs, it would have been repelled. War would have instantly raged. It would have been so, not only with France, but with every modern nation capable of resisting the assaults of an enemy. The seizure of the property of the citizens of France, because the Government would not pay its debt, neither would nor could have been regarded as a measure of peace. But, pretending so to consider it, the President would have used it, and thus Congress would have transferred to him the power of making war.

The recommendation, then, was of a legislative measure, with a view to peace. Although it might, in the hands of the Executive, have produced war, yet he urged it as a peace measure, and did not accompany it with proposals or estimates for increased appropriations.

Such as it was, it met the prompt attention of the Senate. And on the 15th January, (Jour. p. 94,) the Senate, by a vote perfectly unanimous, forty-five members voting, "Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at present, to adopt any legislative measure in regard to the state of affairs between the United States and France."

Thus, by the action of the Senate, all legislative action on the subject was, for the time, closed. And did any one then think that there was a call for war appropriations? Not one said it; and, if they thought it, they failed in their duty in not calling for them. As a measure of peace, no such appropriations could be required. If no legislative measure was expedient, they could not have been necessary.

Subsequent to this time, but before the three millions were proposed, the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House, which had moved very slowly, did report, and the same decision, as to legislative action, was made there, as I shall show by reference to the journal of that body.

Thus was the whole question of legislative action, on the recommendation of the Executive, put at rest by the concurrent and unanimous action of both Houses of Congress. Who could have dreamed that, after this, a "provisional appropriation" of three millions, to be put at the discretion of the Executive, would have been proposed? But so it was. The President had been thwarted by a unanimous vote of Congress, in getting possession of a discretionary power, which would have enabled him to create war if he chose; but discretion denied in one form may be sought and obtained in another. The power to use three millions of money, when he should think it necessary, would have answered an equally efficient purpose, and might have led to the gratification of the same wishes and designs. The history of the fortification bill will illustrate this remark. This history I understand very differently from the Senator from New Hampshire.

National Defence.

I propose to examine that history with some care, and shall be obliged to refer to persons by name, but I beg to be understood as doing it with no personal feeling or object in relation to them. They will be alluded to only because their names appear upon the public journals, and their action had influence upon the fate of the bill.

The first fact to which our attention is called is the amount of the estimates for fortifications, sent at the commencement of the session. In the message and these estimates are found the public, official views of the Executive and the Department of War. (See 1 Executive Documents, No. 5, page 39.) These estimates amount to $439,000 only. This was all that the Executive considered necessary, in the state of the country; and it is remarkable that it is very little more than one half the appropriations for many preceding years—not one half of those of the preceding year. During Mr. Adams's administration, the appropriations had been, in round numbers, these: 1826, $814,000; 1827, $505,000; 1828, $717,000; 1829, $1,013,000—an average, during the four years, of about $762,000. During the preceding years of General Jackson's administration, they had been, for 1830, $886,000; 1831, $716,000; 1832, $653,000; 1833, $831,000; and in 1834, 890,000—being an average of about $795,000. Yet, in the year 1835, when we are told war was approaching, the amount called for was only $439,000. Did the Executive anticipate war? Did he feel any peculiar necessity for hastening on the defences of the country? Then he did not do his duty in recommending sufficient appropriations. Or was it that a provisional, contingent grant, depending on Executive discretion, was already anticipated and devised?

The estimates were received on the 4th of December, (Journal, p. 35,) and on the 9th, (Journal, p. 51,) referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, of which the present Speaker of the House, a warm and confidential friend of the Executive, was the chairman. No report was made until the 2d of January, (Journal, p. 134,) twenty-three days after the reference, when the bill was reported, containing the precise items, and precise amount of the estimates, thus adding the opinion of the committee that the estimates were large enough. In the mean time, on the 27th of December, (Journal, p. 137,) a message had been received from the Executive respecting our affairs with France, and communicating documents in relation to them. Of this message 10,000 copies were ordered to be printed for distribution. The report of the bill several days after the message proves that, in the opinion of the friends of the Executive, at least of the committee, no change was made in our relations by that message—nothing calling for increased or contingent appropriations. This bill, thus reported on 2d January, one month after Congress was in session, and for not one half of the amount in the preceding year, and but little more than one half of the average of the ten preceding years, was “in accordance with the views of the Executive.” No public document, no known motive, explains the smallness of the sum, unless it be found in the subsequent history of the “contingent appropriation,” and the desire to place the money at executive discretion.

On the 14th of January the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole House, and on the 15th of January in the House itself. The amendments there offered to it were numerous. Mr. Everett moved to increase the appropriation for Castle island, &c., in Boston harbor, from $8,000 to $75,000. It was resisted by the friends of the Executive, and rejected by a vote of 120 to 87. (Journal, pp. 224-5.)

An amendment was moved by Mr. McKim to add $50,000 for Fort McHenry. It was rejected by 129 to 66.

For the repairs of Fort Marion, and the sea-wall at Pensacola, there was a motion to insert $40,000. The Delegate from Florida, whose intelligent and earnest attention to all the interests of his constituents is so well known, had, as early as the 10th of December, called the attention of the House, by resolution, to this object. (J. pp. 64, 230.) The Legislature of Florida had urged it; and so also had the citizens and corporation of St. Augustine. (Journal, p. 95.) It was important to the “defence and security” of that country; and, if the reports from that region be true, its value may at this moment perhaps be evidenced by the plunder and burning of a city, and the massacre of its inhabitants. Yet this appropriation was also rejected, by a vote of 115 to 67. (Journal, p. 227.)

These efforts to add to the bill having thus signally failed, Mr. Parker moved to strike out $30,000 for Throg's neck. The motion was rejected, 113 to 86. (Journal, p. 246.) And on the 21st of January (Journal, p. 251) the bill passed, precisely as it had been estimated for by the Executive and reported by the committee.

Now, Mr. President, by whom was the amount of that bill fixed? By the Executive and his friends. By whom was the increase refused? By the Executive and his friends. Who urged additional appropriations for “the defence and security” of the country? The opponents of the administration; the political friends of that majority of the Senate who are charged with defeating the appropriations. Look at the recorded yeas and nays upon these questions; read the reports of the debates, you will find an almost exact division of parties in respect to the questions. The names of Mr. Cambreleng, chairman of Foreign Relations; Mr. Polk, chairman of Ways and Means; Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Vanderpoel, and all that class of politicians; all except one of the members from my own State; and on all occasions, I believe, Mr. Henry Hubbard, then a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and at present a member of the Senate from New Hampshire, whose argument to prove our culpability we have heard.

I ask, was there danger on the 21st January? Why were not the specific appropriations for defence increased? Why resisted by the whole force of party? Was the Executive blind to the danger? Were his friends? If $439,000 were then enough for specific appropriation, where could be the necessity for a discretionary three millions? The course of the Senate, subsequently approved by the House, was known. Discretionary reprisals had been refused. Legislative action had been declared unnecessary. Shall those who thus acted now turn round and charge us with neglect?

The bill came to the Senate on the 21st January; on the 23d it was twice read and referred. (Journal, p. 117.) On the 16th February, (Journal, p. 168,) a period one day shorter than it had been in the hands of the House committee, it was reported, and the committee had agreed to the whole bill as it came from the House; and all the items of it were concurred in by the Senate without question. But the committee had done more; they had increased the sum for Castle island to $75,000, and added $100,000 for various objects of defence in Maryland.

On the 22d of February (Journal, p. 185) it was called up, out of its order, on motion of the chairman, Mr. Webster, with a view to expedite its passage. The items from the House and the additions by the committee were agreed to; and, upon motion, three items were added, $80,000 for Fort Delaware, $75,000 for repairs and armament of Fort Mifflin, below Philadelphia, and $100,000 for the armament of the fortifications. The first two of these items were for objects of great interest to the country. Fort Delaware was in ruins. Fort Mifflin inefficient—the approach to Philadelphia almost unobstructed. Yet they were neglected by the House. The other item of $100,000, for armament of fortifications, deserves attention. For many years that amount for that object had been uniformly put in the bill for the support of the army. On the 27th of January preceding, the usual army bill containing it had passed; and thus, by this amendment of the Senate, $200,000, instead of $100,000, were to be appropriated for this essential object. Is there in all this any evidence that the Senate was unwilling to provide for the national defence? It was far in advance of the House. They had sent to us $439,000; we added $421,000, for objects as important, for the security and defence of the country, as any which were contained in the bill.

On the 24th of February it was received by the House, and referred to the committee on the next day. (Journal, pp. 442, 451.) There were but five items to be examined. The committee did not take much time for that purpose. It was reported on the 27th, agreeing to some, and disagreeing to other of the amendments, (J. p. 464.) If anxious for the defence of the country, it might then have been promptly considered. It was in the hands of the friends of the administration, and they had a large and not unmanageable majority. Yet it was left until the 3d of March, the last day of the session, when the amendments of the Senate were agreed to, except the one which related to Fort Delaware. Upon this the Senate afterwards insisted, and the House receded. (Journal, pp. 506, 509.) There was, then, no longer any difference between the two Houses on any of the items of the bill. Each had added what its sense of duty called for; and the amount appropriated by it was $860,000—more than the average appropriation during the last ten years. The Senate had shown no reluctance to make the most ample appropriations, provided they were specific. They had rejected nothing offered by the House. They had induced the House to take an amount almost double that proposed by the Executive and his friends. The Houses had agreed on every item; the bill required only the forms of final passage.

Why, then, did it not pass? What circumstance, what contrivance, what accident, defeated it?

In answering this inquiry, I shall refer to the journals of the two Houses, and the regular and ordinary report of the proceedings of the last night of the session, as it appeared in the National Intelligencer of the 7th March.

When the House objected to one of the amendments, from which they afterwards receded, they sent the bill back to the Senate with a new section added to it, in the following words:

“And be it further enacted, That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance and increase of the navy; provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress.”

This amendment had been made by a vote of 109 to 77, (Journal, p. 509;) and it came to us about 8 o'clock of the last night, within three or four hours of the adjournment. We had then been in session three months; had discussed our relations with France; contemplated our position and our duties; had received the views of the Executive, and his estimates for the defence of the country, and not a suggestion had been made; no member of either House, no executive officer, had proposed such an appropriation. It broke upon us, in the last night, most suddenly and unexpectedly.

It created surprise, I believe, in every part of the Senate chamber, unless, indeed, some few may have been apprized of its approach. I do not deny that I was astonished and indignant, and, among others, gave utterance to my feelings. That a measure of such a description should have been reserved for such a moment, had too much the aspect of finesse and management.

It was rejected by the Senate, and sent back to the House, after a debate of about an hour, certainly of not more than an hour and a half.

The reasons for its rejection appeared to me then, and appear to me now, most ample and satisfactory.

It might have been objected to as irregular, unusual, and unparliamentary. It was made as an amendment to the amendment of the Senate. As such it must restrain, enlarge, or modify, the matter to be amended. It did neither. It was a distinct section, an independent and incoherent subject. The House might with equal propriety have added a new bill, or all the bills of the session.

But it was not resisted on this ground. There were other and higher considerations, vitally affecting the institutions of the country.

It was opposed to the spirit and meaning of the constitution, and the whole practice of the Government. The 7th item of the 9th section of the first article declares, “No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.” The term appropriation implies that the object must be specified. Without it is, the intent of the makers of that instrument is violated. A mere declaration that the Executive may draw out a million of dollars, and apply it to such objects as he shall think necessary for the public interests, is no compliance with the constitutional provision. Its design was to guard sedulously the public treasure—to secure its control to those who make the laws—to cut off executive discretion as to the objects on which it should be expended. The present President has said (message December, 1834) that “the palpable object of this provision is, to prevent the expenditure of the public money for any purpose whatsoever which shall not have been first approved by the representatives of the people and the States in Congress assembled. It vests the power of declaring for what purposes the public money shall be expended in the legislative department of the Government, to the exclusion of the executive and judicial,” &c. &c. He has also said, on another occasion, (message December, 1835,) “no one can be more deeply impressed than I am with the soundness of the doctrine which restrains and limits, by specific provisions, executive discretion, as far as it can be done consistently with the preservation of its constitutional character.” That it is “the duty of the Legislature to define, by clear and positive enactments, the nature and extent of the action which it belongs to the Executive to superintend,” &c. That the true rule of action “should make the President ever anxious to avoid the exercise of any discretionary authority which can be regulated by Congress. The biases which may operate upon him will not be so likely to extend to the representatives of the people in that body.”

It is true, these opinions were expressed on a different subject; but I commend them to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] as equally applicable to the bill whose character we are investigating. He seems to think it quite specific enough, and sufficiently restraining to executive discretion. But what are its terms? The three millions are to be expended, “in whole or in part,” as the Executive may see fit. On what objects? “The military and naval services, including fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy.” On what conditions? “If the expenditure be necessary for the defence of the country.” Who is to judge of the necessity? The President. Can appropriation be more indefinite—less specific? The amount short of three millions is absolutely in his discretion. The “necessity” rests on his judgment, not on the judgment of Congress. The selection of objects is in his choice. He might expend the whole in raising an army. He might increase the navy by men and ships, at his pleasure. He might devote the whole to one object, or divide it among several. It clothed him with unlimited discretion on all points save one, the amount of three millions. Such a bill is new in the practice of the Government—unknown at former periods and under former Executives. We have before passed through times of trial, and been engaged in actual war; yet such investment of power was not found expedient or necessary. It was reserved for the disciples of Mr. Jefferson, who claim to be the especial advocates of his principles—the democrats, par excellence—the only men who have passed pure and unhurt through the corruptions of the times of Madison, Monroe, and Adams, to devise and support this bill. I commend to their notice the language and opinions of Mr. Jefferson.

“In our care, too, of the public contributions intrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition; by disallowing all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money, and by bringing back to a single department all accountabilities for money, where the examinations may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform.”—Mr. Jefferson's Message, December 8, 1801.

This doctrine of Mr. J. is among the earliest of my political recollections; and, being just and true in itself, it has been invariably approved in theory and practice, from his day to ours. It was sound when he uttered it; it is sound still with all except those who have unhesitating confidence in the present Chief Magistrate. He will not, in their opinion, abuse this or any other trust confided to him. He requires no guards, no checks, no controlling regulations. He will not err in the judgment which he forms on any point. The biases which he assures us may operate upon the Executive are not to be regarded as extending to him. He is the exception to the salutary principle, which directs a jealous watchfulness towards those who are invested with power and authority. Mr. Jefferson must have been wrong when he said, “We have not found angels in the form of men to govern us.”

Mr. President, that section of the bill, as it came to us from the House, violated the spirit and purpose of the constitution, in reference to the disposition of the public treasure. It disregarded the principle which requires specific sums to be devoted to specific objects. It spurned the doctrine with whose soundness the President is so “deeply impressed,” that executive discretion should be restrained and limited by specific provisions. It omitted “the duty of the Legislature to define by clear and positive enactments the nature and extent of the action which it belongs to the Executive to superintend.” It presumed that “biases would not operate on him” in relation to the controversy with France, which would extend to the representatives of the people in Congress. It invested the Executive with the discretion which belongs to Congress, and to Congress only. It gave him the authority to “raise armies and provide a navy.” It surrendered the power of war into his hands. With such an appropriation he might have put the question of war beyond the reach of the representatives of the people. And judging from the temper manifested by him; his recommendation of reprisals; the language of his advocates; I believed then, and still believe, that, if it passed, we should have war. Even now we should be in war—a war in which human life would be poured out without stint, and the smoke of human blood ascend from the land and the water—a war to which no limits in time or in results could be set by human foresight—a war upon which, in the present state of Europe, other nations would not have looked with an indifferent neutrality, but, in all probability, convulsing the whole of Christendom. If war, and such a war, be necessary, (and it may become so, and I may yet be its advocate and supporter,) I implore that it may not be commenced by discretionary powers vested unnecessarily in one man, but be the result of the calm and constitutional decision of the representatives of the people, who are to bear its trials and face its perils.

In Rome, sir, they did, sometimes, create a dictator, whose duty it was to look to it, ne quid detrimenti res publica capiat; but they did it by no violation of their constitution and the principles of their Government, but when the enemy was at the gates of the Capitol, and despair found no other remedy.

Was there any necessity, at that time, of bestowing the slightest discretionary power upon the President? In what did the necessity consist? We were not in war. We were not threatened with war, unless upon our own action. France had made no movement to assail us. She had no cause of complaint which could justify her in commencing hostilities. She claimed no debt of us. She insisted on no violation of treaty upon our part. There was not a man in Congress, in the nation, in the world, that believed that she would first assail us, unless we did something which should induce her. This, whatever it might be, it was proper that Congress, not the Executive, should decide. And, as Congress was about to adjourn, nothing would or could constitutionally be done to occasion the commencement of hostilities. The pretences that we might have war, and that France might assail us before we met again, were utterly fallacious. The Executive might have so acted as to create speedy difficulties, but I had no desire to offer him inducements so to act. We had claims on France: she owed us money; we had a treaty which her honor and justice required her to keep; but the time and mode of enforcing the payment of that debt, and coercing the fulfilment of that treaty, was in our own power: and the constitution required, when force was to be applied, Congress should sit in judgment and decide it. There was no exigency which could demand that we should forget the ordinary guards which our Government provides. And even if our situation had been extreme, if the danger had impended, was there not time enough for Congress, during that session, to have defined the objects of expenditure, and specified the sums? If danger should have arisen subsequent to our adjournment, had not the Executive power to call together and consult those whom the constitution designates as the counsellors and guardians of the people's rights on such an occasion? I could not see or feel the necessity for vesting in the President a discretion in which his mode of dealing with constitutional questions had not given to me much confidence. I regarded that section as a dangerous encroachment upon the constitution, and the more dangerous because urged on under pretences of national defence and safety. It is by such encroachments that that instrument is to be beaten down and destroyed. I could not see its safest provisions hazarded unnecessarily. There is enough, day by day, and hour by hour, even in this hall, and much more out of it, to warn us that our only safety lies in guarding it; and that in it, and it alone, live the permanency of the Union and the hopes of freedom.

In addition to all these considerations, it was an appropriation not called for by the Executive—a voluntary bestowal of discretionary power unasked by him. It was resisted, at the moment, by the Senator from Tennessee on this ground. If the President thought it necessary, it was his high constitutional duty so to declare officially. "He shall, from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." (2 art. 3 sec.) When and where did he recommend this measure? In what communication is it to be found? Not in the message at the opening of the session; not in that of the 30th December. Was it, as the Senator from New Hampshire seems to suppose, in that of 27th February? (Jour. p. 194.) That message communicates the correspondence on the subject up to that date, with the information that Mr. Livingston had been instructed to quit France if an appropriation should not be made by the Chambers; and then adds, "the subject being now, in all its present aspects, before Congress, whose right it is to decide what measures are to be pursued on that event, I deem it unnecessary to make further recommendation, being confident that, on their part, every thing will be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country which the occasion requires."

He expressly avoids further recommendations. He relies on those which he had before made. He does not ask us to place a part of the treasury at his disposal. He does not tell us that it is necessary for us to arm. He gives no indication of a wish for such an appropriation. It is true he has since told us that this section of the bill was "in conformity with the wishes of the Executive;" but when, and where, and to whom, were those wishes made known? If communicated at all, it must have been by private confidence to favorite members. It must have been with the understanding that it should operate upon their votes, and not be publicly and officially promulgated. I do not accuse him of such a course. It would be a base shrinking from the responsibility of his high station, holding, on a great national question, in which the peace of his country was involved, a language official and unofficial; a language public and a language confidential. I do not credit the assertion that he deals with members of Congress in this mode. And yet, sir, if he did wish that appropriation to pass in that form, and his wish was known, it must have been by secret, confidential communications to members; for it is to be found in no public document, no official declaration of the Chief Magistrate.

So far as the Senate is concerned, his wish was not known. We were not only ignorant that such was his wish, but had no knowledge that the proposition would be made. The Senator from New Hampshire tells us that we were notified, and that Mr. Cambreleng had stated in the House, upon the vote respecting the French treaty, that he should move such an appropriation. I beg the Senator to reflect upon such an argument to sustain such a proposition. A member of the House states, in his place, in debate, that he will move a particular appropriation at some future time, and this is to be regarded as sufficient official information that the Senate will be called upon to make that appropriation! And we must be prepared to pass upon it, without estimate, without document of any kind, to examine and guide us. We have fallen on strange times, sir, and new notions multiply in relation to official duties and legislative obligations. But let us look at this warning given by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who is to be our oracle in these high matters. When was it made? On the 28th February. Where? In debate in the House. When was it published? I find it in the Globe of the 2d March, issued at a moment when it is not probable that half a dozen of even the most devoted students of that print were able to read its report of the proceedings of Congress. And yet this report, at such a time and under such circumstances, is offered as evidence that the Senate ought to have known and been prepared for this most extraordinary proposition. But it is still more unfortunate for the reasoning of the Senator, that the proposition of which Mr. Cambreleng gave notice was not that which is contained in the section which we rejected. It was, in substance, that "he should move an amendment to the fortification bill, when it returned from the Senate, of one million for the army, and two millions for the navy, in case it should be necessary before the next meeting of Congress. This, he understood, would be all that would be required by the executive branch of the Government." Now, it is obvious to remark on this report: 1. That the bill was not then in the Senate; it had been returned to the House, referred to and reported on by the committee. (Journal, pp. 451, 464, 506.) 2. That his notice differs widely in substance from the proposition subsequently made. 3. That he understood that the Executive would require no more. How did he understand it? He ought to have given to other members the light which he had on the subject. Is it to be understood that as chairman, or in any other than a public official capacity, he receives directions from the Executive what amount of public money he is to put at his disposal? If he do, he may as well adopt Antony's profession of faith:

"I shall remember,
When Cæsar says, do this, it is performed."

As little benefit by way of justification can be found for this appropriation in the vote of the House respecting the treaty. The messages of the 7th and 30th December had been before the Committee on Foreign Relations up to the 27th February, when a report was made, accompanied by three resolutions. (Journal, p. 466.) On the 2d of March the House considered them, in conjunction with three resolutions offered by Mr. Adams, as amendments thereto. (Journal, p. 496.)

The first resolution of the committee was, "That it would be incompatible with the rights and honor of the United States further to negotiate in relation to the treaty entered into by France on the 4th July, 1831, and that this House will insist upon its execution as ratified by both Governments." The amendment was, "That the rights of the citizens of the United States to indemnity from the Government of France, stipulated by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 4th July, 1831, ought, in no event, to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by any consent or acquiescence of the Government of the United States;" and was subsequently, after debate, modified by Mr. Adams, and was in these words: "Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the treaty with France of the 4th July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on."

After various efforts at amendment and change, it passed unanimously. (Journal, p. 500.) The other amendments offered by Mr. A. were then withdrawn by him. The second resolution of the committee was in these words: "Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to commercial restrictions or to reprisals on the commerce of France," and passed unanimously: thus concurring with the unanimous vote of the Senate in regard to the recommendation of the Executive. The remaining resolution was in these words: "Resolved, That contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France;" and this resolution was, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, ordered to lie on the table. (Journal, p. 501.) It was the 2d

March; the order to lie on the table was, under the circumstances, equal to rejection or withdrawal; for there could be no hope of again calling it up, discussing and deciding it. Here, then, on the very day before this extraordinary section was introduced into the bill, while a resolution which declared contingent preparation to be proper was before the House, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on his own motion, disposed of it, and declined taking the sense of the House upon it. Could it have been anticipated, after that, that Congress would be called upon to place three millions of money in the hands of the Executive, without specification of objects? Did the committee expect war? Did they think France would assail us? Did they believe legislation necessary? Why, then, was not the sense of the House taken upon the question? The Senate had long before unanimously declared that no legislative action was at this time necessary. The House had just before unanimously relieved the committee from all further consideration of the only recommendations made by the Executive: thus declaring those recommendations improper, or, at least, the measures proposed unnecessary. And now the resolution for contingent preparation is laid on the table by the assent of the friends of the Executive. Sir, I ask again, did they expect war? No, sir, they knew better. The appropriation was not called for by anticipation of an attack from France. If it was, the friends of the Executive, the House of Representatives, were greatly wanting in their duty to the country.

Look at the only resolution which they did pass. It declares "that the treaty should be maintained, and its execution insisted on." And who in this country has ever held a different language? But how insisted on? By immediate war? Was that the meaning of the House? Was it a war measure? Then, more guilty legislation cannot be imagined. Go to war with peace appropriations, without one preparatory measure by Congress? The House meant no such thing. To suppose that they did would be an impeachment of something more than their intelligence. They left the question of further negotiation entirely open by the rejection of the resolution which declared it incompatible with our rights and honor, and they adopted one which merely declared that the treaty ought to be maintained. And had France then, or has she yet, declared that she did not consider it binding on her, and that she would not maintain it? On the contrary, she has always admitted its validity, and acknowledged that the debt was due to us. She has delayed, and delayed improperly, upon insufficient reasons, to comply with her obligations under it; but the resolution of the House asserted no fact which France has controverted. I do not intend to inquire, on this occasion, into the sufficiency of the reasons urged by her. It is enough, for the present, to say that the act of the House did not render war necessary; that it was not anticipated as speedily, if at all, to arise; and that those who favored this contingent appropriation can find in this resolution no apology for it. The chairman of the committee, the person who moved this section, is reported to have said in debate, as late as the 28th of February, "If we are to have peace, the less said, the better. If war, the next Congress would have enough to say on that great question." The question of war, if decided at all, was, in his opinion, to be decided by another Congress. And, out of the House, all parties concurred in the hope and belief that it would be avoided. It was but four or five days previous that the official paper, which is regarded, even by our foreign ministers, as expressing opinions worthy of all confidence, contained the following editorial remarks. (Globe of 24th February.)

"From the extracts given in this day's paper from the foreign journals, and especially the remarks of the French minister on the introduction of the law to provide for the treaty, it will be seen that there is now the fairest prospect of a speedy and happy adjustment of our difficulties with France," &c.

"Mr. Livingston will not, it appears, apply for his passports, but will await the action of the Chambers in relation to the law proposed by the ministry."

It then gives an extract of a letter of congratulation on the prospects which the late news has opened on the country, which, in conclusion, says: "The opposition seem confounded this morning, and even the most desperate in their ranks say the President has had the good fortune to take the right course in this matter. Chance has had no hand in it, my friend; it is parcel of his great, fair, and clear course." "We believe all the difficulties in the matter have grown out of the intrigues of some one on our own side of the Atlantic," &c.

The extract administers the usual dose of flattery which parasites are ever ready to bestow on the hand that distributes honors and profits, but it conveyed the strong impression which then prevailed. And war was not expected here or elsewhere, at least not so expected as to justify large discretionary appropriations. To have gone to war, then, would have been most absurd; nothing could, indeed, have been more absurd than the position which we should have occupied. It was justly remarked about that time, "To go to war now would be like two boys standing before each other with clenched fists, and each daring the other to strike. If we go to war with France on this subject, it would all end in an expenditure of millions upon millions of treasure, and oceans of blood, and we should then be asking each other who struck the first blow."

Mr. President, that section of the bill, thus introduced, was neither necessary nor expedient, to be justified by no facts, hostile to every correct principle of legislation, and the majority of the Senate, by a vote of 29 to 19, rejected it. (Journal, page 232.) The names are recorded; and, while the minority doubtless acted upon a proper sense of their duty, the majority will not, I feel assured, have cause to condemn themselves. For myself, I concurred most heartily on the disagreement to the section, and cheerfully put myself upon the principles involved, and leave my act to the award of the future.

But, Mr. President, I ask attention while I proceed still further with the history of the bill.

It returned to the House, as is, I believe, agreed on all hands, before ten o'clock. Mr. Gholson then moved that the House recede from their amendment, and urged it strongly upon them. (Journal, p. 516.) It was opposed, sir, and the reported language is worthy of observation. Mr. Cambreleng, the chairman of the committee, and the person who moved the section, "hoped that the House would not recede. If the Senate had chosen to take the responsibility of defeating the appropriation, it might remain with them; he would take no part of it." And Mr. Bynum sustained him. Now, this was long before twelve o'clock. It was upon the first disagreement. It was while there was a quorum, for the vote against receding was 110 to 87. Why, at this early hour, with a full attendance of members, was the declaration made that "the responsibility of defeating the appropriation" was upon the Senate? Why did the mover refuse to take any part in it? Was the appropriation necessary to the defence of the country, and was it not worth while to make an effort to save it? Was an enemy approaching our shores, and was it more desirable to cast the responsibility on the Senate than to defend the country.

The House, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, determined to insist upon the section, and so informed the Senate; but they asked no conference. It was their amendment; they had voted to insist; and it was proper, if they desired to avoid difficulty, and secure its passage, to ask a conference respecting it. The Senate had previously done so, that very night, on an amendment of theirs to the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government. The conference was had, and the bill passed. (Journal, pp. 512, 515.) But the House, upon this bill, did not choose to take this course. They chose rather to put it in jeopardy. The Senate adhered to their decision, by a vote of 29 to 17, (Journal, p. 235,) and the bill was speedily returned. This course of the Senate was perfectly parliamentary and correct, as is known to Senators, and as I shall presently have cause to explain.

When the bill again came to the House, they had another opportunity of asking a conference, and saving their amendment, and the whole bill, if there could be a compromise made. They did not seize the opportunity. Other counsels prevailed. The mover of the section now moved to adhere to it. This would have defeated the bill irretrievably. No subsequent movement could have saved it. Why, then, was the motion made? Was it resolved upon that the whole bill, with all its appropriations, should be lost, because the Senate had not consented to put three millions of dollars at the disposal of the President? There was yet time enough. It was not twelve o'clock, and there was a quorum. Yet, if this motion had prevailed, the bill would have been lost with time and quorum both. The course taken exhibited a fixed purpose that no appropriation should be made for any of the fortifications, unless this large sum was granted, and this most improper and unconstitutional demonstration of confidence was manifested towards the President. Was it deemed necessary, as an offset against the unanimous rejection of his advice, and the refusal to give him the power of making reprisals?

Mr. Mercer moved that the House recede. This would have ended the controversy, and saved the appropriations for fortification, amounting to $860,000. And how, sir, was this motion met? Mr. Polk, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, urged that the motion to adhere was first in order, and to be first put. And, in no very measured language towards the Senate, Mr. Lytle sustained him; thus aiding the movement of Mr. Cambreleng to adhere, defeat the whole bill, and try to throw the blame upon the Senate.

The Speaker (then Mr. Bell) decided that the question on receding must be first taken. It was put, and rejected by 107 to 88. (Journal, p. 519.)

Upon both of the motions to recede the votes were recorded. It was an almost precise division of parties. Those who are called opponents of the administration voted so as to save the bill, but lose the contingent section. Its friends voted to save the grant of money to the Executive, at the hazard of the whole bill. In this stage of these extraordinary proceedings, Mr. Hubbard (and he deserves thanks for breaking rank) moved for a conference. (Journal, p. 519.) It was asked, and promptly agreed to by the Senate, although they had voted to adhere to their rejection of the section. (Journal, p. 237.) If they had desired to defeat the bill, why did they waive their vote to adhere; and agree to the conference? They might have refused it, and been perfectly justified by parliamentary rule and propriety. Even the desire to throw the responsibility on the Senate could not have put them in the wrong. There is potent authority on this point in the journals of this body. In January, 1826, the two Houses had before them a very important measure—a judiciary bill, having the same object as that which has recently passed the Senate, to extend the circuit court system to all the States. The bill from the House was considered, debated on several days, amended, and sent back. The House voted not to accept a part of the amendments, and returned it to the Senate. The Senate, on the motion of Mr. Van Buren, then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, adhered to their amendments. The House asked a conference. The message asking the conference was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and the same chairman made a report refusing the conference. That report is worthy of the respectful consideration of all those who now condemn the Senate. It sustains the positions which I have advanced in defence of the course of the Senate on this occasion. It justifies the vote to adhere, without the vote to insist. It places the duty of calling for the conference on the House which first insists. It refuses a conference after the House had asked it, because it was not the intention of the Senate to recede, and a conference was therefore unnecessary. The Senate sustained the report, by 24 to 13; and among the majority are found the names of Messrs. Van Buren, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Dickerson, Eaton, Hayne, Rowan, Tazewell, White, Woodbury. The bill was lost by this decision. The report and vote may be found in vol. 16 of Senate Journal, pages 306–312.

If this be correct parliamentary doctrine, and our opponents will not deny it, and if the Senate had desired to defeat this bill, why did we not refuse the conference? We did not. We were resolved to resist the three millions, but we sought earnestly the passage of the bill, and waived every rule of practice, in such cases, to accomplish it. Yet we are now charged with the defeat of the bill. The conferees, on the part of the House, were Messrs. Cambreleng, Hubbard, and Lewis; on the part of the Senate, Messrs. Webster, Frelinghuysen, and Wright. They agreed; the conferees of the Senate unanimously, and the majority of those of the House. It was at the time understood that they also were unanimous.

It seems to have been since denied that Mr. Cambreleng did agree to the report; and the Senator from New Hampshire will not say that he did. It is quite possible that he did not. He had desired to adhere to the amendment, which would have destroyed the bill. He had manifested his anxiety to throw the blame on the Senate; and he may have feared the defeat of his object if the conferees agreed upon a reasonable report to the two Houses. He had made a provision which reposed all confidence and power in the President, and he may have been unwilling that the offering should be withdrawn. But it is of little importance. The conferees did agree, and those of the Senate reported. (Journal, p. 237.) In lieu of the section of three millions, they proposed—

“As an additional appropriation for the repair and equipment of the ships of war of the United States, five hundred thousand dollars.”

When this report was made, the Senate were prepared to approve it. The committee, of which the Senator from New York was one, had agreed to it, and it would have passed unanimously. Sir, the whole Senate was ready to pass it. There was no fault in that respect on either side of this body. The censure must rest elsewhere.

The Senator from New Hampshire seems to find no difference between this proposition and the section, except in the amount. Has he looked at them? The one is without specification, leaving the whole expenditure, as to objects, to the Executive. The other defines the objects for which the money is appropriated. It complies with our legislative duty. It is constitutional and proper. Mr. President, ought not this report to have been satisfactory, and to have passed? It provided for the very objects which were most important in case of difficulty—our fortifications and navy; for the only objects that could have required attention before it would have been the duty of the Executive to assemble Congress, and it provided most amply for them. Observe the amounts. There had been appropriated for arming the fortifications, in the army bill, $100,000; in this bill, by a previous amendment of the Senate, $100,000 more; and by this conference, $300,000. In all, $500,000, for arming them in one year. Was it not ample? Could more have been used faithfully and economically? Not a dollar.

So as to the navy. The bill for its support contained appropriations to the amount of more than $3,680,000, in which were $974,000 for repairs of vessels in ordinary, and the repairs and wear and tear of vessels in commission. Add to this sum the half million proposed by the conferees, and we have $1,474,000 for the repairs and equipment of vessels of war. Was it not ample for that object, until Congress would meet or be called together? I am compelled to believe that it was not the amount which was insufficient. It was the restriction imposed. It was a specific appropriation. It was not left to the discretion of the Executive, and his friends would not have it. They preferred losing the whole bill to denying this expression of confidence in the Chief. Then, sir, let them answer for the loss; but let not them and the President unjustifiably charge the Senate with a failure of duty. The Senate did its duty, and its whole duty, to the country, faithfully. Examine this bill as it stood after the conference. It came to us with $439,000, all that the President and the Departments asked. We added $421,000, and by the conference we agreed to add $800,000 more—making in all $1,660,000, almost four times the estimates of the Executive, as much as could with propriety be devoted to the object. It came with a small specific appropriation, was increased in the House by seven times the amount, to be used at executive discretion. The moment that three times the amount is agreed to by the Senate, but the executive discretion denied, it is refused, rejected, and the Senate assailed.

I proceed. Why was this agreement of the conferees not received by the House, and the bill passed? The chairman of the managers did not report the agreement. The House did not agree to it. They had the papers, and the Senate were thus compelled to see the destruction of the bill, without the power to avoid it. They kept the papers, and we could take no vote upon it. But we did not rest in silence under this extraordinary, may I not say, without offence, this most unjustifiable procedure. If we had done nothing more, we should have been faultless in the matter. But after waiting until general alarm was felt lest it was the intention of the House to destroy the bill, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] moved that we should send a message reminding the House of the subject. (Journal, p. 239.) It was new in practice. Such a message, so far as I can learn, had never before been sent by one House to the other, since the establishment of the Government. But the parliamentary practice was consulted. I recollect it well, for I examined it with that Senator. In Jefferson's Manual, our guide on subjects of this kind, it is stated to be a proper message, (page 191.) "When a bill is sent by one House to the other, and is neglected, they may send a message to remind them of it." (3 Hats. 25; 5 Gray, 154.)

The message was sent. The entry is in these words: "Resolved, That a message be sent to the honorable the House of Representatives, respectfully to remind the House of the report of the committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill respecting the fortifications of the United States." Thus, sir, the Senate, now charged with neglect of duty, with defeating the bill, with unwillingness to defend the country, departed from ordinary practice; adopted a new but parliamentary proceeding to urge the House to attend to the passage of the bill. And thus, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who is so roundly and incautiously accused by the Senators from New Hampshire and Georgia, put in requisition his best exertions not only to do his own duty, but to press others to the discharge of theirs. The facts cannot have been well remembered by the Senators. The accusation has not been well considered. I am glad to perceive that that Senator is not, at this moment, in his seat; for it permits me to say, without indelicacy towards him, that, in the debate upon the question, and in the whole course of our action upon the bill, as upon every other where the constitution and the interests of his country are involved, he brought into exercise the best powers of his well-disciplined intelligence and pure patriotism.

Mr. President, such having been the conduct of the Senate, I repeat the inquiry, why was that bill lost, upon every item of which, except one, the two Houses had agreed, and upon that one the managers of the conference between them had agreed? The answer will be found in the history of that night's proceedings in the House of Representatives; proceedings which I take no pleasure in examining. But, sir, I, and other members of the Senate, have been accused from high places, and it is our duty to make our defence, and to make it fully. The President and the Senator from Missouri have both pronounced us guilty, and before hearing, too. They must have forgotten their bitter complaints against us, when we ventured, on a certain occasion, to express our opinions that the Executive had transcended his constitutional and legal rights. But enough of that for the present. The topic of expunging will come in due time. Let us look at the reasons assigned for the House not acting on the bill; and, while we do it, let us not forget the declaration made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, long before twelve o'clock, when the disagreement of the Senate was first announced, that they had taken the responsibility of defeating the bill.

These reasons are, first. That it was past twelve o'clock when the managers of the conference returned to the House; and, second. There was not a quorum.

It may possibly have been past twelve o'clock; but neither my recollection, nor the facts as they have been stated by others, and are recorded on the journals, permit me to believe it.

The Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HOBBS,] who was one of the managers on the part of the House, has stated to us that, after the conferees had met, Mr. Webster looked at his watch, and said that it was near twelve o'clock, or wanted a few minutes of twelve, and hastened the conference. Then, first, Mr. Webster did not seek delay, nor desire to defeat the bill. And then, also, second. It was not twelve o'clock when the conferees did meet. Now, it appears from our journal, and is true in fact, that the conferees were together but a few minutes; for, in that hurrying part of the session, when not a moment was lost, there were only two things done in the Senate before the return and report of the conferees; one, receiving a short message from the House, the other, a motion, of course, to discharge a committee. (Journal, p. 237.) Was it then past twelve when the conferees agreed?

The same Senator again states to us, that when the Cumberland road bill passed, Mr. Gilmer refused to vote, and said it was past twelve o'clock. Then the Cumberland road bill passed after the conference, if the statement of Mr. Gilmer was correct.

[SENATE.]

The same Senator also stated that Mr. Cambreleng and himself both voted on that bill, and the journal (page 522,) confirms him. Then, if the measure suited, there were no scruples about the hour; and, I ask, why not report the result of the conference as well as vote on the Cumberland road bill? I fear, sir, we must search for other reasons.

But suppose, sir, it had been past twelve o'clock, did that fact justify the managers of the House in refusing to make a report? They had been constituted by a solemn joint act of the two bodies, to confer upon a great public measure. In their action both Houses were concerned, and both had a right to demand that they should be faithful, and discharge their duty. The refusal of those of the House to make report was a wrong done to the Senate, highly disrespectful to it as well as to the House. Suppose the House had been anxious to pass this bill, and the chairman of the managers (Mr. Webster) had returned to the Senate chamber and refused to report? I beg his pardon for even making such a supposition; but if he had been capable of doing it, and had done it, what would have been said in the House? What commotion? What fiery denunciation? What anathemas from the Executive in executive messages? Sir, he would have been charged with being already in the pay of the enemy, not only willing to disregard the constitution and the safety and defence of the country, but ready to join their ranks, and mingle the blood of his countrymen with the smoking ruins of the Capitol. But the act was performed by others, whose devotion to party-chieftainism covers every act with approbation.

Mr. President, I would inquire by what authority a manager of either House assumes to himself the right to decide for that House whether he shall make report or not? takes away, of his own mere pleasure, the power of the body to act and to decide upon any question? It is not my business to guard the respect which any House of Representatives owes to itself; but, as a member of this body, I have a right to express my conviction that no manager here will ever feel the inclination, or, if he does, will ever venture thus to trifle with this body, until it shall have become the registering council of executive edicts.

But, sir, the Senator from New Hampshire has taken some pains to prove that there was no quorum in the House, and therefore that the House could not act upon the measure. Does not the Senator perceive that there being no quorum in the House was no fault of the Senate? It has no control over the quorums of that body. It had created no delay. It had, in the first instance, debated the amendment less than an hour and a half, not more than one third of the time consumed in the Senator's argument, nor, I begin to fear, more than that proportion of the time of the Senate which I shall be compelled to consume. And yet it was a new proposition, of great importance in amount of money, of uncommon magnitude, from the principles involved. When it returned again from the House, it was detained only long enough for the Senator from Massachusetts to discharge his duty by making the motion to adhere, and by the calling of the yeas and nays. (Jour. p. 235.) When the conference was asked, it was instantly granted, and without debate. (Jour. p. 236.) If, then, it was thrown beyond the hour when there was a quorum, the censure cannot fall here.

But let us look at the journals and reported proceedings upon this subject; they are full of interesting matter. I find (page 522) that on the Cumberland road bill there were ninety-four yeas, eighty nays, one hundred and seventy-four in all, and fifty-two more than a quorum of that body! If, from the facts before stated, this bill passed after the conference, then there were fifty-two more than a quorum when the conferees returned to the House, for they voted upon it. If it passed before the conference, it must have been immediately preceding it. And I inquire, where were these fifty-two when the conferees returned? How came it that they escaped so suddenly? Who were they? By what impulse were they moved? The history of the subsequent proceedings seems to give an explanation of this singular fact.

After the vote on the Cumberland road bill, two reports, of course, were made, and the Speaker signed a bill. Mr. Mann said the functions of the House had ceased; it was twelve o'clock. And then Mr. Jarvis moved a resolution that, the hour having arrived when the term for which this House was elected has expired, we do now adjourn.

Mr. Polk demanded the consideration of the question. The Speaker decided the resolution not to be in order; and Mr. Jones moved an adjournment. This motion was resisted by Mr. Wardwell, Mr. Evans, and Mr. J. Q. Adams, and was decided in the negative. (Jour. p. 523.) Now, sir, why this motion? Had the managers returned, or had they not? Was it, or was it not, in accordance with the previously declared determination, to throw the responsibility of losing the bill upon the Senate? Or did it arise from a certain fact which occurred about the time of the conference, and which left the party no other mode of escape?

The House then took up the resolution to pay Mr. Letcher as a member of Congress; and, after debate, it was lost, 113 voting. And yet, of those not voting, several did appear in the subsequent proceedings of the House; and among them Mr. Jarvis, Mr. Beardsley, Mr. Polk, Mr. Francis O. J. Smith. The Senator from New Hampshire was also among the missing, and so continued, so far as voting was concerned, until the adjournment. I cannot divide the 113 who voted into parties and assign the proper place to each of those who voted, and those whose absence or refusal to vote prevented the quorum, but no one can look at the names without perceiving that the opponents of the administration were there ready to discharge their duty to the country, in transacting the business before them; and that the friends of the administration prevented the public service from being performed, by their desertion of the House, or their refusal to vote. And shall they now turn round, and charge upon their opponents the loss of any public measure? Do they suppose that all memory of facts and all inspection of records has been lost? Or do they rely upon the credulity of the people to believe any and every accusation against their opponents, especially when it is made to bear upon the Senate, and is endorsed by the head of the party?

There was no quorum—none willing to let the business proceed. Was there not a quorum really there? It wanted but a few votes to make it; and if those who appear in the subsequent proceedings had answered, I cannot doubt that it would have been found.

But if no quorum to attend to this bill, how could the House proceed in the transaction of other business? Yet it did so. Are their proceedings invalid? Has that branch of the Legislature permitted the approval and promulgation of laws to bind the citizens of the United States when they knew that they had no constitutional authority? I do not charge this grievous offence upon them; the zeal to fasten criminality here may bring them into that condition of guilt. After this no-quorum vote, the Committee on Enrolled Bills reported; the House received from the President seventy-five laws which he had approved, and by message communicated them to the Senate, (Jour. p. 239;) received a report respecting a national foundry for ordnance, heard it read, and resolved that the Secretary of War perform certain duties in regard to it; the Speaker laid before them nine important communications from four of the Departments and one of the bureaux, and from the Postmaster General. On a motion to print the last, there was a debate had and question taken. They also received two messages from the Senate: one respecting the conference, and one with ten bills which the President had approved. Were all these proceedings irregular, void? They appear in the journal, and the papers mentioned are a part of your public official document—the record of the legislative history of your country; and yet, sir, we are told there was no quorum, no House of Representatives in existence.

After the vote on Mr. Letcher's case, and after the message with the bills from the President, but before the message from the Senate respecting the conference, and the other proceedings to which I have alluded, Mr. Jarvis made another motion to adjourn, (Journal, p. 527;) it was debated; on the vote, Mr. Beardsley declined to answer, because it was past 12 o'clock; 118 members answered. There is again a like division of votes as that before alluded to, and, what is not a little inexplicable, Mr. Cambreleng, who would not report the result of the conference because the House had no power to receive it, voted against that House adjourning. (Journal, p. 528.)

The arrival of the message from the Senate to expedite the fortification bill is another remarkable point in the progress of these strange proceedings. When it was received, silence on the part of the managers of the House was no longer practicable. They had then been in their seats a long time, had seen the House proceed with its business, and been silent, neglecting the discharge of their important duty. When the message had been read, Mr. Cambreleng, the chairman, whose duty it had been and still was to make the report, declined, "on the ground that, from the vote on the resolution granting compensation to Robert P. Letcher, which vote was decided at the time the committee returned into the House from the conference, it was ascertained that a quorum was not present; and, further, that he declined to make the said report, on the ground that the constitutional term for which this House had been chosen had expired." (Journal, p. 540.) There it is, Mr. President, in those very words, a part of the journal of the House of Representatives of the United States, published under its authority. When or how that entry came there I know not, and have no power to investigate. But I should like to know whether it was the creation of the Clerk of that body, without suggestion from any quarter, and whether the Speaker saw and approved it before it was entered on the permanent journals. Let its paternity be what it may, it stands without a rival. "None but itself can be its parallel."

But, sir, let it stand there, and let us inquire what is its influence on the question which we are discussing. The chairman of the managers would not report, because there was not a quorum on the vote respecting Mr. Letcher's pay, "which vote was decided at the time the committee returned into the House from the conference." Turn back six pages, to the vote upon that question, and you will find Mr. Cambreleng and Mr. Lewis, two of the managers, voting upon it, this being one of the occasions on which Mr. Hubbard was missing. Was that question, then, decided when they returned? The present House ought to set itself diligently to work to correct the journals of the late House. In examining this contradiction, I beg Senators to recollect the suggestions which I have previously made in regard to the vote upon the Cumberland road bill, and compare the facts alluded to with this statement, and also to test the value of this journalized excuse, by the rights of a chairman to withhold a report from the House by which he was appointed.

I beg also to quote a passage from a publication with the signature of Mr. Cambreleng, dated 7th March, and which appeared in the National Intelligencer of the 9th March. In that publication he says:

"The only error in the following paragraph is the omission of Mr. Hubbard's name, who was one of the committee."

"The motion to ask a conference was agreed to, and Messrs. Cambreleng and Lewis were appointed to the committee of conference on the part of the House."

"The committee immediately left the House, and proceeded to one of the chambers of the Senate," &c.

The extract which he makes is taken from the report of the proceedings of the House. Now, he here declares that the committee immediately left the House after their appointment. Examine the journal, and you will find (pages 519, 520, 521) that, after this committee was appointed, and before the Cumberland road bill was taken up, the House considered the amendments to the bill respecting the supply of the army, &c., concurred in them, and ordered the Clerk to inform the Senate, and received two reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, containing nearly fifty bills, the very titles of which would consume some time in reading; after this, they took up the bill respecting the Cumberland road, debated it, had the previous question demanded, ordered, voted, and then debated the question on the final passage. After all this, the vote was taken, and the names of Mr. Cambreleng and Mr. Hubbard appear upon that vote. If, then, the managers left the room immediately after their appointment, and yet were in the House when this vote was taken, is it not perfectly clear that the Cumberland road bill must have passed after the conference was over? There was time enough, and more, while the House was engaged in the proceedings and debate to which I have referred, for the committee to have met and agreed, and the conferees returned to their places. Either the recollection of the chairman, or the journal, needs correction. In weighing the evidence on this point, Senators will have no hesitation in believing that the conference was over when the Cumberland road bill passed. And if so, the question as to the hour of the night is put at rest. Either the conference and the agreement was before twelve o'clock, or the hour did not operate on the consciences of the managers and the President, for the former voted upon, and the latter approved and signed, that bill. There is another fact in relation to the journal of this part of the proceedings of the House which bears upon this question of the quorum and the House, to which I ask the attention of Senators. The journal (page 523) states that the previous question was called in the debate about the payment of Mr. Letcher, "and passed in the affirmative." But it does not state by what vote. Why this omission? Who will explain it? A reference to the report in the National Intelligencer of the 7th March gives this fact, that upon that vote there were 69 yeas, 65 nays, 134 members present and voting. A quorum, Mr. President, is found long after the Cumberland road bill passed—a quorum after twelve o'clock, by the insisting of our adversaries—a quorum willing to vote when the question suited them. Where were they after this? Why was not the report made while they were there?

But let us return to the statement of the chairman as it is journalized. He says, "the constitutional term for which this House had been chosen had expired." And who, sir, decides this grave question? The House itself? No. But the chairman of the managers. And where did he find his authority to decide it? Had he the power of that body in his hands? Would it not have been quite as proper and respectful for him to have made his report, and left the settlement of its own existence and powers to the House itself, voting upon the question as his conscience dictated? But this was hazardous. If the report had been made, it might so have happened that the House would have agreed to it; the bill might not have been lost—it might have been carried to the President; and the blame of its defeat might have fallen, not upon the Senate, but upon another portion of the Government. It was better, sir, to try the chance of throwing it upon the Senate. "The constitutional term of the House had expired." And where did this manager find his legal or constitutional doctrine on this point? In what book or creed of politics did he learn that the term of Congress expires at twelve o'clock at night? Is there any declaration in the constitution to that effect? None. Is there any law establishing the commencement and termination of Congress at that hour? None. Is there any resolution or act of Congress itself? Not one. Then where did he learn it? Was it from practice? More than one half, nay, more than two thirds, of all the Congresses under this Government have continued to sit, to transact business, to pass laws, after that hour. It has been done by all parties and under all administrations. He had, in truth, no competent authority for his assumption. The House had no excuse for neglecting its duty. It had constitutional power to act. The true doctrine is that mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts. The year and term end at the close of the last day's sitting. This is the judicial understanding on this point. Courts have so decided in relation to their own powers, and the extreme penalties of the law have been inflicted in conformity with it.

But the chairman of the managers, and those who acted with him, had one authority, whose controlling power, so far as they are concerned, I am not so absurd as to question. It was that of the present President of the United States, to whose opinion and action on this point it will be my duty presently to refer.

When the chairman had made this exposition of his reasons, which are entered upon the journal, Mr. Lewis, another of the managers, discharged this duty, and made the report of the agreement to which the conferees had come. The Speaker declared the House in possession of the report; and the question was put whether the House would adopt it? It had then arrived, per multas ambages, if not per tot discrimina rerum, at the point where it might act, and pass this bill. If it had the desire to see it pass, if the regard for the public interest, for "the defence and security of the nation," rose above its deference and regard for party principles and a party leader, and above the paltry desire of throwing responsibility and censure upon the Senate, it had the opportunity, in spite of the contrivances of those who had thus far baffled it, to vindicate its own patriotism, and secure to the country all the means which the fortifications and the navy required. Did it do so? And if it did not, then why not? An objection was instantly stated, that there was no quorum; tellers were appointed—the two managers who were not missing—and 111 appeared.

Mr. Carmichael then moved an adjournment, and the vote was taken by yeas and nays, and was 35 for, 76 against it, the chairman being one of the yeas; and, on the other side, almost the solid vote of the opponents of the administration. They were there, demanding the discharge of the public duties, calling for the passage of the appropriation which is now deemed so necessary for the public interests. But they were not heard.

They were ready to fulfil the trust reposed in them, and they were men with whom, now and at all times, I shall feel an elevated pride, as a man, a citizen, and a public officer, in being associated. This was the last time that the yeas and nays were called in that House, whose journal, at least, will give them a perpetuity of fame.

Mr. Lewis, one of the denounced opposition, anxious that the House should act on the report of the conference and save the bill, moved that the House should be called, to compel members to appear; and how was the motion met? Mr. Cambreleng resisted it, and said, "I protest against the right to call the House. What member will answer to his name?" "I will! I will!" was the response. "I am as much in favor of the fortification bill as the gentleman from New Jersey; but I say that the responsibility for its failure rests upon the Senate, and not upon us. The bill was defeated by the Senate." Sir, the declaration was too much for the House, and no! no! was heard from every part of it. Did that member believe that every assertion and every absurdity would pass current with the people, when it came clothed with the action and sanctioned by the mandates of the party?

There were two resolutions offered by Mr. F. O. J. Smith, one to appoint a committee to wait upon the President, to announce to him that the House was ready to adjourn; the other to communicate the same fact to the Senate. An effort was made to amend the latter, by stating in it that there was no quorum, (Jour. p. 532,) but it was not decided. A motion was made by Mr. Reed, of Massachusetts, an opposition man, pure in purpose, faithful to duty and his country, to call the House, but it was defeated by a motion by Mr. John Y. Mason to adjourn—which was carried, without having sent the ordinary messages to the President and Senate. And thus sic transiit. I would that we could adopt the maxim nil de mortuis, nisi bonum; but these things are now matter of history; and a faithful exposition of fact, duty to the people of this country, defence upon the accusation which has been brought against the Senate, demand that the truth should be told of it. Why was such an exhibition made by the representatives of the intelligence and virtue of this country? Has the standard of the moral perception of right and wrong been depreciated and debased? Have the people become so blinded by party prejudice, that their representatives dare do anything which party and party leaders may prescribe, and still hope for approbation?

Upon the motion to inform the President or the Senate, one of the Representatives from New Jersey—he to whom the chairman alluded, in the observation which I have quoted—a friend of the administration, [Mr. Parker,] who had previously demanded to know whether the managers meant to report the result of the conference, now exclaimed, "How can we pretend to say that we have concluded the business before us? And how can we adjourn without passing the fortification bill? This House has passed the bill. The Senate made a large addition to it; the House had added another appropriation; the Senate disagreed to it. A committee of conference was appointed, and that committee has refused to report to this House. Shall we go away and leave this bill, when there is an apprehension of war?" It was a friend of the administration which pronounced this condensed history. It is a faithful portrait; but it required another question to be added. Shall we hereafter venture to charge the failure upon the Senate; and shall the President of the United States be induced to assert their guilt in an annual message?

Yet so it is. The assertion has been made from the high place of power and control over popular belief, and it has been reiterated upon this floor. To the allegation I oppose the facts, the journals of the two Houses, the whole conduct of the parties in this controversy, the declaration of Mr. Parker, and, permit me to add, the unanswered testimony of Mr. Barringer, a member of the House, made upon the floor at the time, and in the presence and hearing of those who would have answered if they could. He is reported to have said: "The bill was defeated by an intrigue here (in the House.) If gentlemen desired names he would give them. But if this was declined, he would say that there were members who now sat in their seats, and would not answer to their names, who did so in consummation of the intrigue."

Mr. President, it was by a House thus constituted, and thus acting, that the bill was kept from the Senate. It expired there, in their keeping, and when the Senate had no power to reach it. If the Senate had been willing to pass it, with the three million provision in it, it would have been out of our power. This body, after sending its last message to the House, continued in session nearly or quite an hour, waiting for that bill; hoping that a returning recollection of what was due to the country, if not to themselves, might induce them to agree to its passage. But the case was hopeless; the condition and proceedings of the House were known, witnessed by most of the members of this body, and the President had himself retired from the Capitol.

I have before alluded to the fact of the President's absence from the Capitol. What may have been the precise extent of its influence upon the conduct of the House I do not pretend to decide. But the fact was known in both Houses long before either of them adjourned, and was familiarly spoken of, as the reason why "it was past twelve o'clock, and no quorum in the House."

The fact itself is without dispute. The Senate had rejected the three million appropriation; they had refused to intrust to him what they would have trusted to no man—the constitutional power of Congress over a portion of the treasury. In addition to this, the Senate had indefinitely postponed the nomination of Mr. Taney as a Justice of the Supreme Court. The Secretary carried this decision to him. His uncommon patience would bear no more. Power had been denied, and a favorite rejected. He refused to receive our message, told the Secretary it was past 12 o'clock, and he would receive no more communications from the Senate, and soon left the Capitol. What was the precise hour when this dignified exhibition took place cannot be ascertained. The watches and clocks did not agree. But whether before or after midnight was of no consequence. His own official term had not expired, and it would have been quite as proper for him to have permitted the two Houses to determine for themselves when theirs did; at least, to have received such messages as they might send, and return to them respectful answers. But the favorite had been rejected, and there was no hope of the three millions, although $1,670,000 might still have been saved to the fortifications and defences of the country.

Might not this fact have had some influence on the fate of the bill? Might it not have been thought unkind, and against the doctrines of party, to pass it, and throw upon the President the responsibility of its loss? Might it not have been feared that he would refuse to sign it? Notwithstanding his refusal to receive any further communications from the Senate, I hope he would not have rejected it. It would have come to him from the House, and must have been returned to the House, in which it originated. Besides, it would have been a pretty bold venture to have placed himself on the point of time, after signing the Cumberland road bill that very night.

And none of his predecessors had ever so acted. Every one of them, except since the rule which regulates the action of the two Houses on the last three days, had signed bills after that hour. It has so happened, though still not very old, that I have personally known the fact in relation to four of them. And there is, if possible, still higher authority than theirs. A member of the committee who waited upon General Washington with bills for his signature at the close of his official term, informed me that he went to his house about two o'clock in the morning. The President had retired; but he came down, made a remark respecting the time, and signed the bills; and they were a large proportion of those upon your statute book which were approved on the 3d of March of that year: some of them relating to the courts, the debt, the treasury, and other subjects of importance. May we not hope that our present Chief Magistrate would have been influenced by the conduct of the first Washington, and that of his own alleged exemplar, Mr. Jefferson? Observe, sir, I do not use the word pretendu.

In the review of this case, I feel confidence in repeating my declaration, that the Senate did its duty, and its whole duty, fully, faithfully, fearlessly. There is not one fact, when truly stated and understood, which does not sustain this assertion. We added largely, of our own motion, to the appropriations which were called for by the Executive, and voted by the House. They gave us $439,000; we added to it $421,000. They asked us to place three millions more at the unrestrained discretion of the Executive; we refused, but agreed to add $800,000 for specified objects. We urged on the House the passage of a bill which gave $1,679,000 for putting the country in a state of defence. In any event, it was enough; as much as the Executive could have used discreetly and economically. I demand, then, are we guilty or not guilty?

Mr. President, the patience of the Senate must be exhausted, and I will not stop to draw, as it might be drawn, the other side of the picture. I will only remind the Senate of the persons and the party who were the controlling actors in that extraordinary scene. Who were they who first proposed $439,000 only of specific appropriations, and resisted its increase, and yet offered to place three millions at the disposal of the President, at his discretion? The journals answer, and to them I appeal. They were the friends and supporters of the administration. Who objected to a conference, by which the bill might have been saved? The friends of the administration. Who insisted upon the bill when the three millions were to be placed in the hands of one man, yet defeated it when $1,670,000 were to be appropriated for specific objects? The friends of the administration. Who refused to report and receive the agreement by the conference of the two Houses? The same persons. Who threw every possible obstacle in the way of the bill? The same party. Who moved adjournments to put an end to the action of the House—objected to voting—and endeavored to prevent the House from sitting and proceeding? Messrs. Cambreleng, Polk, Beardsley, Jarvis, Mann, Jones, Carmichael, John Y. Mason, and other like persons. On the other side, and in opposition to all these proceedings, you almost invariably find those members who are denounced as unworthy of confidence, because they cannot bend the knee to power. On some of the votes there are exceptions. This is the case upon the first offering of the three million section. There are to be found in favor of it a few names of opposition members, and they are men of as pure feelings as any of whom the country can boast. I believe they erred, and erred grievously. But I neither impeach their motives nor those of any member of either House, in voting for that section. If they thought it constitutional, expedient, required by the condition of the country, it was their duty to vote for it. I thought otherwise, and have no desire now, or hereafter, to shrink from the full measure of that responsibility in regard to it, which is justly and truly laid upon the station which I occupy. I saw no necessity for vesting any discretion in the Executive in selecting the objects on which the public treasure should be expended. The selection of those objects, and the sums to be expended on each, was the high duty of Congress, not of the President, and we had had time enough to make the selection and prescribe the sums. I had no inclination to leave, by any vote of mine, either power or inducement to the Executive to commence actual war, or temptation to place us in a condition in which it should be unavoidable, and the time of its commencement was not matter of choice with us.

It is the high and solemn duty of Congress, and of Congress alone, to declare war, and to decide upon the time and manner in which it shall be waged. I had not, perhaps, all the confidence in the prudence and discretion of the Chief Magistrate which I ought to exercise; and, looking to the peace and interests of the country, I felt that it was due to them that we should not unnecessarily intrust too much power over them to him or any other one man, nor forget that liberty and free institutions require incessant watchfulness and jealousy. I thought it a fit occasion to apply "the firm and fearless check of the Senate" to the progress of those movements which might render our Government a "simple executive machine." I saw no impending danger of an early hostile invasion—no such pressure as could not be met by Congress at its regular meetings, or at such as the Executive had the power to call. I believed that the proposition to grant, in the mode proposed, three millions, or ten, or twenty, or one, was a violation of the constitution of the land, and that the necessity which should induce its open violation within these halls should be the last struggle of a despairing and hopeless people. A hostile force may be repelled and driven from our shores—a city in ruins, or a Capitol destroyed, may be rebuilt—but that constitution, broken by the overthrow of its balanced powers, cannot be repaired. Give to the Executive the control in the disposition of your treasury, and over peace and war, and its best guards to your liberties are gone, and will never be renewed; or, if they should be, it will be through scenes to which foreign war will be a trifle. The last and only bond of your union will be severed; and that flag, of whose honor we have been reminded, will present one star, and one only, and the place of its stripes will be covered with one shade, or they will float fitfully, without mutual dependence and connexion. Let us save that constitution, in all our ebullitions of party, in all our devotion to men, in all our hours of trial, internal and external.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its patience. I have endeavored to exhibit the truth in relation to that point on which the Chief Magistrate has chosen to make his accusation against this body, and send it on the four winds of heaven. And I have done it by references to the journals and reports of Congress. I have declared my own views and purposes in the act which I have performed. If political adversaries shall still repeat the charge, I turn them to the records of Congress. If any personal and political friend, who has known my course in life, shall deem it proper to impute to me other feelings than those which I have expressed, and believe that I am unwilling that the country should be defended, and have ceased to remember that my country, in any and every trial, is my country still, I shall be compelled to bow in silence. I shall have no retorts and recriminations to make. All that I shall demand is, that I be tried in the hour when the wrongs of my native land are to be avenged: and if I fail, then, and not till then, let my condemnation be pronounced.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 26.

MICHIGAN MEMORIAL.

The memorial from the Legislature of Michigan, on the subject of her admission into the Union, having been presented,

Mr. HENDRICKS moved that it be laid on the table.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, suggested the giving the memorial the same direction that had been given to a memorial having reference to the admission of Michigan into the Union in the other House. He would refer it to the committee appointed to consider the President's message on the same subject, and the question of boundary between the State of Ohio and Michigan. This direction would not commit the Senate, and would allow to the memorialists an opportunity, to which they were undoubtedly entitled, of being heard.

Mr. HENDRICKS would be the last to oppose the giving a hearing to the memorialists; but certainly the Senate had not progressed so far as to be prepared to receive a communication from Michigan as a State. If she wished to become a State, she ought to proceed in the constitutional manner that other States had done.

Mr. TIPTON said he was extremely unwilling that it should be supposed he was capable of taking any course denying the right of the people of Michigan to approach either branch of the national Legislature by petition or remonstrance. He hoped he had shown sufficiently, on a former occasion, to the satisfaction of the Senate, that, under the present form of her constitution, assuming a boundary she was not entitled to, Michigan could not rightfully be admitted into the Union. His colleague and himself could not admit that she was a State under present circumstances, claiming, as she did, a portion of their State. On that occasion the subject was referred to a committee, and he and his colleague were content to wait until they heard that committee's report, before acting further on the subject. While the matter remained in this situation, it was unnecessary as well as vexatious to be receiving petitions, and discussing them. He was anxious to hear the report of the select committee, from which the Senate might make up a correct decision on this delicate question.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, was not disposed to interfere unnecessarily in this matter, but, as one of the Senators of the United States, he felt it to be his duty to endeavor to give such a direction to the memorial as would enable those who framed it to present their views to the Senate, and at the same time enable Senators to examine carefully and deliberately their claims, without committing themselves. He would therefore prefer that the course taken by the House of Representatives should be followed on this occasion. He should like to know why the gentlemen from Indiana were opposed to giving the memorial this direction. If they were in favor of the admission of Michigan into the Union, on the condition that she made the proper change in her constitution, respecting boundary, why not refer the memorial to the committee, who would report distinctly what it would be necessary for Michigan to do? The subject was already before the committee, and, to enable them to have the whole subject before them, they ought also to have this memorial. They could not ask for it, nor act on it, without the order of the Senate. The committee would act and report at all events, and the gentlemen, by refusing the reference of this memorial, would not prevent the subject of the admission of Michigan from being discussed at this session. It was customary to refer memorials of this nature to the Committee on the Judiciary, but as there had been a select committee constituted to consider the President's message on this subject and the disputed boundary question, and as Michigan had, since the appointment of the committee, given her views more at large in the document just read, it would be more appropriate to refer it to the same committee, in order that they might have the whole subject before them. He wanted a report at length, after a full and fair investigation by the committee, that Senators, having such a report on their tables, might carefully examine it, and come to a direct decision.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, observed that the objections of the Senators from Indiana were not as to the examination of the memorial by a committee, nor to the admission of Michigan into the Union. Their objections, as he understood them, were that by receiving this petition, it would be admitting that Michigan was a State, and that she had a Legislature as such. Now, he (Mr. E.) did not admit that Michigan was a State, and had a Legislature. He knew very well that every citizen of the United States, and every State of the Union, had a right to memorialize Congress, and to be heard; but the question was, was Michigan a State? If there be not such a State, (said Mr. E.,) then we cannot accept the memorial in its present shape. We concede the point that she is a State, (continued Mr. E.,) if we accept this memorial, purporting, as it does, to come from the Legislature of the State of Michigan.

Mr. TIPTON observed that the constitution submitted by the people of Michigan had been sent, as the Senator from Alabama observed, to a select committee. To that he had no objection. It was well known that for two years he has been advocating the rights of that people; and when they brought themselves before Congress in a constitutional form he would readily agree to admit them into the Union. This, however, they had not done. If it was possible to admit them without doing injustice to the other States, whose boundaries they had attempted to overstep, he would be the first to do it; but what did the document before them declare? It was not the constitution of Michigan, nor coming from the people of that Territory, but it purported to be a memorial coming from the Legislature of the State of Michigan. There was no such political body as that assumed in the memorial, and he and his colleague were not willing to admit there was. He did not wish to reject the memorial. He was contented with the motion of his colleague to lay it on the table, and on that question he would ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, referred to the course taken with a similar memorial from Michigan in the House of Representatives, and hoped the Senators from Indiana would consent to let this memorial take the same course. A motion was made in the House of Representatives, he said, to reject the memorial, and the motion was not sustained. A motion was then made to receive it and refer it to a committee, declaring at the same time that the paper was not received as the memorial of the Legislature of a State, but as the memorial of individuals.

Mr. CLAYTON observed that, by general consent, the motion to lay the memorial on the table might be withdrawn, and he hoped the Senators from Indiana would consent to that course, and let the memorial take the same direction that had been given to the one in the other House. He did not perceive that any thing could be gained by the opposers of the admission of Michigan by refusing to refer their memorial. The Senator from Indiana proposed to receive the document, and then lay it on the table; for it would be as much received by laying it on the table as by referring it to a committee. The course taken by the other House did not commit them as to Michigan's being a State. They resolved that they would hear the memorial as they would hear the memorial of private individuals. If the Senate should adopt this course, it appeared to him that it would be more calculated to satisfy the people of Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, than by refusing to receive the memorial. It would certainly be the most unexceptionable course to refer the memorial with the qualification made in the other House; and a reference to the select committee, who already had the subject before them, was preferable to a reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS then withdrew his motion to lay the memorial on the table, with the general consent of the Senators, as the yeas and nays had been ordered, and submitted a motion in the following form:

"Ordered, That the memorial purporting to be from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan be referred to the select committee, appointed on the 22d of December, in relation to the admission of Michigan into the Union, and that the Senate regard the same in no other light than as the voluntary act of individuals."

Mr. DAVIS was in favor of giving the petition the usual direction. A petition from a man representing himself to be a ship owner did not prove him to be a ship owner, nor did the petition of a manufacturer, representing himself as such, prove him to be one, and we are not bound to recognise their character. Now, these persons represent themselves to be, I suppose, a political body. As a matter of principle, when a petition came here in respectful terms, it ought to be treated in a respectful manner. He would be satisfied to consider the petition as containing a faithful description of themselves, and was disposed to let it take the ordinary course.

Mr. NILES said that, aside from matters of form, he was disposed to regard the petition as coming from the people of Michigan, claiming political rights of the highest magnitude, and he could not refuse to hear them, and least of all a memorial coming from a whole people, claiming admission into the federal Union. Have they (said Mr. N.) not a right to select their own mode of application? They came here not asking a matter of favor, but a matter of right. Had they not a right to select their own committee to represent those rights? For his part, he was disposed to hear them. If there ever was a people who claimed rights of a high character, it was those who had political rights, and were not represented. He regretted to see a disposition manifested to shut out the inquiry, and to prevent them from being heard.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said he would assure the Senator from Connecticut that there had been no attempt made there to shut this people out from a hearing. There were ways enough of presenting this communication to Congress without the petitioners presenting themselves as the Legislature of a State. His objection was to the form in which the memorial came, and not to giving the people of Michigan a hearing. Gentlemen therefore were mistaken, and misstated them in saying that they were opposed to giving the people of Michigan an opportunity of being heard. The true question before the Senate was, whether this memorial came from a State—whether the Senate could address Michigan as a State, and receive communications from her as such. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] had compared this memorial to one coming from a person declaring himself to be a manufacturer, ship owner, &c., and contended that Congress, having no right to inquire into the occupation of individuals, but bound to receive petitions coming from them, ought not to reject them merely because they do not give a true description of themselves. This was very true; as regarded individuals, we do not inquire (said Mr. E.) what is the occupation of the petitioner, but whether he is a citizen of the United States; for he presumed the gentleman would not receive a petition from the Emperor of Japan or the Governor of Upper or Lower Canada. It was, however, absolutely necessary that, when a communication came from an association of people styling themselves as the Legislature of a State, their designation should be a true one, otherwise they could not properly be heard. Now, the people of Michigan had an undoubted right to petition Congress; but could they delegate this right to a body called a Legislature? They could not do it without the authority of Congress; and if (said Mr. E.) we receive this petition from them, we admit in some measure (he did not say it would be an absolute measure) that Michigan was a State. He was content with the course pursued by the House of Representatives, and hoped that it might be followed in the Senate.

Mr. TIPTON conceived the section of country he represented was intended to be affected by this application. He could perceive that honorable Senators, who were not immediately concerned in this question, had not examined the case in all its bearings, and he would ask them seriously to examine it. Mr. T. would refer them to the third section of the fourth article of the constitution, which had reference to the terms of admission of the new States. The people of Michigan had informed them that they had formed a State Government, and that two persons had been elected as Senators to represent them in the Senate of the United States, who are here, and claimed seats as such. By the decision of the Senate, seats were not granted to them. His colleague and himself could do no act that, by any possibility, might be construed into a recognition of Michigan as a State. The people of Michigan claimed many miles over the territory of the State he represented. And, until that claim was adjusted, the boundaries could not be defined so as to entitle her to be admitted into the Union. All the rights of the people of Michigan would come up fairly before the committee to whom the subject was referred; and he had no objection to the petition being received, and referred to that committee, who would then have the whole subject before them, provided it was referred in the manner proposed by his colleague—as a memorial coming from the people of Michigan, and not as coming from her Legislature as a State. He denied the possibility of the existence of that body (the Legislature) as a political body, and it could not become such, until, by their acts, they brought themselves within the provisions of the constitution and laws of the United States, which they had not done.

Mr. PORTER intended to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Indiana, but some remarks had been made by the Senator from Connecticut, to which he would reply. The gentleman was opposed to the qualification in the motion of the Senator from Indiana, because the right of petition might be infringed by it. Now, he did not understand any such thing. The reference, in the manner proposed, did not preclude the petitioners from being heard, but simply declared that the Senate was not yet prepared to decide that Michigan was a State. He was not one of those who thought that petitions could be received there about any thing and every thing. He thought they ought to be about such things as Congress could act on, and from some known person or corporate body, before they could properly be received. He did not wish to waste time on matters that seemed to be of trifling import, but it did appear to him that the receiving a petition from Michigan as a State would be an admission of the fact that she was what she called herself. He did not intend to interfere with the controversy between Michigan and the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, as to boundary, but it seemed to him that no Territory could come before them as a State until the consent of Congress had been given to her admission into the Union. He assured his honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] that he was ready to give the most deliberate attention to the affairs of Michigan, and to decide upon them according to the best of his judgment. The number of inhabitants in that Territory and the adjoining States would make no difference with him, nor prevent him from deciding impartially between them.

Mr. CALHOUN regarded the political existence of Michigan as a State, as a nonentity. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] had said that we were not bound to recognise a petitioner as a manufacturer, because he called himself one in the petition. That case did not apply to a corporate body, and especially to a political body. The petition must or must not be received. The position it assumed was strongly illustrative of the position some gentlemen had assumed on this floor. To receive this petition would amount to a recognition of Michigan as a State, and he could therefore not agree to receive it.

Mr. CLAYTON, in reply to Mr. CALHOUN, said he hoped the Senator from Indiana would not vary his motion. It appeared to him that the course now proposed was the very one to prevent all dissatisfaction on either side. By referring the subject to the select committee, with the qualification proposed, we do not (said he) commit ourselves at all as to whether Michigan is, or is not, a State. We send the memorial (said he) to the committee to inquire into the fact. Besides, in the very language of this order contemplated in the motion, it was provided that the Senate received this document from a particular section of the country, as a memorial coming from the people of that Territory, and not as a memorial from a State. How, then, could it be contended that, by receiving and referring the memorial, the Senate would be committed as to Michigan's being a State? To decide at once that this was a State, or to do any act recognising her as such, without reference to the boundaries of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, would create a great deal of unnecessary excitement. On the other hand, it was just and right that every thing said by this people, as a people, should be heard. Let the memorial, therefore, (said Mr. C.,) go to a committee, to consider the subject calmly and deliberately, and to report all the facts necessary for the information of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS did not feel any great anxiety about this matter. He had understood, till the Senator from South Carolina arose, that no objection had been made to receiving the memorial, and that it was already in the possession of the Senate. His worthy friend from Ohio [Mr. EWING] asked whether he would receive a petition from the Emperor of Japan. That question he was not called on to answer, because the gentleman went further, and said that when petitions were presented, the inquiry was not made whether the petitioner had correctly designated himself as a manufacturer or ship owner, but whether he was a citizen of the United States. Now, did not this settle the very question before the Senate? Were not these memorialists citizens of the United States, and falling within the description of those entitled to petition Congress, given by the gentleman from Ohio? While up, he would ask of the Senators from Indiana, whether it was more profitable to have the inquiry there made whether Michigan was a State, or to have the same inquiry made by a committee? This seemed to be a mere question of expediency. The Senator from South Carolina had stated the true question, which was, whether the petition should be received or not. But that question had been settled; and it was too late then to raise it, and it would be inexpedient to do so.

SENATE.]

Michigan Memorial.

Mr. RUGGLES moved a division of the question on Mr. HENDRICKS's motion, so as to take it first on the reference, without the accompanying qualification.

Mr. CLAYTON said the effect of a division of the question would be to make those who were anxious to give Michigan a hearing vote against the reference, altogether, under the apprehension that the qualification declaring that the Senate did not receive the memorial as one coming from a State might not be carried. Now, the proposition made by the Senator from Indiana was one that would give to the memorialists a full and fair hearing, without committing any Senator who voted for it.

Mr. LEIGH said, if the call for a division was insisted upon, it would place the Senators in the position mentioned by the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] and he hoped the gentleman from Maine [Mr. RUGGLES] would not insist upon it. He suggested to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. RUGGLES] that he could get at his object by moving to strike out the qualification in the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. RUGGLES. If the petition was considered by this body as coming from individuals simply, the objection would seem to be obviated as to its reception. He was not prepared to say these individuals were the representatives of Michigan State, or whatever name it was called by; they called themselves a Legislature. It was immaterial to him by what name they were called, as regarded this petition. Were the Senate authorized to say, we shall not hear them as a people? If they had called themselves a convention of the people of Michigan, would the question arise whether we should receive their memorial? We do not make the inquiry (said Mr. R.) when the proceedings of an assembly calling themselves a convention are presented to us, whether they are what they import to be or not.

Mr. NILES said that the object, as he apprehended, was to ask an expression of the Senate, that the organization of Michigan was improper and unlawful. He was not prepared to do so. They did not claim to be a State; they came for the consent of Congress to become a State.

[Mr. CLAYTON here rose to correct the misapprehension of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] and said they claimed the Territory as a State.]

Mr. N. understood it. The only question was, whether the Senate should enter into a preliminary measure. Did the constitution provide any particular mode for that? No. They were bound—it was their duty—to receive new States under the proper restrictions. They could not have federal rights without the consent of Congress. They must have their constitution framed, and submit it to Congress, to see that it was republican, and not incompatible with our Government. He was willing to let them take what preliminary steps now they pleased; and when the question of their rights came before the Senate, they would take care that there was no violation of the rights or principles of the Government of the Union.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to lay the memorial on the table, in order to take up the unfinished business of yesterday. It was half past one o'clock, (he said,) and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] was expected to go on with his remarks.

This motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. RUGGLES wished to say one word before the question on his motion was taken. By making the declaration he proposed to strike out, the Senate would be committed on one important point. The question of the admission of Michigan as a State was before a committee, and it was not known what their report would be. If they reported to-morrow that Michigan is to be admitted into the Union on certain conditions, then the question would arise, "had she asked for admission?" To ascertain this fact, otherwise than by the memorial coming from her, would be a slow process. If the Senate declared that this paper was the act of individuals only, that those who called themselves the Legislature of Michigan were not authorized to speak for her, then the Senate committed themselves; and if they received a report from their committee to-morrow, they could not say that Michigan had asked to be admitted into the Union, for they would have declared that those who presented this memorial were not a public body, and had no authority from Michigan to ask for her admission into the Union.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that a disposition had been imputed to him on this occasion, to exclude the memorial altogether, but that nothing could be further from his purpose; and if this had been inferred from his motion, in the first instance, to lay it for the time being on the table, he had been wholly misunderstood. A memorial had been presented by the President of the Senate, purporting to be a memorial from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan. Its contents were very partially known. So much of it, however, had been read by the Secretary as informed us that it was a paper taking ground upon the ordinance of 1787, and claiming for Michigan the right of admission into the Union, as a sovereign and independent State. He had felt it his duty to resist this pretension; and denying that any such case existed, denying that Michigan was or ought to be considered a sovereign and independent State, had moved that the memorial, for the time being, be laid upon the table. This motion had been made, that time might be afforded to look into the disposition that had been made elsewhere of a similar memorial. The discussion that had ensued had given time to turn to our files, and he then had before him a document, which showed what had been done with the same memorial, as he believed, in the House of Representatives. He wished the thing to take the same course here, and, when up before, had withdrawn the proposition to lay on the table, and offered the proposition which had been read at the Secretary's table. He had not the remotest wish to exclude the document referred to, but he was anxious that, in referring it to a committee, no sanction should be given to the character it assumed for the people of Michigan. He contended that, in no sense of the word, could they be considered a State. The laws of Congress for the Government of Michigan Territory were in full force, and the Senate, in another capacity, had before them a proposition looking to the due extension of the laws of the United States in and over that Territory. The character in which the people of Michigan represented themselves in this memorial, seemed to have been misapprehended by some Senators who had favored the Senate with their views. They seem to understand the people of Michigan as asking permission to become a State, but the memorial affirmed the fact that they were already in the enjoyment of a State Government, and in that capacity it asked that they might be received into the Union.

The Senator from Massachusetts (said Mr. H.) thinks it an unimportant fact what character a petitioner assumes when he comes upon this floor? He says that a man representing himself to be a ship owner in his petition, will not be inquired of whether he be a ship owner or not; that the Senate will pass this by as immaterial, and only inquire into the prayer of his petition. But suppose the prayer of his petition to be that Congress, for some important purpose connected with the interest of this Government, should recognise his character as ship owner, would not this then be the very fact to be inquired into? If so, this is the very case before us. It is that Michigan may be recognised with her Senate and House of Representatives, and in the capacity of a sovereign and independent State. It is for this purpose that she presents herself here. She asks to be admitted into the Union, and the first and most important inquiry is, is she a State? And if she be a State, under all the circumstances in which she presents herself, boundaries and all, there would probably be no hesitation in the mind of any Senator about her admission into the Union. Her character, then, State or no State, was the point in controversy. The right of petition, Mr. H. said, had very little to do with the present case. Every citizen of Michigan had a right to petition, and the people of Michigan Territory had unquestionably this right in their proper character, or in almost any other character that did not array itself against the laws and authority of the United States.

But the people of Michigan, in presenting their Senate and House of Representatives, as the legislative power existing there, showed that they had trampled upon and violated the laws of the United States establishing a territorial Government in Michigan. These laws were or ought to be in full force there; but, by the character and position assumed, they had set up a Government antagonist to that of the United States. If, before they had put their Government in motion, they had presented themselves here, and asked admission into the Union, the matter of boundary out of the question, there would have been no difficulty in the case. And if they wished now to become a member of the Union, and are content to come in at the right door, it is probable they will have no difficulty. Let them ask Congress, as they did two years ago, to pass a law authorizing them to form for themselves a constitution and State Government, and designating proper boundaries; or let them amend their present constitution, adopting proper boundaries, and their admission will be almost a matter of course. And this, said Mr. H., is, in my opinion, the easiest and speediest mode of getting into the Union they can adopt.

This is the first time, said Mr. H., that the Senate has been asked to receive any paper recognising them as a State; for although their constitution, and perhaps other documents, have been received, and referred to the select committee, they came as accompaniments to the President's message, which being referred, they were also referred as part of it. Before he resumed his seat, he would put a question to the Senator from Maine, who had asked a division of the question about to be propounded to the Senate. The purpose, however, of asking for a division, had for the present been abandoned, and the Senator from Maine had moved to strike out that part of the proposition which asserts "that the Senate regard the memorial in no other light, than as the voluntary act of individuals." This motion had doubtless for its object the reception of the memorial, and the rejection of the declaration with which it is accompanied. If it be the object, on the failure of this motion to renew the call for a division of the question, the proposition being my own, (said Mr. H.,) it is in my power so to modify it as to avert the result wished for by the Senator from Maine.

[Here Mr. RUGGLES remarked that it was not his intention to renew his call for a division of the question, and that he would be satisfied with the decision of the Senate on his motion to strike out.]

On taking the question, the motion of Mr. RUGGLES was lost: Yeas 12, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, Niles, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Wall—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Black, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Ewing of Illinois, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Tyler, Webster, White—30.

Mr. HENDRICKS's motion was then adopted, and the memorial was accordingly referred to the select committee appointed on the same subject.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions offered by Mr. BENTON.

Mr. SOUTHARD resumed, and concluded his remarks, as given entire in yesterday's debate.

Mr. WHITE then moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, when the doors were reopened,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, reported, without amendment, a bill making further appropriation for suppressing hostilities with the Seminole Indians, and asked for the immediate consideration of the bill, as the state of the country required its passage with the utmost despatch.

The bill (appropriating $500,000) was taken up for consideration, and ordered to its reading.

Mr. WEBSTER asked for the third reading at this time.

Mr. CLAY said he should be glad to hear the communications from the Departments read, in order to see whether they gave any account of the causes of this war. No doubt, whatever may have been the causes, it was necessary to put an end to the war itself by all the possible means within our power. But it was a condition, altogether without precedent, in which the country was now placed. A war was raging with the most rancorous violence within our borders; Congress had been in session nearly two months, during which time this conflict was raging; yet, of the causes of the war, how it was produced, if the fault was on one side or on both sides, in short, what had lighted up the torch, Congress was altogether uninformed, and no inquiry on the subject had been made by either branch of the Legislature. He should be glad if the chairman of the Committee on Finance, or of the Committee on Indian Affairs, or any one else, would tell him how this war had burst forth, what were its causes, and to whom the blame of it was to be charged.

Mr. WEBSTER replied that he could not give any answer to the Senator from Kentucky. It was as much a matter of surprise to him as to any one, that no official communication had been made to Congress of the causes of the war. All he knew on the subject he had gathered from the gazettes. The communications from the Departments spoke of the war as a war growing out of the relations between the Indians and the Government of the United States, and gave no reason to suppose that it had its origin in any quarrel with the citizens. It probably grew out of the attempts to remove these Indians beyond the Mississippi. According to the latest accounts, the country between Tallahassee and St. Augustine was overrun by hostile Indians, and the communication between those places was interrupted. The view taken by the gentleman from Kentucky was undoubtedly the true one. But the war rages, the enemy is in force, and the accounts of their ravages are disastrous. The executive Government has asked for the means of suppressing these hostilities, and it was entirely proper that the bill should pass.

Mr. WHITE expressed his regret that he could add nothing to the information given on this subject. He knew nothing of the cause of the war, if it commenced in any local quarrel or not. It was the object of the Government to remove these Indians to the west side of the Mississippi, and he was apprehensive that the difficulty had arisen out of this measure. He had, however, no information which was not in the possession of every other Senator. He hoped the bill would be passed, and without delay.

Mr. BENTON made a few remarks expressive of his ignorance of the cause of the war. Some years ago he was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. At that time these Indians in Florida were in a state of starvation; they would not work, and it was necessary that they should be fed by the United States, or they must subsist on the plunder of our citizens. He was under the impression that for these Indians there was appropriated by Congress a very large sum, perhaps $30,000 or $40,000, to place them where they would be enabled to live without plundering. These Indians are a very bad tribe, as their very name signifies, the word Seminole, in Indian, being "wild, runaway Indians." They were therefore considered a bad race. It was obviously the best policy to remove these Indians to a place where they would be able to obtain plenty. Treaties were consequently made with them on the subject of their removal, and the process has been going on for some years; but when the time arrived when they should be removed, they declared that they had no wish to go; and so again last summer, when there was another attempt to remove them. The disturbances began by their shooting their chiefs, and from this increased to the extent described in the report of Captain Belton, from which, and from private letters, he understood that, in the massacres which had taken place, the runaway negroes of the South were the most conspicuous. They traversed the field of the dead, and cut open the throats of those who were expiring. Two weeks ago he had stated here that what had already resulted from the movements of the abolitionists was sufficient to cast upon them a sin for which they could never atone. Great as that mass of sin was, they may yet have a greater mass to answer for, in comparison with which the past was but as a drop in a bucket.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions offered by Mr. BENTON.

Mr. W. then rose and addressed the Senate as follows: Mr. President: The first of the resolutions submitted by the honorable Senator from Missouri is the only one which, as yet, has been the subject of any remarks. In its original shape it was not very definite, and since it has been modified, on the suggestion of my colleague, it is less so. It now proposes "that so much of the surplus revenue, and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States, as may be necessary for the purpose, ought to be set apart and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the country."

This pledge will be indefinite, illusory, and deceptive; while we appear to pledge largely, it may end in little or nothing. Who is to judge how much is necessary? Congress. That body, then, will have the power to apply the whole, or nearly the whole, of this surplus to any other object, leaving nothing, or very little, for these objects. It cannot be said that we pledge five thousand, five millions, or any other sum, for these purposes. It appears to me, if we give any pledge, it ought to be of something which we can understand ourselves, and which the country can understand.

The debt contracted during the revolutionary war, during the last war, and all other debts which the United States had contracted, have been paid off; therefore, if the permanent defence and general security of the country require it, for one I will feel it my duty to add to our annual appropriations such sums as may be necessary to complete more rapidly our fortifications which have been commenced, to repair those which need repairs, and to build new ones at such important points on our coast as the public interest may require, to procure ordnance to arm them when built, and, if necessary, add something to our military peace establishment, so that we may have troops to take care of those fortifications and arms, after they shall have been built and provided.

As to the navy, I am willing to provide for hastening the repairing of our ships, building new ones, and equipping all for sea, which the interest of the country may require. These things I am ready to do, to any reasonable extent, upon the supposition that there is no immediate prospect of the state of the country being changed from that of peace to a state of war. If, in the opinion of the Executive, there is a probability that our friendly relations with any other nation are likely to be changed, and that preparation must be made for a state of war, so soon as I can be satisfied this opinion is well founded, I will go heart and hand with the Chief Magistrate in making all the preparations which money can make, to meet, successfully, such a crisis. I will not feel bound to stop with the surplus revenue; I will be willing to apply all we have, and to raise more, to protect the honor, the interest, and independence, of the country.

By the constitution, Congress alone has the power to declare war; still, as the Executive carries on our correspondence with foreign Governments, it is easy to see that the country may be placed in such a situation that, consistently with its interests and its character, Congress can do nothing but declare war. I have no belief that this is our situation at present, and cherish the hope it never will be.

I will use every means in my humble sphere which, consistently with our honor and interest, can be used to avert war, which I should consider a great calamity; but if, in the judgment of the constituted authorities, it must come, let my individual opinion be what it may, I will go with my country, and use all its energies against any enemy whatever.

But if our relations are to be changed from peace to war, (which God forbid,) I look to our constitutional leader, the Chief Magistrate, to communicate such facts as may be in his power, and to recommend such measures as he may deem expedient. This the nation has a right to expect, Congress has a right to expect, and it is a responsibility which I have no doubt the Executive will fearlessly assume.

Gentlemen are not correct when they argue that Congress will become the mere tool of the Executive if they require communications and recommendations from the President. He is to make his communications of facts and his recommendations of measures; then Congress, from these materials and such others as are within its power, is to form its own judgment in relation to what the interest of the country requires, and will either adopt the measure recommended, or disregard it, and resort to such other as may be deemed preferable.

For the present, gentlemen who think this resolution necessary, I hope, will revise and so word it that those who vote for it may know the extent of the pledge they give, and that the country may understand it likewise.

The information sought by the four remaining resolutions may be useful, and I hope they will not meet with any opposition.

National Defence.

[SENATE.]

Mr. President, I did not rise solely for the purpose of expressing my opinion upon these resolutions. The honorable Senator who moved them made their discussion the occasion of stating that our country was at present naked and defenceless; that this was well known at home and throughout all Europe; that we were threatened with a war with France, our ancient ally, who had already sent a fleet upon our coast to overawe our deliberations; and that the reason why the country is thus naked and defenceless is because a majority of the Senate voted against an appropriation of three millions of dollars inserted in the fortification bill of the last session, and thus occasioned the loss of the whole bill.

By the way, what has become of this fleet of observation? I have seen that it was ordered to rendezvous at Brest; but whether it, or the governor spoken of, has reached the West Indies, or our coast, I have not seen. Suppose it to have arrived; may it not be that the object is not to overawe our deliberations, but to protect the interest of France against any attack that may be made on her commerce? Overawe Congress! France, I hope, knows the character of our people better. If she does not, I feel very sure no member of either House will disgrace his station by giving any vote which can derogate from the character of those he represents.

I am one of those who voted against that appropriation, and against whom the charge is made. Against this accusation I might well plead a former acquittal, by the only tribunal competent to try me. This accusation was made in my own State; those to whom only I am accountable for my conduct here have passed upon it, and their unanimous verdict of acquittal I presented the other day, and it now remains on the files of the Senate. But I scorn to rely on that plea. I have a right to a separate trial, to plead not guilty, and to give the special matter in evidence.

I do not feel that I, or any of those with whom I voted, are answerable for the loss of that bill. The vote I then gave was the result of my best judgment. I then approved of it, have done so ever since, and probably ever shall, so long as I am capable of reflecting on the affairs of this world.

It will be no part of my plan to attach censure to any one for his vote; all may have been governed by motives as worthy as I feel my own were. The time will soon come when we must all appear before that tribunal where there can be no mistake either in the evidence or the judgment which ought to be pronounced. To that tribunal, then, where my motives and conduct must be submitted, I cheerfully leave the decision of the motives of all others; but it is due to the country, and to myself, that I shake from my own skirts that blame which others seek to attach to me.

A few very plain views of this matter will, I think, satisfy every honest mind that the Senate are in no fault whatever.

The bill was originated in the House of Representatives, passed that body in the month of January, and was sent to the Senate. It then contained the whole sum esteemed by the Executive and the House necessary for fortifications and ordnance. This sum amounted to about $439,000. The Senate might have given its consent to the bill without any alteration. If it had done so, there would have been a grant of the sum just mentioned, and no more, to these objects.

The Senate, from the best information it possessed, believed the defence of the country required much larger appropriations, and, as it had a right to do, increased some of the items of appropriation, and added others, to the amount of about $430,000, thus increasing the grant from $439,000 to $869,000, and on the 24th day of February returned the bill to the House, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Representatives would agree to the increased grant made by the Senate. If the House had simply agreed to these amendments, the bill would have become a law, and there would have been an appropriation for fortifications, &c., equal to $869,000. The House did not do this, but retained the bill from the 24th of February till 8 o'clock in the night of the 3d of March, and then returned it to the Senate with a new section, as an amendment to the amendment of the Senate.

This new section has been read so often that every member, I presume, has it by memory. It is in these words: "That the sum of $3,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy: Provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

For one, I declare, when this new section was read, I was as much surprised as I could have been if it had been dropped through the sky-light above our heads into the bill. The chairman of the Committee on Finance moved that the Senate disagree to the amendment, and after some discussion, in which I took no part, the vote was taken, and stood twenty-nine to nineteen, nine among those in the affirmative.

At this time I knew not who had proposed this amendment in the House. The President had not asked, as far as I knew, for any such appropriation; there was no estimate sent from any Department on which to found it. My belief was the President did not wish it. I supposed it had been offered by some member opposed to the administration, who wished a free disbursement of money about our seaport towns, not caring what embarrassment was occasioned by such a loose appropriation; and that, in the hurry and confusion of a night session, it had been permitted to pass without any particular examination; and fancied that, so soon as their attention was particularly called to it, the House would recede from it, and the bill be passed as originally sent from the Senate.

In these conjectures I soon found I had been mistaken; for presently the bill was returned to the Senate, with a message stating that the House insisted on the amendment. A motion was made that the Senate adhere to its disagreement. Before voting on that question I took the liberty of stating, very briefly, the reasons upon which my first was given, and upon which the second would be founded.

The President had sent no message asking such an appropriation; no estimates had been sent on which to found it. I believed it would have been the duty of the Executive to have sent such a message and estimates, and I farther believed he would faithfully discharge his duty, and therefore concluded he did not think the interest of the country required this additional grant. Besides this, the question was then pending and undecided before the French Chamber relative to the appropriation to comply with their treaty. I believed the strong probability was that it would pass, either then or at the next session; and that, with a little patience and good sense, we should receive the money without any warlike preparation. This was not only my own opinion, but the declared opinion of all with whom I had conversed.

I was what I professed to be, and ever had been—a friend to the administration; I had received no information that the President desired the appropriation, and I saw the section was so worded as to throw upon him a responsibility which he ought not to bear. The proviso left it discretionary with him whether the money should be used or not. I thought all the interest of the army, the navy, the large cities, and those who had ordnance to dispose of, would be brought to bear on him, to induce him to use the money. If he did order it to be used, and there should be no war, as I hoped and believed would be the case, he would be censured for wasting this large sum. If he resisted all importunities, and did not use the money, and war did come, he would be censured for not providing for the defences of the country.

Again: Suppose the money to be drawn, what was to be done with it? How much to the army, to the navy, to fortifications, and to ordnance? The section does not say; all is indefinite, vague, loose, and left to executive discretion.

These reasons were satisfactory to my own mind; I voted upon them. From the time the three millions was first mentioned in the Senate until we adjourned, I did not converse, as I believe, with a single member of the House upon this or any other subject; nor did I converse with any member of the Senate except my colleague, who joined me in the lobby behind the colonnade after our last vote. He was kind enough to speak favorably of my humble effort, and to express his regret that I had not made my argument before the first vote; but neither he nor any other member of either House ever intimated that the President wished such an appropriation.

I sincerely believed he did not; but in that it seems I was mistaken, and the first notice I had of my mistake was in his answer to a company of gentlemen in New York, who, after the rise of Congress, made him a tender of their services to defend the country. Whether I would have voted for the amendment in this loose shape, if I had known it comported with the views of the President, I do not pretend to say. I think I ought not, but am willing to state, because such is the truth, that if, upon reviewing my whole votes since honored with a seat in this chamber, any votes could be found which I would wish had not been given, the error is more attributable to my unbounded confidence in the Executive, and anxious desire to maintain him as far as I conscientiously could, than to any other cause whatever.

But it has been urged by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] that, on the 28th February, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House had given notice that when this bill should be taken up he would move an amendment appropriating one million of dollars for fortifications, and two millions for the navy; and that this accorded with the views of the Executive; and the gentleman adds, the members of the House no doubt made this the subject of conversation, and that Senators would probably secure the information; and, also, that in the Globe newspaper of 2d of March this notice is published, and has passed into the history of the country.

To all this I answer, that I did not hear of this notice. If any members with whom I associated heard of it, they never mentioned it in my presence. So far from it, one of my colleagues of the other House, probably as attentive as any member there, assures me he did not hear any such notice; and, when the amendment was under consideration, he had a curiosity to know whether the President desired the appropriation or not; that he conversed with a colleague sitting near him, and, neither of them knowing, he asked another of his colleagues, then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who told him the President did wish it, and added that he must say nothing about it. He did say nothing about it till since this discussion commenced during the present session. With the motives for this request to conceal I am not acquainted, therefore can say nothing.

The other source of information (the Globe) I did not apply to; I never read it till since I heard the gentleman's argument. If I had wished to read the newspaper for information, I had no leisure; my place was here, my duty here, and I had quite as much as I could attend to, without reading the Globe. If I had wished information to guide my judgment, and felt bound to look into newspapers for facts, the Globe is the last place upon earth I should look into for the truth.

Again: If I had seen this notice, I am yet to learn that the President has any member of this House to act as his substitute, and to give that information to the Senate which we have a right, by the constitution, to receive from the Chief Magistrate himself.

Lastly: If I had seen that notice, I would not have supposed this section was intended by it. The notice was specific; one million for fortifications, and two millions for the navy. The amendment is for every thing relating to either sea or land, in a general mass, for the Executive to divide out, as well as he could, according to his discretion.

If the amendment had pursued the notice, it would have been well expressed; but, in the shape presented in the bill, I doubt whether the combined talents of the members of both Houses can frame a section on such subjects, more loose, more general, and more indefinite, than it is.

It has been insisted by the Senator from New Hampshire that this section did make a specific appropriation of this three millions of dollars, and was justified by precedents in the days of General Washington, President Jefferson, and of President Madison.

By the term specific appropriation, I understand that we mean the direction of the law to apply a given sum of money to the accomplishment of a particular object, in exclusion of all others.

If this idea be correct, this section has no claims whatever to the appellation of specific. The object of it was to place every thing at the discretion of the Executive. 1st. Whether the money should be used at all. 2d. If used, to apply it to any object he pleased, connected with the land or naval service, or defence.

The precedents referred to do not bear out the arguments. The first is an appropriation of $116,000 to pay the civil list. Here the sum must all be applied to the discharge of the civil list, and nothing else.

The next is $70,500 for fortifications. Although it is not said what sum should be applied to this or that fortification, yet the whole must be applied to fortifications, and to no other object. The third and last precedent rests on the same principles.

In the case now under consideration every thing is vague, indefinite, and left to executive discretion, and all this without any communication from the President, or any estimate whatever. I venture another remark, founded on what I heard said by a gentleman of much experience, not now among us, that during the period of a popular administration was the very time we must expect bad precedents to be set.

The precedents, incautiously set, when we have unbounded confidence in the Executive, are sure to be relied on, in aftertimes, by those who may wish to use power without regard to the public welfare.

This section, if adopted, would in aftertimes have furnished a precedent, by which any grant of the public money might be made, to be used at executive discretion.

I now put it to gentlemen with whom, on former occasions, I had generally acted, to say whether, if such a grant had been proposed during the late administration, a single man of them would have voted for it? No. It would have been said this money would be drawn and used, not for the public interest, but in jobs, to control and regulate public opinion.

[SENATE.]

Upon this matter, for one, I am perfectly satisfied that I, and those who voted with me, were right in not agreeing to this amendment: but the matter did not end with the vote of the Senate; the bill did not necessarily fall thereby. Let us pursue the subject, and see when, how, and where, the bill was finally lost.

The Senate returned the bill to the House, accompanied by a message, informing them that the Senate adhered to their disagreement to the amendment as to these three millions. Upon receiving this message, it was competent to the House to have receded from their amendment, and then the bill would have passed, appropriating the $869,000 proposed by the Senate; but, instead of that, they took a vote, and determined they would not recede. (House Journal, p. 518.) After this (Journal, p. 519) a motion was made that the House do ask a conference on the disagreeing votes. This motion was agreed to, and a committee of three appointed, and a message sent to the Senate, asking it to appoint a committee to confer on the subject. (This message is found in the Senate Journal, p. 236.) As soon as it was received, the Senate agreed to the conference, and appointed a committee on their part. (Journal, p. 237.) In the course of a short time the committee on the part of the Senate returned, and reported that the conferees had agreed to recommend to their respective Houses, as a substitute for the $3,000,000, an appropriation of three hundred thousand dollars for arming the fortifications, and an additional appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars for the repair and equipment of ships of war. (Senate Journal, p. 237.)

If each House had agreed to this report, then there would have been the appropriation of $869,000 contained in the bill as sent from the Senate, and an addition of $800,000, making, in all, instead of $439,000, which the Executive had asked, $1,669,000. Here the question recurs, whose fault is it that this was not done? Unquestionably not that of the Senate. Its conferees had acted promptly, and promptly made their report. The Senate could go no further; it could take no vote, as the bill and other papers had been carried to the House by the conferees on the part of the House. This was entirely wrong. When the conference ended, it was the duty of the conferees on the part of the House to have delivered the bill and papers to the conferees on the part of the Senate, who would have presented them when they made their report; the Senate could then have sanctioned the report by a vote which I have no doubt would have been unanimous, immediately sent the bill to the House, which could have given its sanction, and the bill become a law. Instead of this, the House conferees kept the bill and papers, and, by so doing, defeated the whole bill.

The rule upon this subject is so perfectly plain it cannot be mistaken. It is this: in all cases where a conference is asked before a vote of disagreement, the conferees of the House asking the conference, when it is over, must take the papers back with them, because their House is entitled to the next vote: but in every case where a conference is asked after a vote of disagreement, then, when the conference is over, the conferees of the House asking the conference must deliver over the bill and papers to the conferees of the other House, because that other House is entitled to the next vote.

In this case the Senate had voted to adhere to their disagreement to the amendment. The House had, after this, voted that they would not recede, and then proposed the conference; therefore, as the House had given the last vote, the Senate was entitled to the next; and, to enable them to give it, it was the duty of the conferees of the House to have given the papers to the conferees of the Senate, and, if they would not receive them, they might have been left in the committee room.

This doctrine, so reasonable in itself, is laid down in Jefferson's Manual at 187, title Conference, in language too plain to be misunderstood, and it has been practised on by Congress in the cases with which I am acquainted. (See the case of the bill for the relief of Mr. Monroe, in Senate Journal, p. 374, of the session 1825 and 1826; and House Journal of the same session, pages 616 and 628.)

Let it not be supposed that the conferees of the two Houses were equally to blame for permitting the papers to remain with the conferees not entitled to them after the conference ended, because the conferees of the Senate did not know, and had no means of knowing, that the House had voted not to recede after the Senate had voted to adhere. Strange as the fact may seem, the truth is that the House, in its message to the Senate proposing the conference, omitted to state the fact that a vote not to recede had been taken after the House last received the bill. (See the message, Senate Journal, page 236.)

The conferees on the part of the House knew the fact, because their journal shows they were present and voted. (See the House Journal, pages 518, 519.)

The conferees of the House, having improperly taken the bill and papers, and thereby put it out of the power of the Senate to take any step whatever, are answerable for all the consequences.

I do not state this omission in the message by way of censure on the Clerk for any intentional wrong. All these matters relative to this bill took place in the night, in the confusion which occurred at the end of the session; and it is very seldom that the most temperate and prudent are as well qualified to do business, or have their wits as well about them, after a comfortable dinner, as they have in the early part of the day.

Mr. President, let us now see what the conferees of the House did with these papers, after taking them from the conference room. They returned to the House, and the chairman made no report whatever; the Senate waited from one or two hours, and, being able to hear nothing, sent a message respectfully calling the attention of the House to this subject. (See the House Journal, p. 530.) Then the chairman stated that the committee had returned at the time a vote was taken on a resolution providing for the payment of Mr. Letcher, by which it was ascertained there was not a quorum, and that the constitutional term had expired, and that for these reasons he had declined making a report. Mr. Lewis, another member of the committee, then took the papers and made the report, which was never acted on, and thus the matter ended.

The first reason assigned for not having made the report was the want of a quorum: this, it is said, was ascertained by the vote on the resolution just mentioned. The chairman ought to have put the House in possession of the report, as he found the House in session. Had he done so, no doubt it would have been acted on. The journal shows that much business was done afterwards, and a resolution reported by Mr. William Cost Johnson was adopted by the House. (See House Journal, from page 524 to 530.)

Now, if there was a quorum to do other business, to adopt other resolutions, how is it that there was not a quorum to receive and act on this report?

The remaining reason assigned is, that the constitutional term for which the members were elected had expired. In other words, it was after 12 o'clock the night of the 3d of March.

How can this be? There must have been some mistake on this point. If it was not too late to do the other business I have mentioned, how did it happen to be too late to make this report?

Again: The most certain information we have as to time is derived from the statement of the honorable Senator from Virginia. He tells us he looked at his watch when the conferees left the Senate chamber, and it then wanted fifteen minutes of eleven. When they returned and made their report, he was not in, but returned shortly afterwards, and it was then twenty minutes after eleven. We may, therefore, suppose the conferees had returned about one quarter of an hour after eleven, leaving three quarters of an hour to have disposed of this bill before the hour of twelve o'clock arrived. There was, therefore, ample time, if the report had been made, to have disposed of this before our constitutional term expired, according to the strictest construction.

Mr. President, this is the eleventh session I have been here, and until last session I never knew of an important measure having failed because 12 o'clock had arrived. So far as I know, the universal course has been, if the business necessary to be done could not be finished before 12 o'clock, to go on and accomplish it, if it took till daylight. I well remember, on one occasion, at a short session, we sat all night, and before I got to my lodging place it was broad daylight.

There always have been some members who had conscientious scruples about sitting after 12 o'clock. I always have and always shall respect men who act on such scruples, although I may differ with them in opinion. For myself, I have never felt any hesitation about voting after 12 o'clock, when the business required it. By the constitution, members of the House are elected for two years, the President and Vice President for four, and the Senators for six. The only difficulty is to ascertain when the term commences. The constitution does not fix it, but authorized the old Congress to do so. That Congress fixed the first Wednesday in March, 1789. That happened to be the 4th day of the month. Now, if we believe the first Congress met in the night at 12 o'clock the third of March, 1789, then our constitutional term will expire in the night at 12 o'clock of the 3d of March every second year, and the terms of the President and Vice President at the same hour every fourth year. But if we suppose Congress did not assemble earlier than 12 o'clock on the 4th of March, 1789, then, in truth, our constitutional two years, &c., do not expire till the same hour on the 4th of March, and we have our constitutional day as it was when light and darkness were first separated, and it was said the evening and the morning should be the first day.

I submit to gentlemen who have these scruples, whether it is not worth while to reflect maturely on this subject. If the term of Congress expires the night of the 3d of March, so must that of President and Vice President. This will always leave an interval of several hours, when we will have no President or Vice President. It appears to me those who framed the constitution did not so intend. It is easy to think of cases which would bear very hard upon such a construction. Suppose, shortly before the expiration of a presidential term, a man to be sentenced to be hanged at a federal court; afterwards it should be ascertained to a certainty that the person was innocent, and a messenger is sent for a pardon, but cannot reach the President till after 12 o'clock on the night of the 3d of March: is the man to be hanged because there is no President until a successor is sworn in? This ought not to be the construction. I apprehend the whole difficulty originates from our perplexing our minds with a legal fiction that there can be no fraction of a day. This, like every other fiction, must yield to fact when justice requires it.

A man sells a tract of land for a full consideration in the morning of the 4th of March, and conveys it. In the afternoon he sells and conveys the same land to another person; both vendees cannot hold; and yet, according to the idea produced by this fiction, both deeds were, executed the first minute of the day, and are of equal date; but every man knows that this fiction would yield to fact, and that the first vendee would hold the land. Whether these reflections be altogether accurate or not, they have always satisfied me that I did not act unconscientiously, or assume powers I did not possess, when I voted in the night of the 3d of March, after 12 o'clock.

The honorable member from New Hampshire will perceive that the resolution he has read, which was adopted in the year 1790, does not remove the difficulty. That resolution only says the term expires on the 3d of March; but still the question recurs, when does the 3d of March end, according to the meaning of the constitution? To Senators on all sides I submit whether this crimination and recrimination for past acts or omissions is likely to produce dispositions now to act together harmoniously, and to endeavor to devise and perfect such measures as will most promote the interest and welfare of the country.

Mr. President, in every view I have been enabled to take of this whole subject, it has appeared to me that this bill was lost in the House, not in the Senate; that the Senate were right in the votes which a majority gave as to this sum of three millions. I was satisfied with my votes when I gave them, and am yet satisfied—more, I am proud of them. I feel that the author of my existence will approve of them, and, to use the language of a distinguished man, now no more, "I wish they were recorded in the centre of heaven, in characters as bright as the sun, that the whole world might read them."

When Mr. WHITE had taken his seat,

Mr. GRUNDY said he wished to say a few words as soon as he could hear himself speak. At present, he was willing to yield the floor to any other gentleman desiring to be heard.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose to address the Senate; and, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SWIFT presented a petition from citizens of Vermont, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

On presenting this petition,

Mr. SWIFT rose and said that a portion of his constituents had intrusted to his care a memorial addressed to Congress, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade within the District of Columbia, with instructions to present the same to the Senate; but being unwilling to become in any manner unnecessarily instrumental in promoting or prolonging the excitement prevailing here and elsewhere on this subject, he had been for weeks waiting the final action of the Senate on the motion of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that the Senate do not receive the memorial presented by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] containing the same petitions as the one intrusted to his (Mr. S.'s) care; and it was his intention, in case the Senate refused to receive that memorial, to withhold from the Senate the one from his constituents; at least, until he should receive further instructions from them on the subject. But as it is now very uncertain (said Mr. S.) when the final action of the Senate will be had on this motion, I do not feel at liberty longer to delay to fulfil the instructions of my constituents, and I am the more inclined not to delay, from the fact that the honorable Senator who presented the memorial now before the Senate moved, at the time of presenting it, its instant rejection; and as I desire that a different course should be adopted by the Senate, I prefer to urge that course with the memorial of my constituents, rather than to interfere with the course proposed by him; for, however the motions of the two honorable Senators may differ in form, they, in my opinion, amount in substance to the same thing; the one denies the right of petition, while the other, though it admits the right, denies the ordinary investigation into the merits of the petition, and refuses to grant what is prayed for. Such right is of little value in the estimation of my constituents.

Sir, as I intend to present this memorial, and ask that it may take the usual course of memorials presented to the Senate, as I believe some Senators on this floor have mistaken the opinions and motives of those who have petitioned Congress on this subject, I desire to say a few words as to the opinions and motives of my constituents. I do not, however, intend to discuss at this time the correctness of these opinions, or to express opinions of my own, for it is not, as I believe, the proper time to discuss either the constitutional power of Congress over the subjects presented by the memorial, or the expediency of exercising that power if they possess it; for, however ingenious arguments may be, (and I have listened to some of great ingenuity,) whether made on this floor or elsewhere, while the ordinary course of legislation is denied to the petitioners, they will not be convincing; and decisions of the Senate, made by the extraordinary course of legislation proposed, will not be satisfactory, but will tend to increase, rather than to allay, excitement, which gentlemen so much deprecate, as injurious to slaveholding States.

Sir, the language used by the memorialists is, I admit, very strong; it is, however, dictated, I have no doubt, by the honest opinions and feelings of the memorialists, and with them it is the language of truth; and though they speak without disguise of the evils of slavery and of the slave trade within this District, yet they say nothing of slavery elsewhere, excepting to enter a disclaimer of any intention or wish to interfere in any manner with slavery in the different States; and there is nothing in the memorial disrespectful to this body. But, as I intend to ask for the reading of the memorial by the Secretary, to give gentlemen an opportunity to make such motion as they think proper in relation to it, I will not detain the Senate by stating the contents. Not only the memorialists, but a very considerable portion, to say the least, of the citizens of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, believe that Congress have power to abolish slavery within the District, and that it is expedient that Congress exercise the power of legislating on the subject, and either abolish slavery immediately, or make provision for its future abolition; or, by some provisions of law, mitigate some of the existing evils of slavery, and especially of the slave trade, within this District. They believe, also, that, by the relationship existing between the several States and this District, that each State is implicated in the evils of slavery, and that the charge that our Government is a slaveholding Government is not without the appearance of foundation. With these opinions, the memorialists respectfully ask the Senate that their memorial may be received, that it may be submitted to the thorough investigation of some standing or select committee of the Senate, and that it may so far receive the attention of such committee as to obtain from it a full, fair, and candid report, which course will greatly tend, in my opinion, to allay the tempest of feeling which exists on this subject. If they are mistaken in their opinions, they desire to be convinced of it, and, when so convinced, they will desist from all further proceedings on the subject; but until convinced that they are wrong, they will continue not only to think, but to speak and act on the subject, and no earthly power can prevent them from doing so.

Sir, let me tell gentlemen that those of my constituents who entertain these opinions are neither incendiaries nor fanatics, unless those who have signed this memorial have, by so doing, rendered themselves obnoxious to such charge, but they are amongst the most intelligent and peaceable citizens. Whether the memorialists do or do not belong to any anti-slavery society I do not know, but I do know that these opinions do not belong exclusively to those who are members of such societies; indeed, many entertain these opinions who are opposed to the measures of those societies. They are men who value too highly the freedom of opinion and of speech to surrender them through fear of any consequences which can affect only themselves. And let me also tell these honorable gentlemen that, while they deprecate the excitement at the North on the subject of slavery, as injurious to their best interests, their course is not the best calculated to allay that excitement; indeed, unless I am much mistaken as to the feelings and temper of the people of the North, their course in relation to these petitions will tend to increase the excitement which they so much deprecate. I now move that the memorial be read by the Secretary, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and I shall regret to find that, in the opinion of the Senate, the memorialists have used any language unsuitable to the occasion, or that has been dictated by any improper feelings. I must, however, believe that they have not intended to use language any stronger than was necessary to express their opinions of the evils of slavery existing within the District.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said that, before the reading of the petition, he desired to know of the gentleman who presented it if it was entirely respectful to that body. Parliamentary usage required that, before a gentleman presented a petition or paper of any kind to a deliberative body, he should satisfy himself that it contained nothing disrespectful to those to whom it was addressed.

Mr. CALHOUN desired to know if the language of the petition was respectful to those who had sent them there. He therefore wished to hear the petition read.

[Here the petition was read by the Secretary.]

Mr. C. demanded the preliminary question on receiving the petition. The Senator from Vermont, he said, objected to the calling these petitioners incendiaries, and yet (said Mr. C.) he does not object to the language used by them towards those who sent us here.

Mr. SWIFT had only said that gentlemen could judge of the language of the petition for themselves. The petitioners, he had said, were entirely respectable, were influenced by the purest motives, and believed themselves justified in speaking of evils as they supposed them to exist.

Mr. CALHOUN cared not what their motives were; he cared not whether they acted from ignorance or design; he only judged of the effect. Those persons who presented this petition knew of the existence of the Southern institutions, and yet they spoke of them as unjust, wicked, and diabolical. Whatever might be the design of these men, the course they were pursuing was calculated to destroy this Union and subvert its institutions. He did not mean to enter into any argument with the gentleman from Vermont, but he demanded the preliminary question, and on it he asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN was not only willing, but anxious, that the question should be distinctly taken before the Senate of the United States, and as far as it was in his power to put it to rest, he was prepared to go. It would seem that, on one morning, the Senate were to have a dish of Mr. BENTON's resolutions served up, and the next morning the abolition question. He hoped they would dispose of one thing at a time, and would therefore move to lay the question on the table. He made this motion with a view that it might be called up hereafter, when the Senate were prepared to make a final disposition of it.

Mr. LEIGH read parts of the petition, from which he inferred that there was a design in the petitioners to act not only upon the rights of the people of the District of Columbia, but upon the rights of the slaveholding States generally, as it argued generally against slaveholders.

Mr. SWIFT said it was difficult to find expressions in any memorial to which some exception might not be taken. Let me, said he, illustrate this by calling the attention of gentlemen to another question. Suppose a petition presented there to prohibit the sale of lottery tickets in this District, calling the practice immoral, gambling, &c., would gentlemen consider this language improper, because the sale of lottery tickets was tolerated elsewhere. This case was perfectly similar to the one treated of in the petition he had just presented.

After some additional remarks from Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. BUCHANAN moved to lay the question on the table, and it was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. EWING, from the Committee on Public Lands, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of various memorials and petitions, asking for rights of pre-emption, or grants of land, from Alabama, Indiana, Ohio, Mississippi, and Louisiana.

Mr. PORTER said he was greatly surprised at the report just made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and he could not help thinking that it was done without due consideration. He hoped, on due reflection, they would find reason to change their conclusion. At all events, he could not permit it to pass without opposition; and he was determined to take the sense of the Senate on the adoption of the report. He was aware that objections existed to the grants of land to new States, not so much on the principle, for there seemed to be little discrepancy of opinion on the propriety of making such a grant, but from a difference of opinion as to the mode of giving it. Many of the representatives from the old States were willing to assent to the donations asked for, provided that with them a distribution of the money now in the Treasury, arising from the sales of public lands, could be made according to the principles contained in the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky; while others, who were opposed to that bill, wished to have these donations acted on singly, without being coupled with another measure which, in their opinion, endangered their passage. Waiving all observation on this point for the present, he wished to call the attention of the Senate to one of the memorials from the Legislature of Louisiana, which had just been rejected by the Committee on Public Lands. That memorial stated there were obstructions in the Atchafalaya river, which were being removed by the labor and at the expense of the State of Louisiana, and asked for a donation of land proportioned to the advantages accruing to the United States, in consequence of the improvements so made. Sir, (said Mr. P.,) this request of the State I represent here asks for no favor from the general Government. It demands a matter of strict justice. The consequence of the obstruction heretofore existing in that river was an impediment to the free course of the water, which caused it to overflow the circumjacent country, and render of no value some of the richest and finest land in the State or the world.

The United States are the owners of nearly all the soil on the banks of this river, and their property would be increased in value one hundred fold by the measures which the State of Louisiana was pursuing, and the money expended by her. Under such circumstances, was it not a matter of surpassing astonishment that the committee should move to be discharged from all further consideration of the subject? What, sir, (said Mr. P.,) do they propose that their lands shall be brought from no value to an immense importance by our labors, and refuse all participation in the expense of doing so? Are we to understand that, because they think we are obliged to open this river for purposes of navigation, they are ready to profit by our labors, because they are indirectly benefited? Sir, this might be a good plea for an avaricious and selfish man in a court of justice, but it is unworthy a rich and powerful country. It has no justice, it has no equity, in it. Mr. P. said, another opportunity would be afforded him to express his opinions on this subject, and he would not at this time trespass further on the time of the Senate. He did not wish to interrupt the business which was generally expected to come up this morning; his present object was to postpone the consideration of the matter to another day, but, in doing so, he wished to express his strong dissent to the report just made from the chairman of the committee.

After some remarks from Mr. BENTON and Mr. MOORE, the motion to discharge the committee was laid on the table.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the resolutions submitted by Mr. BENTON.

Mr. BUCHANAN, who was entitled to the floor, at the request of Mr. GRUNDY, yielded this privilege; and

Mr. GRUNDY rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: Notwithstanding the indisposition under which I labor, I hope to be able to make myself understood, although I am aware that the manner in which I shall discharge the duty before me will be less acceptable than that of others, or than it could be performed even by myself, under more favorable circumstances. When I moved the modification of the resolution which my friend from Missouri was kind enough to accept, accompanied by the brief explanation I then made, I did suppose that I could scarcely be misunderstood by any one; but I find I was mistaken, as the resolution is now deemed by some Senators more exceptionable than it was in its original form; it therefore becomes necessary and proper that I should explain, more fully and at large, my views and objects.

That the United States are exposed, and in too great a degree defenceless, is admitted by every intelligent man. On this account the country suffered much in the late war with Great Britain. Our large cities on the seaboard were constantly exposed to the approaches of the enemy, and this city became the theatre of their actions. Even this Capitol, containing the sacred halls of the legislation of freemen, was burnt and destroyed. Since that time, our means of defence have not been so improved as to prevent similar occurrences and sufferings in the event of another war with any powerful nation. This condition of things has been heretofore the result of necessity, not of choice. The remainder of the public debt incurred in the revolutionary war, and the whole of the debt occasioned by the last war, had to be paid; and the payments to be made in discharge of them, and the ordinary current expenses of the Government required all the money accruing from every source of revenue.

I therefore cast no blame upon those who have preceded us. There has been no period in the history of the Government, when the proper defences for the country could have been provided without resorting to a system of taxation which would have been oppressive. An unwillingness, very properly felt, to increase the public burdens, combined with a desire to discharge our public engagements with punctuality, accounts for the present defenceless condition of the country. But what is the state of things now? You have, or will shortly have, about thirty millions in the treasury, a large portion of which is not, nor can be, needed for the ordinary purposes of the Government; and you cannot, if you act in good faith, and in fulfilment of the pledge given at the time, and by the passage of the compromise tariff act, so reduce or diminish the revenue as to prevent an accumulation of the surplus.

Gentlemen are constantly engaged in devising ways and means to dispose of this surplus money; for none of us are willing that it shall remain in the public treasury unexpended. The Senator from South Carolina [MR. CALHOUN] proposes an amendment of the constitution, to enable Congress to make a disposition of it, while the Senator from Kentucky [MR. CLAY] makes a proposition to divide, by an act of Congress, a considerable portion of it, which has arisen or may arise from the sale of the public lands, among the several States. My opinion is, that we should first discharge our own duties, by fulfilling all the trusts committed to us, with the means which the constitution and laws have placed in our hands, before we go abroad in search of objects of munificence or bounty. To protect and defend the States was one of the great objects which led to the formation of the constitution; not to provide for their proper defence, when the means are within our hands, is to fail in the performance of one of the highest trusts confided to the federal Government; and we are left without excuse if we squander or give away the money, for purposes respecting which there is no constitutional obligation upon us, and thereby disable ourselves from defending the country against its enemies. What, then, is our duty? My answer is, prepare the country, whether there is to be peace or war; so, if war shall come, the pride of our citizens may not again be humbled, by witnessing the scenes of the late war.

My object in offering the proposition to amend or modify the original resolution was, and now is, to set apart from all other uses so much of the surplus revenue which has accrued or may accrue, as will be sufficient to provide the proper defences of the country, and to enable Congress to form a proper estimate of how much should be set apart for this purpose; the other resolutions ask information of the proper departments, what sums of money will be necessary for the different objects specified. When an answer shall be received from the Executive, then Congress can decide whether it will adopt the scheme proposed by that department, or whether it will increase or diminish the means of defence recommended. In this way we shall act understandingly. We can, after the information is obtained, determine what we ought to do. We shall then know the probable amount of the cost, and set apart a sum of money out of the present and accruing surplus sufficient to accomplish the objects contemplated, whatever they may be. It certainly was not, and is not, my intention that this great work of fortifying and defending the country should progress in the tardy manner heretofore pursued, but as rapidly as labor and materials can be procured.

I have stated that the want of money was the reason why this subject had not heretofore been effectually attended to. We now have the money; it has accumulated, and is still accumulating, upon our hands, and we cannot prevent it. We are driven, by a kind of necessity or destiny, to the discharge of the high duty of preparing to protect and defend our country against every enemy who may approach our shores. I am solicitous that these defences should be made or provided out of that surplus revenue which you cannot materially reduce or diminish, and before the period arrives when your revenue, under the operation of the tariff compromise act, may not be more than sufficient to defray the ordinary expenditures of the Government. If the surplus, of which I have spoken, be applied to other objects, for which Congress is under no constitutional obligation to provide, the consequence will be, that the people must be taxed in order to raise the money necessary to protect the country.

Having made this explanation of my views in reference to the resolutions on your table, I will now proceed to the investigation of other topics which have been introduced into this debate. I have no accusations to make against any one. I am too imperfect myself, and I know it, to assume the station of a censor of the conduct of others; but gentlemen should recollect, while they are denouncing, in no measured terms, the proposed appropriation of three millions at the last session, (that some of us voted for it; and we have the same motives and the same influences which operate on them to vindicate ourselves from the charge, indirectly made, to be sure, of being infractors or violators of the constitution, and of having voted for a measure, for which they would not have voted even to save the Capitol from the enemies of the country. These are hard sayings, and, when their application falls on us, merit a serious examination. In making this examination, I shall exhibit facts and arguments in support of the course adopted by the minority of this body; and this will fill up the whole circle of my duties here. I shall not assume upon myself the right of judging and condemning others—that belongs to another forum, the great tribunal of public opinion, by whose decision I am willing in this, as in all other cases, to abide. I ask, what part of the constitution of the United States would have been violated by this appropriation of three millions? None, according to my reading and understanding of that instrument. It provides that “no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.” The manner of making the appropriation is left to Congress. How far they shall be general or specific is to be determined by the House of Representatives and Senate, at the time they are passing acts making the appropriations. The right to appropriate money for constitutional purposes or objects being given to Congress, and that instrument (I mean the constitution) being silent as to the mode or manner of making the appropriation, it follows that the department of the Government to which is confided the right to appropriate must exercise its discretion and judgment as to the mode or manner of making them; and whether the mode be as general as that practised under the first two administrations, or as specific as the practice recommended and introduced by Mr. Jefferson, in neither case is the constitution violated. To secure a rightful application of the public money, and a strict accountability in the officers disbursing it, were the motives which induced Mr. Jefferson to recommend that specific appropriations should be made. This was wise and salutary, and gave rise to the practice that now generally prevails.

I now proceed to show that a greater latitude of discretion was vested in General Washington, by the act of the 20th of March, 1794, than was proposed by this three million appropriation. That act provides "that a sum of one million of dollars, in addition to the provision heretofore made, be appropriated to defray any expenses which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, to be paid out of any moneys which may be in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to borrow the whole or any part of said sum of one million of dollars, an account of the expenditure whereof, as soon as may be, shall be laid before Congress."

Here one million of dollars was placed entirely at the discretion and "under the direction of the President of the United States;" and I would ask gentlemen for what specific object or purpose was this appropriation made? The act declares that it is "to defray any expenses which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations." All the nations of the earth, civilized and savage, are laid open to the President as a theatre for his operations. There is no limitation or restriction imposed upon his discretion. He was to select the nations with whom the intercourse was to take place, and the purposes and mode of expenditure. All this discretionary power was vested in the President by the Congress of 1794, and sanctioned by General Washington himself by his approval of the act. I am aware that it may be said that more discretion must be confided to the Chief Magistrate, in his intercourse with foreign nations, than is proper in our domestic concerns. This is true in most cases in point of policy and expediency; but the constitution makes no difference. I therefore feel authorized in saying that the proposed three million appropriation would not have been unconstitutional, unless the Congress of 1794 and General Washington violated the constitution in the passage of the act containing the appropriation I have read.

In 1806, during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, who has been justly styled the great apostle of civil liberty, an act passed, and received his sanction, conferring on him greater and broader discretionary powers than were contained in the proposition for the three million appropriation. The act of 1806 provides "that a sum of two millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards defraying any extraordinary expenses which may be incurred in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who shall cause an account to be laid before Congress as soon as may be."

It should be recollected that our intercourse with foreign nations is carried on by the executive branch of the Government, and by this act two millions of dollars are placed in the hands of Mr. Jefferson, then President of the United States, to cover any extraordinary expenses which he might, in the exercise of his discretion, create in our intercourse, not with any particular nation or nations designated by Congress, but with the whole world; and this sum of two millions is placed in the hands of the Executive, over and above the sum required for the ordinary and established intercourse then existing between the United States and foreign nations. Let us compare the proposed appropriation of three millions with the act I have just read.

The proposed appropriation reads as follows: "that the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy; provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

The appropriation made by the act of 1806 was absolute and unconditional. The proposed appropriation of three millions of dollars was conditional, and to depend upon the happening of the contingency that "the expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress." In that event, and in no other, could the President of the United States have used one dollar of the money. The necessity contemplated by the proviso could only have arisen upon France committing acts of hostility, or assuming such an attitude as must, in the opinion of the President, have inevitably led to war. By the act of 1806, there is nothing definite or specific. By the proposed appropriation, the objects upon which the money was to be expended are enumerated and specified. By an act of April, 1806, Mr. Jefferson was authorized to exercise, without specification of object, an unlimited control over one hundred thousand militia of the United States, and two millions of dollars. The first section of that act declares "that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, at such time as he may deem necessary, to require of the Executives of the several States to take effectual measures to organize, arm, and equip, according to law, and hold in readiness to march in a moment's warning, their respective proportions of one hundred thousand militia, officers to be included; to be apportioned by the President of the United States, by the militia returns of last year, in cases where such returns were made; and, in cases where such returns were not made the last year, by such other date as he shall judge equitable." The fifth section provides "that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to call into active service any part or the whole of the said detachment, when he shall judge the exigencies of the United States require it. If a part of the said detachment only shall be called into active service, they shall be taken from such part thereof as the President, in his discretion, shall deem most proper."

The sixth section is, "That two millions of dollars be, and are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the pay and subsistence of such part of said detachment as may be called into service." By this act a hundred thousand militia are to be raised at the discretion of the President, and two millions of dollars are appropriated for their pay and subsistence, and this is all to be done when he shall judge the exigencies of the United States require it. This act expired, by its own limitation, at the end of two years, and was re-enacted on the 30th of March, 1808.

Having shown satisfactorily, as I trust, that no violation of the constitution was involved in the proposed appropriation, nor any departure from the legislative usages of the country, and that more discretion has been vested in former Presidents of the United States, the next inquiry is, did such a state of things exist as to justify the appropriation?

The French Government owed a debt of $5,000,000 to citizens of the United States, which by solemn treaty it had stipulated to pay. It had paid no part of it. This Government had promptly and in good faith performed every stipulation on its part, and still delay and procrastination were practiced by the French Government. A majority in the Chamber of Deputies had at a preceding session actually rejected an appropriation of the money. The Senate of the United States had resolved that no legislative measure should be adopted at the last session; but the Committee on Foreign Relations, who recommended the adoption of the resolution, in their report fully concur with the President of the United States when he remarks, in his message, that "the idea of acquiescing in the refusal of the execution of the treaty will not, for a moment, be entertained by any branch of the American Government. The United States can never abandon the pursuit of claims founded on the most aggravated wrongs."

The House of Representatives had adopted a resolution declaring that the fulfilment of the treaty would be insisted on. The French Government had recalled its minister; and the President of the United States had directed our minister to return to this country, in case the appropriation was not made by the Chamber of Deputies at its then session.

By his message to Congress of the 26th of February he communicated all the facts within his knowledge, and submitted to them what measures were proper to be adopted, in the following language: "It will be seen that I have deemed it my duty to instruct Mr. Livingston to quit France with his legation, and return to the United States, if an appropriation for the fulfilment of the convention shall be refused by the Chambers. The subject being now in all its present aspects before Congress, whose right it is to decide what measures ought to be pursued on that event, I deem it unnecessary to make further recommendation, being confident that, on their part, every thing will be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country which the occasion requires." From the message, it is evident that the President wished and expected Congress would adopt such measures as it might deem proper, to meet any contingency which might occur. To place the country in a position to defend itself would have been a measure of prudence, and at the same time could have given no cause of umbrage whatever to France. Had the President, by his message, recommended these preparations, and assigned to Congress, as a reason for so doing, the probability of a rupture or hostilities, the sensibilities of that Government would have been more excited than they were by his annual communication. In this posture of affairs, was it not reasonable to entertain apprehensions that France might adopt measures which would require this country to defend itself? In that view of the subject, the three million appropriation should have been made; and the supposition is not unreasonable that the repeated denunciations which we had heard against executive power and patronage, combined with that distrust which some gentlemen entertained in the present Chief Magistrate, contributed mainly to its defeat, although gentlemen might not have been conscious of the influences operating upon them. It is true that, in general, appropriations for the defence of the country should be specific, and founded on estimates previously made by the executive departments of the Government. It is impossible that members of Congress can so well understand the various provisions that should be made for the defence of the country as that branch of the Government which has the subject of our national defence under its particular care and management; but in this case there was no opportunity, after our relations with France were fully understood, to make the necessary estimates, and submit them to the consideration of Congress; and therefore it was that the appropriation of three millions was proposed, and the President was left to exercise his judgment how much of the $3,000,000 was to be applied to each of the different objects specified. There was no other practicable way by which additional means could be provided to defend the country, in the event of the approach of danger. When it is recollected that Congress was about to adjourn, by the termination of its constitutional existence, and that it could not be convened at an early day, by reason of the election of members for the new Congress in many of the States not having taken place, it seems to me quite reasonable that some means of defence should have been placed in the hands of the Executive, to be used in case it became necessary.

It should still be remembered that the President had no right to use one dollar of this three millions, unless "the expenditure should be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

I will now say a few words upon the loss of the ordinary appropriation bill at the last session. I will take it for granted, until conclusive evidence shall fasten upon my mind a contrary conviction, that no committee, no member of either House, acted unworthy of his station, or used any unfair or disreputable means to defeat the passage of that bill. The remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WENSTER,] that its bones are to be searched for in the other House, is true to the letter; but that is not the material inquiry. Where was the fatal blow; where was the mortal wound inflicted? If it were inflicted in this body it is of no consequence that the bill was carried to the other House, and there lingered for a short time, and died in the place of its nativity and origin. But even if the mortal wound were received in this body, and it was inflicted in defence of the constitution, all men, both here and elsewhere, would pronounce the act justifiable. Let us now examine how this bill was lost. I insist its loss is wholly attributable to the disagreement which grew up between the two Houses upon the subject of the three million appropriation. But for the disagreement between the two Houses upon that subject, the bill would have passed both Houses of Congress, and have become the law of the land. If the Senate had not rejected the three millions, no difficulty would have occurred. The House had passed the appropriation bill, and it came to this body. The Senate concurred in all the House had done, and inserted by way of amendments additional appropriations. The bill was then returned to the House, and it agreed to all the amendments of the Senate, and ingrafted upon them the appropriation of three millions. Each House had agreed to every appropriation contained in the bill, except the amendment made by the House proposing the appropriation for the three millions. To this the Senate disagreed, and the loss of the bill cannot rightfully be imputed to any other cause than the difference of opinion which existed between the two Houses upon this subject. Gentlemen may argue as long as they please; they may give lengthy historical accounts of the progress of the bill through committees and the two Houses; they may labor to fix the blame where they may, and it at last solves itself into this, that the House of Representatives wanted the appropriation of three millions; the Senate would not agree to it; and on that account, and that only, the fortification bill failed. It has been objected that the President had not asked, by a message, for this appropriation. Can Congress do nothing for the defence of the country, when all the facts are before them, without being stimulated by a message from the Chief Magistrate? If he had sent a message recommending the appropriation, would he not have been charged with dictating to Congress the measures they should adopt? Now, when he has placed all the facts in relation to our intercourse with France before Congress, and leaves the whole matter to them, with a confident reliance that, "on their part, every thing will be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country which the occasion requires," it is said he has been guilty of an omission of duty.

A serious question seems now to be made, as to what time Congress constitutionally terminates. Until lately, I have not heard it seriously urged that twelve o'clock, on the 3d of March, at night, was not the true period. It is now insisted, however, that twelve o'clock on the 4th of March is the true time; and the argument in support of this is, that the first Congress met at twelve o'clock, on the 4th of March. This is not placing the question on the true ground; it is not when the Congress did meet, or when the President was qualified by taking the oath of office, but when did they have the constitutional right to meet? This certainly was, and is, in all future cases, on the 4th of March; and if the day commence, according to the universal acceptance and understanding of the country, at the first moment after twelve o'clock at night on the 3d of March, the constitutional right or power of the new Congress commences at that time, and if called by the Chief Magistrate to meet at that time, they might then qualify and open their session. There would be no use in arguing away the common understanding of the country, and it would seem as reasonable to maintain that the 4th of March ended when the first Congress adjourned, as it is to say that it began when they met. From twelve o'clock at night until twelve o'clock at night is the mode of computing a day by the people of the United States, and I do not feel authorized to establish a different mode of computation for Congress. At what hour does Christmas commence? When does the first day of the year, or the first of January, commence? Is it at midnight or at noon? If the first day of a year or month begins and ends at midnight, does not every other day? Congress has always acted upon the impression that the 3d of March ended at midnight; hence that setting back of clocks which we have witnessed on the 3d of March at the termination of the short session.

SENATE.]

National Defence.

In using this argument, I do not wish to be understood as censuring those who have transacted the public business here after twelve o'clock on the 3d of March. From this error, if it be one, I claim no exemption. With a single exception, I believe, I have always remained until the final adjournment of both Houses. As to the President of the United States, he remained until after one o'clock on the 4th of March. This was making a full and fair allowance for the difference that might exist in different instruments for keeping time; and he then retired from his chamber in the Capitol. The fortification bill never passed Congress; it never was offered to him for his signature; he, therefore, can be in no fault. It was argued that many acts of Congress passed on the 4th of March, at the short session, are in our statute books, and that these acts are valid and binding. It should be remembered that they all bear date on the 3d of March; and so high is the authenticity of our records, that, according to the rules of evidence, no testimony can be received to contradict any thing which appears upon the face of our acts.

Mr. President, I now propose to say something of our present condition, in reference to our relations with France, and what are the prospects before us. For the last three years France has enjoyed the reduction of duties stipulated for in the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831. By this reduction she had gained or saved for her citizens upwards of three millions of dollars prior to the end of the year 1834, which, but for the treaty, would now be in the treasury of the United States. By this time she will have saved altogether five millions. She has obtained and enjoyed all these benefits, and still fails and refuses to pay one cent of the five millions stipulated to be paid on her part; and what is the plea or argument she employs in justification of her conduct? She pleads a supposed insult as a set-off to a just debt—a debt acknowledged to be just in a treaty made by the executive branch of that Government, and signed by the King's own hand—a debt acknowledged to be just by the Chamber of Deputies, after a full examination made by that body into the claims of our citizens.

If further evidence of the justice of the claims of our citizens upon the French nation were needed, it is furnished by the records of the American board of commissioners, who were appointed by this Government, in pursuance of the treaty, to ascertain them. By the adjudications of that board, it appears that claims to the amount of upwards of nine millions of dollars have been established; so that but little more than one half of the principal, without interest, would have been received by these claimants, had the French nation complied strictly with its engagements: add to this that many of the claimants must have failed to establish their claims, from the unavoidable loss of testimony in the course of thirty years. I cannot perceive how any difficulty could ever have arisen, or any serious question have been made, among those who had a full opportunity of examining the subject, as to the justice of the claims of our citizens to the extent of five millions of dollars.

But the French Government is not content with having heretofore withheld the payment of less than one half of our just claims; they refuse to pay any portion of it hereafter, unless our Government shall comply with a new and degrading condition prescribed by themselves; in the language of the Duke de Broglie, they will pay the money only "when the Government of the United States is ready to declare to us, (the French Government,) by addressing its claim to us officially, and in writing, that it regrets the misunderstanding which has arisen between the two countries; that this misunderstanding is founded on mistake, and that it never entered its intention to call in question the good faith of the French Government, nor to take a menacing attitude towards France."

Upon this branch of the subject I hope there can be no diversity of opinion amongst us; I hope there is no heart beating in an American bosom that is willing that this country shall be thus degraded. The French Minister of Foreign Affairs here prescribes to the Government of the United States, not only the mode and manner, but the very language which is to be employed by this Government. He says, in the first place, that the apology required is to be addressed to the French Government officially, and it must be in writing, and of course signed by the President of the United States, or Secretary of State, and then follows the very terms and language which are to be used by the Government of the United States in this act of humiliation. And why is this to be done? To procure the payment of about one half of the amount justly due to our citizens. Sir, the French nation, in the most brilliant days of her late Emperor, could neither purchase, nor by the dread of its arms terrify, either the people or Government of the United States into so disgraceful an act. What is the pretext for this arrogant demand on the part of the French Government? It is that the Chief Magistrate of the United States, in his annual communication to Congress in 1834, gave a history, and a true one, too, of the transactions between France and this Government, which wounded the sensibilities of the French Government. It is not alleged that any misstatement was made in that message, that any expression or word was used which was not in strict accordance with the facts of the case, as they really existed. Did not France seize unlawfully the property of our citizens? Had she not confessed it, and acknowledged that she owed us a debt of five millions on that account? Had she not promised to pay this debt at certain periods, on the faith and word of her King? Had not some of those periods actually expired, not only without any provision to make payment, but with the positive refusal by her legislative Chambers to make provision? And what did the President say in his message? He stated these facts to the representatives of the people of the United States. Had he done less he would not have fully discharged his duty. France might feel mortified at the idea of being held so strictly to account by our young republic, but she had no right to complain, and much less to ask for an apology or explanation. It was the proper consequence of her neglect to pay her just debt.

But, sir, I forbear to press this view of the subject further. There is another stronger light in which it ought to be considered. The French Government claim the right to interpose and interfere in our domestic consultations. This cannot be permitted so long as we are a sovereign and independent nation, and the present constitution endures. It is the duty of the President to communicate to Congress freely and fully upon all subjects, and more especially in relation to our foreign affairs, which are managed particularly under his guidance and direction. And, should any foreign nation be allowed to interpose between the President and Congress, and control the Chief Magistrate by the apprehension that it might take offence in his making a full and complete declaration of the facts, and his views as connected with them, in reference to such nation?

If ever this should take place, I shall consider the independence of this nation as at an end, and the Government itself of no value. We all know that the present Chief Magistrate is the last man living who will ever dishonor his country by an act of this kind; and I hope, if there be one Senator here who would be willing to see the President of the United States commit so degrading an act, that he will come forward and avow it. I will go further: no man will ever be elected President of these United States who will so far forget the honor of his country and the high duties of his station as to think, for a moment, of doing an act which will not only disgrace him, but a whole nation of freemen. The French Government seem to have forgotten, or not well to have understood, the principles of our Government, or this unreasonable requirement on their part would never have been made, unless, indeed, they intended it as a mode of refusing to execute the treaty. Carry the principle out, and where will it lead us? We have not, by our constitution or frame of Government, given our President the power to declare war or issue letters of marque and reprisal, like the monarchs of Europe. He can only propose and discuss these measures in the first instance. He is not the Government for these purposes, but only a part of it. The Government has never made a declaration or done an act on these subjects; and until some resolution or act has passed the Senate and House of Representatives, and been approved by the President, the interests of no foreign nation can be affected. Each member of Congress is as much a member of the Government in declaring war, and issuing letters of marque and reprisal, as the President, and his single declaration is just as effective. If the principle asserted by France be sound, then may she demand explanations of any thing wounding to her pride which may be said here in debate, and the nation may be held responsible, not for the acts and declarations of its Government, but for the assertions of each individual of which it is constituted. Such a proposition would be monstrous, and can never be permitted in the practice of our Government; and if France persists in her demands, I am unable to say when or how this controversy may end.

In this state of things, what course does wisdom point out? To prepare for the worst that may come is certainly the true course. But it is said by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that, if we arm, we instantly make war: it is war. If this be so, we are placed in a most humiliating situation. Since this controversy commenced, the French nation has armed; they have increased their vessels of war; they have equipped them; they have enlisted or pressed additional seamen into the public service; they have appointed to the command of this large naval force one of their most experienced and renowned naval officers; and this squadron, thus prepared, and for what particular purpose we know not, is now actually in the neighborhood of the American coast. I admit this proceeding on the part of the French Government is neither war nor just cause of war on our part; but, seeing this, shall we be told, if we do similar acts, designed to defend our own country, we are making war? As I understand the public law, every nation has the right to judge for itself of the extent of its own military and naval armaments, and no other nation has a right to complain or call it in question. It appears to me that, although the preparations and armaments of the French Government are matters not to be excepted to, still they should admonish us to place our country in a condition in which it could be defended in the event the present difficulties between the two nations should lead to hostilities.

I listened with great attention to the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] while he was pointing out to the Senate the extreme weakness of our naval force, and showing the superiority of the French in this respect. The conclusion to which his argument led me was, that the disparity was too great, and that this inequality ought not to be permitted longer to remain.

Gentlemen tell us that there is no danger of war between the two nations. This may be true; I hope it is so; but what that Government may do which owes a just debt, has the money in her coffers, and refuses to pay it until the creditor Government shall come forward and ask pardon for having insisted on the payment in the language of truth and justice, I will not undertake to determine; and, further, when this refusal to pay a just debt is attempted to be justified by an assertion of the right on the part of the French Government to interfere in our domestic consultations and deliberations. The best security we have against war, in my humble opinion, is, that the French Government is too far in the wrong. There cannot be a civilized nation on the earth that has an accurate knowledge of the history of this misunderstanding between the two countries, but will pronounce at once that the honor and the justice of the French nation both require that she should comply with her honest engagements by the payment of the money, and that it cannot stand justified in withholding it, or attempting to substitute a supposed affront or insult for actual payment. When error and passion prevail, it is impossible to say to what extremes they may hurry nations as well as men. Certain it is that, if French honor requires the explanation which has been demanded, it will not be satisfied with retaining the five millions of dollars which that nation owes us. I will not think so meanly of them as to suppose that they will take the money as an equivalent for their honor, and intend to put up with what they may consider an insult, because they can withhold the payment. On the contrary, if they have any right to demand an explanation at all, it will not be satisfied by keeping the money, and would be strengthened by its payment. Indeed, it is surprising that the ministry of France, on the admission that they were right as to the message, did not perceive that it was incumbent on them, as honorable men, first to pay their debt, and then to ask an explanation. This is what men of honor and honesty in private life would think necessary; and, unless they abandon the ground assumed by them, they must continue to insist on an explanation, even should the money be paid; and may, with the same reason that they make the demand, make war on us if it should be refused.

If it be asked whether I would now, under existing circumstances, be willing to declare war against France, I answer, emphatically, I would not. I am desirous that France should reconsider the principle that she has assumed, and some of the steps she has taken, and see whether the explanations given by our minister, Mr. Livingston, whether the disavowal which he made of any intention on the part of the Executive of this country to insult or menace that Government, all which has received the sanction of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, may not be deemed satisfactory. Nay, further, I am willing to wait until the last annual communication of the President of the United States shall be seen by the French Government. It contains a fair and just exposition of the views entertained by the Executive at the time of making the communication complained of. If the French Government shall choose to consider that satisfactory, I shall be gratified; for no man would deplore a war between the two countries more than I should. The French Government had no right to take exception to the communication made to Congress by the President in December, 1834. The recommendation contained in the message was not carried out by any action of Congress, and until all the departments of a Government, whose consent is necessary for the consummation of an act of an offensive character towards another nation, concur in the act or declaration, it is not the act of the nation, and cannot form a topic of discussion between the two Powers. Until the consent of all the departments of this Government, that is, the President and Congress, shall have been given as to what shall be proposed by either, it is a consultative proceeding, domestic in its nature and character, and no foreign nation can be permitted to interpose between them, and check the freedom of their communications to each other. When their consultations shall eventuate in acts or declarations affecting the interests of other nations, then, and not until then, has any foreign nation, who may be affected by it, a right to call for or demand explanations, or make it, in anywise, a subject of diplomatic discussions. I would now ask gentlemen if the French Government shall remain in its present erroneous position, and continue to insist on a demand which is inadmissible, and which is wholly inconsistent with our political institutions and form of Government? Whether that nation shall enjoy all the beneficial effects guaranteed to it by the treaty of 1834, while not one of the stipulations on its part has been complied with? I can only answer, for myself, I will not consent thus to degrade my country. After every reasonable expectation shall have failed of the fulfilment of the treaty on their part, I shall be in favor of such measures as shall be best calculated to preserve the honor, dignity, and independence, of the United States. What those measures should be, may, in the mean time, depend upon the course of conduct which may be adopted by the French Government.

I have now presented to the Senate my views upon all the prominent subjects which may have been introduced into this discussion, and conclude by expressing a most sincere hope that our nation may not again be visited by the evils consequent upon war; but war, with all its direful consequences, is preferable to peace, if it can be maintained only by national degradation, or by a surrender of liberty and independence.

When Mr. GUNNYS had concluded,

Mr. HILL, of New Hampshire, addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: Much has been said to mystify the question before the Senate, and to make it appear that a majority of the last Senate is not solely responsible for the rejection of the bill conditionally appropriating three millions of dollars for the defence of the country.

Mystification will not answer the purpose; the responsibility will rest, as it now rests, where it truly belongs. It was with a high interest that I have watched the progress of appropriations in past sessions of the Senate. I have seen those appropriations delayed in the Senate for weeks, on frivolous pretexts: this delay had no other real object than the forcing the House of Representatives to come up to some favorite doctrine of the Senate, or for some other political manoeuvre. Has not the Senate repeatedly held up the appropriation bills for the purpose of forcing the Executive into the appointment or non-appointment of certain officers? Has it not been threatened to defeat the general appropriation bill if the House of Representatives would not yield to the wishes of the Senate?

Why was it that the principal appropriation bills of the last session, which passed the House at an earlier period than usual; why was it that these bills were held up to the very last week of the session? Why was this very fortification bill kept thirty-four days in the Senate? No, not in the Senate, but the greater part of the time in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Finance? Was it not done avowedly for the purpose of compelling the House to pass such subjects as a majority of the Senate should choose to force on them? Look at the general appropriation bill; that bill was held up for weeks in this body, and did not pass until the last moment of the session—it did not pass, leaving time for the President of the United States to read the bill, before the twenty-third Congress was actually defunct; and so long was it in the possession of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that I never had an opportunity to read the perfected bill before I was called upon to vote on the question of its passage. These bills were all furnished by the House, leaving the Senate ample time to discuss and understand them; but so exclusively did the then Committee on Finance of the Senate take the control, that even the Senate itself could not consider and pass upon them without a violation of the joint rules.

The loss of the fortification bill was clearly owing to the neglect of the Senate to bring that bill to an ultimate decision. In the first place, the Senate insisted on adding to that bill appropriations which had been voted down by yeas and nays in the House—it insisted on adding appropriations, suiting the motives of particular members, and local in their character, which had not been recommended by the proper department. The House, being thus forced to take the bill against its own expressed will, again proposed to the Senate a more general appropriation, which might be applied by the Executive at points where expenditures would be most useful. Instead of making appropriations that had not been called for by the proper department, either in Boston harbor or in the Delaware river, the House proposed three millions of dollars to be expended at the discretion of the Executive in the manner that might best meet the state of things existing. The House proposed this at that point of the session when information had just been received that the relations with a foreign Government were in a critical state—when it was too late for particular legislation; and when the obvious effect of neglecting such appropriation would be to invite foreign aggression.

The first question is, was the appropriation proposed by the House a reasonable proposition? Those who thought the public good required that appropriation, in either House of Congress, ought not to be reproached with having defeated the fortification bill. At no time did they interpose an objection to it in any shape. It was those who opposed that bill, it was that majority in the Senate which held up this bill to the last moment; which even refused, at that moment, to carry into effect the strong decision of that branch of the Legislature whose peculiar right and province it is to make appropriations of this sort; it was that majority which is responsible for the loss of this bill.

It has been contended that the session of the Legislature should have continued until the 4th of March at noon; and that the President of the United States ought to have remained here to sign bills until that time. The President gave one full hour for the variation of the clock. He remained, as I have occasion to know, in the Capitol until after one o'clock. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHWELL] says President Jackson did not, on this occasion, follow the example of an illustrious predecessor. The great Washington, he informs us, (on what authority he does not tell us,) was called up from his bed, and in his flannel, on one occasion, signed some twenty bills; and that these bills became important laws, that have ever since been in force. This statement of the Senator, if it prove any thing, proves too much. If Washington did not consider the time of Congress as having expired at twelve o'clock, why was he in bed at two o'clock? Or, if the time of Congress did not expire till twelve o'clock at noon of the subsequent day, why did he get out of bed at all, when he had ample time to examine the bills at his leisure, before the time expired? It is said to have been the practice in both branches to set back the clocks at the expiration of the 3d of March. I was witness to the clock in the Senate chamber having been set back more than an hour, on the last night of the last session; the hand of the clock pointed at twelve, after the hour of one had arrived. Now, if it had been the practice to continue the session until daylight or noon of the 4th of March, where was the necessity for setting the clock back?

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] thinks he sat here on one occasion at the close of a Congress until daylight. I well, recollect, probably the same time. It was in 1833, three years ago. The 3d of March was Sunday; and on that occasion the President of the United States continued in the Capitol until daylight, not of the morning of Monday the 4th, but of Sunday the 3d. Other sittings after midnight will refer themselves to the expiration of the first session, when the power of each member extending to the second session to act was undoubted. If any member knows that Congress and the President acted after twelve on the night of the 3d of March, of the second session, or what purported to be twelve o'clock, let them put their finger on that time, and show by circumstances that the Congress did hold on its session into the time for which the next Congress was elected. If they can show us an instance of this kind, they will show what, in my opinion, was a violent dereliction of duty. That it was generally believed any act done after the time was illegal, is proved by the practice of setting back the clock an hour, and making one o'clock in the morning the nominal time of twelve at night.

The assumption that the power of Congress to act beyond the term for which it is elected is a legitimate power, is urged with a pertinacity that will not admit of denial. It is insisted on by almost every person who has spoken on one side; and it is insisted on because, if the assumption be not conceded, neither the House of Representatives nor the President can be responsible for the failure of the fortification bill. Deny the right of Congress to sit after midnight, deny the right of the President to retire and sign no bills after midnight, and the last Senate must take the responsibility, not only of defeating the three million appropriation, but of defeating every item in the fortification bill.

The sixteenth and seventeenth standing rules of the two Houses of Congress provide that "no bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the last three days of the session;" and that "no bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation on the last day of the session." These standing rules were made with the express view of preventing confusion at the close of the session, and to give the President an opportunity to inform himself of the nature and contents of the several bills placed before him for his approval. If the two Houses of Congress have ever held on to their session after twelve o'clock at night, at the close of the session, it has probably been on the last day on which, by the rules, either House of Congress could act on bills. It will be perceived, in this case, that Congress would not act after its constitutional time expired, and that the holding over would violate the rules only. These rules have of late become in effect a dead letter, as have many other rules of the Senate; which, requiring for their suspension the unanimous consent of the Senate, have been set aside by a simple vote of a majority of the Senate.

The confusion attending the last hours of a sitting of either House is disagreeable to all friends of fair legislation; it is a most propitious moment for those who press claims and measures that will not admit of discussion. I stood in my place at the close of the last session, for more than one hour after the time of the Congress expired. After the House of Representatives had finished their business, and after the hour of one o'clock had arrived, different propositions were made and brought before the Senate, involving large expenditures, to be defrayed out of the contingent funds of the Senate. These propositions were intended to give a defunct printer of the Senate additional jobs of printing. I will read one extract from the Senate journal, presenting the extraordinary spectacle of a Senator, dead in law, acting for the resuscitation of a partisan printer, whose term had been superseded by the election of a new printer to the Senate. After twelve o'clock at night, Mr. Poindexter submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the reports of commissioners for adjusting land titles, made to the Secretary of the Treasury since the adjournment of the last session of Congress, be printed, with the documents in relation to the public lands ordered to be printed at the last session of Congress."

*The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Benton,] despairing of being able otherwise to defeat the project of expending, by the action of the Senate alone, some one or two hundred thousand dollars, in addition to the enormous jobs that had already been voted, then told me he was determined to talk down this project; and he did talk and read extracts from the journals after twelve o'clock at night, until he compelled the defunct Senate to lay the project on the table.

[At this point Mr. BENTON rose, and Mr. HILL giving way, Mr. B. reminded him that he defeated these printing jobs after midnight, and by speaking against time. He had avowed his determination to speak out the session; and after speaking, as he said, a long time against time, he found that time stood still; that our clock obstinately refused to pass the hour of twelve; and thereupon addressed the presiding officer, (Mr. Tyler, the President pro tem.) to call to his attention the refractory disposition of the clock; which, in fact, had been set back by the officers of the House, according to common usage on the last night, to hide from ourselves the fact that our time was at an end. The presiding officer (Mr. B. said) directed an officer of the House to put forward the clock to the right time, which was done, and not another vote was taken that night, except the vote to adjourn.]

National Defence.

Mr. HILL thanked Mr. B. for reminding him of these facts, and said, to the perseverance of that Senator in speaking against time, in having the clock set forward to the true time, and in avowing his determination to speak until the Senate adjourned, and finally compelling the defunct Senators to yield up their places on the floor—to that perseverance of the honorable Senator—which never tires on any becoming occasion, it is due that from one to two hundred thousand dollars of the public money was prevented from going into the all-grasping jaws of that cormorant, who has not fattened, but grown lean and haggard, with the continued feeding of a majority of the late Senate of the United States, Duff Green.

Mr. Bibb's proposition was to print the usual number of the legislative and executive journal from the foundation of the Government in 1789, with a copious index to each volume, and also an analytical index to the whole. The usual number was one thousand and ten copies. There are fifty volumes of legislative journals, and three volumes of executive journals. The expense of this printing, at the Congress prices, which are much higher than printing any where else, (being pay as for manuscript, when this and other reprints were from printed copy,) would have been at least $100,000. Mr. Webster's project was to reprint the Blue Book from the commencement, beginning in 1816, and published every two years; ten volumes of rule and figure work, last volume four hundred and fifty pages, at an expense of between four and five dollars per page, at the lowest estimate, $16,000. Mr. Poindexter's project was a continuation of printing of reports of commissioners for adjusting land titles, which had already cost sixty or seventy thousand dollars, and which had been previously printed under an order of the Senate, and not worth one straw to any body; the continuation, of no more value than the main work, would have made several volumes, and would have cost some twenty or thirty thousand dollars. The above project of printing reports went through the Senate at the same session, as did the project of Mr. Moore, of Alabama, to print certain Indian reports, which now amount to three large octavo volumes, delivered at this session, and which are really of no value even to a grocer or trunkmaker. Mr. Preston's project, which passed at the last hour of the session, forced through by a vote of the majority, was to print a list of pensioners on the rolls of the Treasury Office. He had before got through a resolution for printing the rolls in the War Department, which had been two years in printing, and are now just completed, making three large octavo volumes of rule and figure work, of about one thousand pages each. The whole expense of printing these lists will not be less than thirty thousand dollars; and, for all practical uses, these volumes are of less value than any old almanac. This motion of Mr. Preston was the last question taken; it was taken after twelve o'clock, and was carried by surprise. Mr. Poindexter's motion next came up, when Mr. Benton commenced speaking.

Mr. President, we have very lately had a specimen of the facility with which bills may pass the Senate. On yesterday a bill appropriating half a million of dollars for defraying the expense of defending the country against the murderous warfare of the Seminole Indians in Florida, was received from the House of Representatives, committed to the Committee on Finance, reported on, and passed three several readings, all on the same day. There was no opposition to the bill, only the very significant inquiry made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] how it happens that these Indians should have attacked our men, and the War Department furnish us with no evidence of that intended hostility? If that Senator had not studied enough of Indian character to know that a blow, and generally a fatal blow, is the first indication of Indian hostility, he might have sought for the cause of that hostility in the known fact that a political party in the United States had taught these sons of the forest to believe themselves to be sovereign and independent nations, whose rights as such had been invaded; and that even the benevolent acts of our own Government were injustice and oppression in disguise, deserving no better than the punishment of death and extermination of our citizens at their hands. If the Committee on Finance had it in their power to act as promptly as they did on the bill I have named, why did the same committee of the last session hold up the appropriation bills for more than a month after they had passed the House, and not suffer the Senate to have them until it was too late to advocate on this floor what was expedient, and oppose what was inexpedient?

Mr. President, for the four sessions I have had a seat in this body, I have voted steadily against extravagant appropriations. I have voted against all appropriations for local internal improvements; against all increased allowances; against claims which, in my opinion, had no foundation in justice. My opposition, at times, has here scarcely had the weight of a feather. If there have been extravagant expenditures, if offices have been multiplied, and the compensation of officers increased, all has been sanctioned by a majority of the Senate. What would have been the condition of the treasury at this moment, had there been no restraint upon the will of the Senate? Has not the Senate, by passing bills which have been vetoed by the President, sanctioned principles of allowance which would have made the treasury at this moment a hundred millions in debt? The Maysville road veto stopped appropriations, much of which would have been money virtually thrown away, as has been a large share of the expenditures on the Cumberland road, which would probably have amounted at this time to at least sixty millions of dollars—ten millions a year: the veto on the bill allowing the States interest on their war claims, which war claims had been liberally and largely allowed by the Government, stopped an immediate abstraction of many millions more. The principle of this last bill, followed out, would have left no end to the claims that would have been kept up on the treasury: the first and largest sum would have gone to Massachusetts, as the interest on that claim which, by dint of perseverance, she succeeded in procuring, since the commencement of the present administration, for State expenditures made in defiance of the constituted authorities of the general Government in time of war!

Mr. President, illiberal and ungenerous as I have been to those who wanted large sums from the treasury, I did vote, with the gentlemen then acting in the minority in the Senate, for the appropriation of three millions of dollars to be expended, as the public exigencies might require, in preparing the nation to defend itself against a foreign enemy. Liberal and generous as have been the gentlemen who composed a majority of the Senate, every one of that majority voted against the appropriation of three millions. On whom, then, rests the odium of leaving the seaboard in its present defenceless state? The Senators, whose habit it was to vote for the most extensive appropriations, voted against this appropriation; and, taken in connexion with the attitude of the majority on the subject of the differences with France, is it not clear that the refusal to give the Executive the means of defence, on the part of this body, operated as a new inducement to the French Government to deny us justice? Was this not a strong indication that, even should France for ever deny the execution of her solemn contract, she might at least rely on one branch of the American Legislature to palliate her offence? I have been told by a gentleman who has just returned from France, and who well knows the dispositions of her Government and of her people, that he has not a doubt, if the Senate had voted the appropriation of three millions of dollars, showing thereby united councils at home, the money would have been paid, and the whole matter satisfactorily settled, before the commencement of this session of Congress.

This refusal on the part of the Senate would not have placed itself in so strong a light to the French Government, had it not have come from that majority in the Senate which had been most liberal in voting away the public money. It should be understood by the people of the United States that, although there was a change in the administration in 1829, there has been no substantial change in the men who have lived on the public expenditures. The public deposits have been removed from the United States Bank; thanks to the people under the lead of that man who conquered another but not less potent enemy at New Orleans; the public deposits have been removed, but the drawers of the public money are the same men, four out of five, that they ever have been. The cormorants which feed on the bowels of the treasury have not flown away. They have looked to the Senate as the citadel of their protection—the Senate would deny the right of that Chief Magistrate, elected by the people for the purpose, to annoy them. To this class of men the majority of the Senate has always been generous; nay, it will be found that a majority of the Senate, in its last six sessions, has sanctioned, without scruple, the increase of officers and of official emoluments. Standing in this relation, it may truly be said that the Senate has exercised a greater power and influence in this Government to convert the public patronage and the public money into an electioneering engine, than any other department of the Government.

Decidedly as I had disapproved of the opinions of the Senators from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER], and South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] I was surprised and astounded at their avowals in this debate. Those avowals, Mr. President, and not the petty disputes about who was accountable for the fate of the fortification bill, at the last moment of the session; those avowals are what the nation will regard. Those avowals fix the true character of the rejection of the fortification bill. One Senator [Mr. WEBSTER] says he would not have voted the appropriation, if the enemy had been thundering at the walls of this Capitol. I regret that the Senator, in making this declaration, should discover that he had not repented of his course during the war of 1812; and if I had expected no better things of him at this period, I do most sincerely lament that the course of the other Senator, [Mr. CALHOUN,] who utters the craven sentiment that we ought not to arm lest we shall provoke a more powerful antagonist to hostilities, should have been downward. "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" I can but feebly express how much my then youthful heart was elated at the repeated perusal of the report on foreign relations, drawn by that gentleman, and made to the House of Representatives, June 3, 1812. I cannot better exhibit the spirit of that report than by reading one or two extracts:

"But the period has now arrived when the United States must support their character and station among the nations of the earth, or submit to the most shameful degradation. Forbearance has ceased to be a virtue. War on the one side, and peace on the other, is a situation as ruinous as it is disgraceful. The mad ambition, the lust of power, and commercial avarice, of Great Britain, arrogating to herself the complete dominion of the ocean, and exercising over it an unbounded and lawless tyranny, have left to neutral nations an alternative only between the base surrender of their rights and a manly vindication of them. Happily for the United States, their destiny, under the aid of Heaven, is in their own hands. The crisis is formidable only by their love of peace. As soon as it becomes a duty to relinquish that situation, danger disappears. They have suffered no wrongs, they have received no insults, however great, for which they cannot obtain redress."

"The British Government might for a while be satisfied with the ascendancy thus gained over us, (by submission,) and its pretensions would soon increase. The proof, of which so complete and disgraceful a submission to its authority would afford of our degeneracy, would not fail to inspire confidence that there was no limit to which its usurpations and our degradations might not be carried. Your committee, believing that the free-born sons of America are worthy to enjoy the liberty which their fathers purchased at the price of so much blood and treasure, and seeing in the measures adopted by Great Britain a course persisted in which must lead to a loss of national character and independence, feel no hesitation in advising resistance by force, in which the Americans of the present day will prove to the enemy, and to the world, that we have not only inherited that liberty which our fathers gave us, but also the will and power to maintain it. Relying on the patriotism of the nation, and confidently trusting that the Lord of Hosts will go with us to battle in a righteous cause, and crown our efforts with success, your committee recommend an immediate appeal to arms."

Here was an exhibition worthy the spirit of a free people—worthy any age and any country. My first admiration of the gentleman was for the doctrines he then advanced. His voice was then for war rather than disgrace. His maxim was then—millions for defence, but no submission. My disapprobation of the gentleman now is, that he has "left his own, to stand on foreign ground,"—that he has deserted the principles he at first inculcated. Both the Senators will excuse me when I declare that I am not of their communion. I go now, as I ever have gone, for appropriations to the utmost amount that can be efficiently and properly expended to put the country into a complete state of defence, and, if need be, to prosecute to a successful termination any war waged either for our honor or our rights.

Mr. LINN, after Mr. HILL had concluded, said:

I rise, Mr. President, merely for the purpose of preventing a misconstruction or misunderstanding of my course on the last night of the last session, in relation to the printing a document connected with the subject of private land claims in Missouri, and which was deemed necessary to a right understanding of the matter. I made two motions to print that document, both of which were lost in consequence of there being no quorum of the Senate present. It was a small affair, and would have cost the Government but a trifle for the work. But from the manner it is now brought into notice by the honorable member from New Hampshire, it would, without explanation, appear as if I had made a proposition to print public documents, the cost of which would amount to one or two hundred thousand dollars. I made no such proposition, nor did I vote for any such. They came from another quarter.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had a word which he wished to say before this subject should come up again. He thought the resolution was not direct enough. It was in these words:

"Resolved, That so much of the surplus revenue of the United States, and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States, as may be necessary for the purpose, ought to be set apart and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the country."

SENATE.]

Nathan Hale.

[FEB. 1, 1836.]

Now, this looked as if nothing but surplus revenue was to be applied to these great objects. That, sir, (said Mr. W.) is not direct enough for me. These important objects are primary and essential. They certainly are entitled to be satisfied out of the whole revenue, as being among the highest duties of the Government. They ought not, sir, to be postponed, and only charged upon the surplus. For one, I desire for an opportunity of voting directly and at once for all such appropriations as are necessary to put the country in a state of defence and permanent security. No object can claim preference over this; and I hope the mover of the resolution will modify it by striking out what is said about surplus, and let the resolution stand as a direct declaration that the revenue of the country, so far as is necessary, ought to be appropriated for the purpose of general defence and permanent security.

I am ready to vote for that, if it takes every dollar in the treasury, and I cannot doubt that the other members of the Senate are equally ready.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the subject was laid on the table; and it was Ordered, That, when the Senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

NATHAN HALE.

Among the petitions presented to-day was one, by Mr. NILES, of sundry citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, setting forth the extraordinary services, the great merits, and the untimely fate, of Captain Nathan Hale, of the revolutionary army, and praying that a monument may be erected to his memory.

Mr. NILES rose and said: I hold in my hand two petitions, signed by some of the first citizens of Connecticut; among the names are six gentlemen who have been members of Congress, the Chief Justice, and Governor of the State. These petitions present, for the consideration of Congress, the extraordinary services and untimely and melancholy fate of Nathan Hale, a youthful patriot of the Revolution, praying Congress to erect a monument to his memory near the sepulchre of his fathers. I understand that a similar petition was presented to the last Congress, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, who reported favorably in respect to the facts, and the great merits of Captain Hale; but deemed it inexpedient then to recommend any action on the part of Congress. But at this time, when a cloud hangs over our country, when we are threatened with the long sword of France; when there is some danger, I trust not much, of our being involved in war, there may perhaps be more disposition to cherish, in the breasts of American youths, that spirit of patriotism, that devotion to country, and that love of fame, which constitute so large a portion of the means of national defence. However this may be, it is my duty to present these petitions. I had thoughts of moving for a special committee, but fearing that may be deemed as asking too much, I shall move a reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, and have to beseech that committee to give to the subject further consideration. Were it not that a petition on this subject appears to have been presented to the Senate the last session, I should suppose that honorable Senators might inquire, who is Nathan Hale? As this is a case of somewhat an unusual character, I hope to be excused for offering a few suggestions on the subject.

Captain Hale was one of those youthful patriots and heroes who, when the first gun was fired in a neighboring colony, when the first blood of American freemen was shed in the streets of Lexington, abandoned his home, his studies, and all the prospects of peaceful pursuits, and repaired to the scene of danger. The first intelligence of these events was received in the towns on the eastern border of Connecticut on Saturday; and General Putnam received the news when ploughing in his field. This American Cincinnatus immediately left his work, and repaired to Boston, leaving his plough in the furrow, where it remained until he returned from the war. Farther west, in the towns on Connecticut river, this news was received on the Sabbath, and during the hours of public worship. In many instances, notwithstanding the devotional character of that people, the public worship was suspended, and the meetings dissolved. In other places, individuals, more ardent than others, procured drums, and, appearing in front of the church, beat the drum as a signal to arms. Then, sir, it might be truly said that there were no Sabbaths in revolutionary times. Among the youth who were aroused by these appeals was Nathan Hale, then only twenty years of age, and a recent graduate at Yale College. He received a lieutenant's commission, and during his service at Boston was promoted to the rank of a captain, in Colonel Webb's regiment. He accompanied the American army to New York, and such was the confidence which General Washington had in his valor and discretion, that he selected him for the hazardous and difficult enterprise of passing within the enemy's lines on Long Island, to ascertain their situation and designs. This was an enterprise in which no laurels were to be won, and great risk incurred. But it was readily accepted by Captain Hale. He performed his mission, and had got nearly back to his quarters, when he was stopped by a piquet guard, and being recognised by a former friend, he betrayed him, and he was immediately hanged as a spy, without even the form of a trial. I had supposed that at that time there were no stories in Connecticut, but it seems there was one malignant enough to betray a friend and relative. Thus perished Nathan Hale, in the morning of life, and at the commencement of a career promising so much glory to himself and so much advantage to his country. Thus perished Nathan Hale, and lamenting that he had but one life to lose for his country.

I also hold a document, which I offer, to accompany these petitions. It has no particular reference to the case of Captain Hale, except so far as it goes to show the general whig spirit which at that early period prevailed in Connecticut, and which no doubt contributed to inspire in the breast of this noble youth that ardent love of liberty and that daring patriotism which led him into the field of danger, and inscribed his name on the list of the first martyrs in that glorious struggle. This document consists of copies of sundry acts and resolutions of the General Assembly of the colony, passed in May and June, 1776, which prove that before the first motion for independence was made in Congress, the colony of Connecticut had virtually separated itself from the dominion and authority of the British Crown. One is an act repealing the law in relation to high treason, by conspiring against the life or authority of the British monarch. The other changes the forms of all legal proceedings, directing that the name of his Majesty be no longer used in any writ or other civil process. The third is a resolution instructing the delegates of the colony in Congress to propose the independence of the several colonies, and the establishment of a confederation among the colonies. This was adopted in June; and, it would seem, before the subject had been brought before Congress. That, in the adoption of these resolutions, Connecticut was in advance of some of the other colonies, I would by no means assert; for I believe some of them had adopted similar resolutions; but none, I presume, had gone farther, or taken a more bold and decided stand. I do not find these resolutions, or any reference to them, on the journals of the old Congress; nor do I find any resolutions or instructions from any of the colonies, except that on the 27th of May, '76, it is entered on the journal, that instructions to the delegates of those States were presented from Virginia and North Carolina, which probably related to the question of independence. The instructions are not entered on the journal. As these acts and resolutions are short, I move that they be read; and they should be preserved in the archives of this Government, as they belong to the history of the Union. Perhaps we may catch some of the whig spirit of '76. Sir, the whigs of that day did not fear to arm; when their liberties were invaded, they did not count the cost of defending them. They met the crisis like men worthy to be free, and staked upon its issue their lives, their fortunes, and every thing dear to man this side the grave. The petitioners do not come here to ask of Congress to honor the memory of a distinguished son of Connecticut because the State is unwilling and unable to do it, but because they believe it belongs to Congress. He was not in the service of the State; he was not defending his native soil; he was in the service of the continent, and in that service periled and lost his life. The State has erected a monument in honor of those brave men who were massacred on the heights of Groton, after a most gallant defence. I move the reading of the petition and document, and that they be referred.

The reading and reference was agreed to accordingly.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate took up the resolution submitted by Mr. BENTON for appropriating the surplus revenue to the national defence.

Mr. BUCHANAN, who had the floor, rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: I am much better pleased with the first resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON], since he has modified it upon the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY.] When individuals have more money than they know how to expend, they often squander it foolishly. The remark applies, perhaps, with still greater force to nations. When our treasury is overflowing, Congress, who are but mere trustees for the people, ought to be especially on their guard against wasteful expenditures of the public money. The surplus can be applied to some good and useful purpose. I am willing to grant all that may be necessary for the public defence, but no more. I am therefore pleased that the resolution has assumed its present form. The true question involved in this discussion is, on whom ought the responsibility to rest for having adjourned on the 3d of March last without providing for the defence of the country? There can be no doubt a fearful responsibility rests somewhere. For my own part, I should have been willing to leave the decision of this question to our constituents. I am a man of peace, and dislike the crimination and recrimination which this discussion must necessarily produce; but it is vain to regret what cannot now be avoided. The friends of the administration have been attacked, and we must now defend ourselves. I deem it necessary, therefore, to state the reasons why I voted, on the 3d of March last, in favor of the appropriation of three millions for the defence of the country, and why I glory in that vote. The language used by Senators in reference to this appropriation has been very strong. It has been denounced as a violation of the constitution. It has been declared to be such a measure as would not have received the support of the minority, had they believed it could prevail, and that they would be held responsible for it. It has been stig-matized as most unusual—most astonishing—most surprising. And, finally, to cap the climax, it has been proclaimed that the passage of such an appropriation would be virtually to create a dictator, and to surrender the power of the purse and the sword into the hands of the President. I voted for that appropriation under the highest convictions of public duty, and I now intend to defend that vote against all these charges.

In examining the circumstances which not only justified this appropriation, but rendered it absolutely necessary, I am forced into the discussion of the French question. We have been told, that if we should go to war with France, we are the authors of that war. The Senator from New Jersey has declared that it will be produced by the boastful vanity of one man, the petulance of another, and the fitful violence of a third. It would not be difficult to conjecture who are the individuals to whom the Senator alludes. He has also informed us that, in the event of such a war, the guilt which must rest somewhere will be tremendous. Now, sir, I shall undertake to prove that scarcely an example exists in history of a powerful and independent nation having suffered such wrongs and indignities as we have done from France with so much patience and forbearance. If France should now resort to arms—if our defenceless seacoast should be plundered—if the blood of our citizens should be shed—the responsibility of the Senate, to use the language of the gentleman, will be tremendous. I shall not follow the example of the Senator, and say their guilt, because that would be to attribute to them an evil intention, which I believe did not exist.

In discussing this subject, I shall first present to the view of the Senate the precise attitude of the two nations towards each other, when the appropriation of three millions was refused, and then examine the reasons which have been urged to justify this refusal. After having done so, I shall exhibit our relations with France as they exist at the present moment, for the purpose of proving that we ought now to adopt the resolutions of the gentleman from Missouri, and grant all necessary appropriations for the defence of the country.

In discussing this subject it is not my intention to follow the fortification bill, either into the chamber of the committee of conference, or into the hall of the House of Representatives. It is not my purpose to explain the confusion which then existed, and which always must exist after midnight on the last evening of the session. I shall contend that the Senate ought to have voted the three millions; that the fortification bill ought to have passed the Senate with this amendment; and that, therefore, the Senate is responsible, not only for the loss of this appropriation, but for that of the entire bill. What, then, was the attitude in which we stood towards France at the moment when the Senate rejected this appropriation for the defence of the country? What, at that moment, was known, or ought to have been known, in regard to this question, by every Senator on this floor?

The justice of our claims upon France are now admitted by all mankind. Our generosity was equal to their justice. When she was crushed in the dust by Europe in arms, when her cities were garrisoned by a foreign foe, when her independence was trampled under foot, we refused to urge our claims. This was due to our ancient ally. It was due to our grateful remembrance of the days of other years. The testimony of Lafayette conclusively establishes this fact. In the Chamber of Deputies, on the 13th of June, 1833, he declared that we had refused to unite with the enemies of France in urging our claims in 1814 and 1815; and that, if we had done so, these claims would then have been settled. This circumstance will constitute one of the brightest pages of our history.

Was the sum secured to our injured fellow-citizens by the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, more than they had a right to demand? Let the report of our Committee on Foreign Relations, at the last session, answer this question. They concur entirely with the President in the statement he had made in his message, that it was absolutely certain the indemnity fell far short of the actual amount of our just claims, independently of damages and interest for the detention; and that it was well known at the time that, in this respect, the settlement involved a sacrifice. But there is now no longer room for any conjecture or doubt upon this subject. The commissioners under the treaty have closed their labors. From the very nature of their constitution, it became the interest of every claimant to reduce the other claims as much as possible, so that his own dividend might thus be increased. After a laborious and patient investigation, the claims which have been allowed by the commissioners amount to $9,352,193 47. Each claimant will receive but little more than half his principal at the end of a quarter of a century, after losing all the interest.

Why, then, has this treaty remained without execution on the part of France until this day? Our Committee on Foreign Relations, at the last session, declared their conviction that the King of France "had invariably, on all suitable occasions, manifested an anxious desire faithfully and honestly to fulfil the engagements contracted under his authority and his name." They say that "the opposition to the execution of the treaty and the payment of our just claims does not proceed from the King's Government, but from a majority in the Chamber of Deputies."

Now, sir, it is my purpose to contest this opinion, and to show, as I think I can conclusively, that it is not a just inference from the facts. And here, to prevent all possible misconstruction, either on this side or on the other side of the Atlantic, (if by any accident my humble remarks should ever travel to such a distance,) permit me to say that I am solely responsible for them myself. These opinions were in a great degree formed whilst I was in a foreign land, and were there freely expressed upon all suitable occasions. I was then beyond the sphere of party influence, and felt only as an American citizen. Is it not then manifest, to use the language of Mr. Livingston, in his note to the Count de Rigny of the 3d of August, 1834, that the French Government have never appreciated the importance of the subject at its just value? There are two modes in which the King could have manifested this anxious desire faithfully to fulfil the treaty. These are by words and by actions. When a man's words and his actions correspond, you have the highest evidence of his sincerity. Even then he may be a hypocrite in the eyes of that Being before whom the fountains of human action are unveiled. But when a man's words and his actions are at variance; when he promises, and does not perform, or even attempt to perform; when "he speaks the word of promise to the ear, and breaks it to the hope," the whole world will at once pronounce him insincere. If this be true in the transactions of common life, with how much more force does it apply to the intercourse between diplomatists? The deceitfulness of diplomacy has become almost a proverb. In Europe, the talent of overreaching gives a minister the glory of diplomatic skill. The French school has been distinguished in this art. To prove it I need only mention the name of Talleyrand. The American school teaches far different lessons. On this our success has, in a great degree, depended. The skilful diplomatists of Europe are foiled by the downright honesty and directness of purpose which have characterized all our negotiations. Even the established forms of diplomacy contain much unmeaning language, which is perfectly understood by every body, and deceives nobody. If ministers have avowed their sincerity, and their ardent desire to execute the treaty, to deny them, on our part, would be insulting, and might lead to the most unpleasant consequences. In forming an estimate of their intentions, therefore, every wise man will regard their actions rather than their words. By their deeds shall they be known. Let us, then, test the French Government by this touchstone of truth.

The ratifications of the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, were exchanged at Washington the 2d February, 1832. When this treaty arrived in Paris the French Chambers were in session, and they continued in session for several weeks. They did not adjourn until the 19th April. No time more propitious for preselecting this treaty to the Chambers could have been selected than that very moment. Europe then was, as I believe it still is, one vast magazine of gunpowder. It was generally believed that the Polish revolution was the spark which would produce the explosion. There was imminent danger of a continental war, in which France, to preserve her existence, would have to put forth all her energies. Russia, Prussia, and Austria, were armed, and ready for the battle. It was, then, the clear policy of France to be at a good understanding with the United States. If it had been the ardent desire of the King's Government to carry into effect the stipulations of the treaty, they would have presented it to the Chambers before their adjournment. This would undoubtedly have been the course pursued by any President of the United States under similar circumstances. But the treaty was not presented. I freely admit that this omission, standing by itself, might be explained by the near approach of the adjournment at the time the treaty arrived from Washington. It is one important link, however, in the chain of circumstances, which cannot be omitted.

The Government of the United States proceeded immediately to execute their part of the treaty. By the act of the 13th July, 1832, the duties on French wines were reduced according to its terms, to take effect from the day of the exchange of the ratifications. At the same session, the Congress of the United States, impelled, no doubt, by their kindly feelings towards France, which had been roused into action by what they believed to be a final and equitable settlement of all our disputes, voluntarily reduced the duty upon silks coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope to five per cent., whilst those from beyond were fixed at ten per cent. And, at the next session, on the 2d of March, 1833, this duty of five per cent. was taken off altogether; and ever since French silks have been admitted into our country free of duty. There is now, in fact, a discriminating duty of ten per cent. in their favor, over silks from beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

What has France gained by these measures in duties on her wines and her silks, which she would otherwise have been bound to pay? I have called upon the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of ascertaining the amount. I now hold in my hand a tabular statement, prepared at my request, which shows that, had the duties remained what they were at the date of the ratification of the treaty, these articles, since that time, would have paid into the treasury, on the 30th of September, 1834, the sum of $3,061,525. Judging from the large importations which have since been made, I feel no hesitation in declaring it as my opinion that, at the present moment, these duties would amount to more than the whole indemnity which France has engaged to pay to our fellow-citizens. Before the conclusion of the ten years mentioned in the treaty, she will have been freed from the payment of duties to an amount considerably above twelve millions of dollars.

By the same act of the 13th July, 1832, a board of commissioners was established to receive, examine, and decide, the claims of our citizens under the treaty, who were to meet on the 1st day of the following August. This act also directed the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the several instalments, with the interest thereon, payable to the United States in virtue of the convention, to be received from the French Government, and transferred to the United States in such manner as he may deem best. In this respect the provisions of the act correspond with the terms of the treaty, which prescribe that the money shall be paid into the hands of such person or persons as shall be authorized to receive it by the Government of the United States. Were the French Government immediately informed of all these proceedings? Who can doubt it? Certainly no one at all acquainted with the vigilance and zeal of their diplomatic agents.

The 19th of November, 1832, the day for the meeting of the Chambers, at length arrived. Every American was anxious to know what the King would say in his speech concerning the treaty. No one could doubt but that he would strongly recommend to the Chambers to make the appropriation of twenty-five millions of francs, the first instalment of which would become due on the 2d of February following. All, however, which the speech contained in relation to the treaty is comprised in the following sentences: "I have also ordered my ministers to communicate to you the treaty concluded on the 4th of July, 1831, between my Government and that of the United States of America. This arrangement puts an end to the reciprocal claims of the two countries." Now, sir, I am well aware of the brevity and non-committal character of King's speeches in Europe. I know the necessity which exists there for circumspection and caution. But, making every fair allowance for these considerations, I may at least say that the speech does not manifest an anxious desire to carry the treaty into effect. What might the King have said; what ought he to have said; what might he have said, had he felt this anxious desire? It might all have been embraced in a single additional sentence, such as the following: "The Congress of the United States have already provided for the admission of French wines into their ports upon the terms of this treaty, and have voluntarily reduced their duties upon French silks; I must therefore request you to grant me the means of discharging the first instalment, which will become due, under this treaty, on the 2d day of February next." The King did not even ask the Chambers for the money necessary to redeem the faith of France. In this respect, the debt due to the United States is placed in striking contrast to the Greek loan. Immediately after the two sentences of the speech which I have already quoted, the King proceeds: "You will likewise be called to examine the treaty by which Prince Otho, of Bavaria, is called to the throne of Greece. I shall have to request from you the means of guarantying, in union with my allies, a loan, which is indispensable for the establishment of the new State founded by our cares and concurrence." The establishment of the new State founded by our cares and concurrence! Russia, sir, has made greater advances by her skill in diplomacy than by her vast physical power. Unless I am much mistaken, the creation of this new State, with Prince Otho as its King, will accomplish the very object which it was the interest and purpose of France to defeat. It will, in the end, virtually convert Greece into a Russian province. I could say much more on the subject, but I forbear. My present purpose is merely to present, in a striking view, the difference between the King's language in relation to our treaty, and that treaty which placed the son of the King of Bavaria on the throne of Greece.

Time passed away, and the 2d February, 1833, the day when the first instalment under the treaty became due, arrived. It was to be paid "into the hands of such person or persons as shall be authorized by the Government of the United States to receive it." The money on that day ought to have been ready at Paris; but strange, but most wonderful as it may appear, although the Chambers had been in session from the 19th of November until the 2d of February, the King's Government had never even presented the treaty to the Chambers; had never even asked them for a grant of the money necessary to fulfil its engagements. Well might Mr. Livingston say that they had never properly appreciated the importance of the subject.

The Government of the United States, knowing that the King in his speech had promised to present the treaty to the Chambers, and knowing that they had been in session since November, might have taken means to demand the first instalment at Paris on the 2d day of February. Strictly speaking, it was their duty to do so, acting as trustees for the claimants. But they did not draw a bill of exchange at Washington for the first instalment, until five days after it had become due at Paris. This bill was not presented to the French Government for payment until the 23d of March, 1833. Even at that day the French ministry had not presented either the treaty, or a bill to carry it into effect, to the Chambers. The faith of France was thus violated by the neglect of the King's Government long before any bill was presented. They, and not the Chambers, are responsible for this violation. It was even impossible for the Chambers to prevent it. Had this treaty and bill been laid before them in time to have enabled them to redeem the faith of France, the loyalty of the French character would never have permitted them to be guilty of a positive violation of national honor. The faith of the nation was forfeited before they were called upon to act. The responsibility was voluntarily assumed by the King's ministers. The Chambers are clear of it. Besides, the ministry were all powerful with the Chambers during that session. They carried every thing they urged. Even the bill providing the means of guarantying the Greek loan became a law. Can it, then, for a single moment, be believed that, if a bill to carry into effect our treaty—a treaty securing such important advantages to France—had been presented at an early period of the session, and had been pressed by the ministry, they would have failed in the attempt? At all events, it was their imperative duty to pursue this course. The aspect of the political horizon in Europe was still lowering. There was still imminent danger of a general war. France was still in a position to make her dread any serious misunderstanding with the United States.

After all this, on the 26th March, the Duke de Broglie, in a note to Mr. Niles, our chargé d'affaires at Paris, stated that it was "a source of regret, and, indeed, of astonishment, that the Government of the United States did not think proper to have an understanding with that of France before taking this step." What step? The demand of an honest debt, almost two months after it had been due, under a solemn treaty. Indeed, the Duke, judging from the tone of his note, appears almost to have considered the demand an insult. To make a positive engagement to pay a fixed sum on a particular day, and, when that sum is demanded nearly two months after, to express astonishment to the creditor, would, in private life, be considered trifling and evasive.

National Defence.

The excuse made by the French ministry for their conduct is altogether vain. Had they dreaded the vote of the Chambers, had they been afraid to appear before them with their treaty and their bill, they would and they ought to have communicated their apprehensions to this Government, and asked it to suspend the demand of the money. But they had never whispered such a suspicion after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty; and the first intimation of it on this side of the Atlantic was accompanied by the astounding fact that the French Government had dishonored our bill. It is true that, before the treaty was signed, they had expressed some apprehensions to Mr. Rives on this subject. These, it would seem, from their subsequent conduct, were merely diplomatic, and intended to produce delay; because, from the date of the treaty, on the 4th July, 1831, until after our bill of exchange was dishonored, in March, 1833, no intimation of danger from that quarter was ever suggested. These circumstances made a great noise throughout Europe, and soon became the subject of general remark.

On the 6th of April, 1833, a year and more than two months after the exchange of the ratifications at Washington, the treaty and bill were first presented to the French Chambers. The session closed on the 25th of April, without any further action upon the subject. No attempt was made by the ministry to press it; and as the session would terminate so soon, perhaps no attempt ought to have been made. But, as a new session was to commence the day after the termination of the old, and to continue two months, a favorable opportunity was thus presented to urge the passage of the law upon the Chambers. Was this done? No, sir. The ministry still continued to pursue the same course. They suffered the remainder of the month of April to pass, the month of May to pass, and not until the 11th of June, only fifteen days before the close of the session, did they again present the bill to carry into effect the treaty. It was referred to a committee, of which Mr. Benjamin Delessert was the chairman. On the 18th of June he made a report. This report contains a severe reprimand of the French Government for not having presented the bill at an earlier period of the session, and expresses the hope that the treaty may be communicated at the opening of the next session. If we are to judge of the opinion of the Chamber from the tone and character of this report, instead of being hostile to the execution of the treaty, had it been presented to them in proper time, they felt every disposition to regard it in a favorable light. I shall read the whole report; it is very short, and is as follows:

"Gentlemen: The committee charged by you to examine the bill relative to the treaty concluded on the 4th of July, 1831, between France and the United States, has demanded a number of documents and reports, which must be examined, in order to obtain a complete knowledge of so important a transaction.

"The committee was soon convinced that a conscientious examination of these papers would require much time; and that, at so advanced a period of the session, its labors would have no definitive result. It regrets that, from motives which the Government only can explain, the bill was not presented earlier to the Chamber for discussion. It regrets this so much the more, as it is convinced of the importance of the treaty, which essentially interests our maritime commerce, our agriculture, and our manufactures.

"Several Chambers of Commerce, particularly those of Paris and Lyons, have manifested an ardent desire that the business should be speedily terminated.

"The committee would be satisfied if, after a deeper study of the question, it could enlighten the Chamber with regard to the justice of claims alleged by each of the parties to the treaty, and which form the basis of it; but as time does not allow a definitive report to be made on the subject, it considers itself as the organ of the Chamber, in expressing the wish that this treaty be communicated at the opening of the next session, and that its result may be such as to strengthen the bonds of friendship which must ever exist between two nations so long united by common interest and sympathy."

After a careful review of this whole transaction, I am convinced that the Government of France never would have pursued such a course towards us, had they entertained a just sense of our power and our willingness to exert it in behalf of our injured fellow-citizens. Had Russia or Austria been her creditors, instead of ourselves, the debt would have been paid when it became due, or, at the least, the ministers of the King would have exerted themselves in a far different manner to obtain the necessary appropriation from the Chambers. I am again constrained, however reluctantly, to adopt the opinion which I had formed at the moment. Our fierce political strife in this country is not understood in Europe, and, least of all, perhaps, in France. During the autumn in 1832, and the session of 1832-'33, it was believed abroad that we were on the very eve of a revolution; that our glorious Union was at the point of dissolution. I speak, sir, from actual knowledge. Whilst the advocates of despotism were looking forward, with eager hope, to see the last free republic blotted out from the face of nations, the friends of freedom throughout the world were disheartened, and dreaded the result of our experiment. The storm did rage in this country with the utmost violence. It is no wonder that those friends of liberty on the other side of the Atlantic, who did not know how to appreciate the recuperative energies of a free and enlightened people, governed by federal and State institutions of their own choice, should have been alarmed for the safety of the republic. For myself, I can say that I never felt any serious apprehension; yet the thrill of delight with which I received the news of the passage of the famous compromise law of March, 1833, can never be effaced from my memory. I did not then stop to inquire into the nature of its provisions. It was enough for me to know that the republic was safe, not only in my own opinion, but in the opinion of the world.

Suppose, sir, that the President of the United States, under similar circumstances, had withheld a treaty from Congress, requiring an appropriation, for fourteen months after it had been duly ratified, and had thus forfeited the national faith to a foreign Government, what would have been the consequence? Sir, he ought to have been, he would have been, impeached. No circumstances could ever have justified such conduct in the eyes of the American Congress or the American people.

After all the provocation which the President had received, as the representative of his country, what was his conduct? It might have been supposed that this violent man, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHAM] has designated him, would at once have recommended decisive measures. Judging from his energy, from his well-known devotion to the interests of his country, and, above all, from his famous declaration to ask nothing from foreign nations but what was right, and to submit to nothing wrong, I should have expected from him an indignant message at the commencement of the next session of Congress. Instead of that, the message of December, 1833, in relation to French affairs, is of the mildest character. It breathes a spirit of confident hope that our ancient ally would do us justice during the next session of the Chambers. His exposition of this subject is concluded by the following declaration:

"As this subject involves important interests, and has attracted a considerable share of the public attention, I have deemed it proper to make this explicit statement of its actual condition; and should I be disappointed in the hope now entertained, the subject will be again brought to the notice of Congress in such a manner as the occasion may require."

And thus ends the first act of this astonishing historical drama. Throughout the whole of it, beginning, middle, and end, the French Government, and not the French Chambers, were exclusively to blame.

We have now arrived at the mission of Mr. Livingston. He reached Paris in September, 1833. The Duke de Broglie assured him "that the King's Government would willingly and without hesitation promise to direct the deliberations of the Chambers to the projet de loi relative to the execution of the convention of July 4, 1831, on the day after the Chamber is constituted, and to employ every means to secure the happy conclusion of an affair, the final determination of which the United States cannot desire more ardently than ourselves." After this assurance, and after all that had passed, it was confidently expected that the King would, in strong terms, have recommended the adoption of the appropriation by the Chambers. In this we were again doomed to disappointment. In his opening speech he made no direct allusion to the subject. He simply says that "the financial laws, and those required for the execution of treaties, will be presented to you."

The bill was presented, and debated, and finally rejected by the Chamber of Deputies on the 1st day of April, 1834, by a vote of 176 to 168. It is not my present purpose to dwell upon the causes of this rejection. No doubt, the principal one was that the French ministers were surprised near the conclusion of the debate, and were unable at the moment to show that the captures at St. Sebastian's were not included in our treaty with Spain. I am sorry they were not better prepared upon this point; but I attribute to them no blame.

It has been urged over and over again, both on this floor and elsewhere, that the rejection of the treaty was occasioned by the publication, in this country, of Mr. Rives's letter to Mr. Livingston, of the 8th of July, 1831. Is this the fact? If it be so, it ought to be known to the world. If it be not, both the character of this Government and of Mr. Rives should be rescued from the imputation. What is the opinion expressed in this letter? Is it that the American claimants would obtain, under the treaty, more than the amount of their just claims? No such thing. Is it that they would obtain the amount of their just claims, with interest? Not even this. The negotiator merely expresses the opinion that they would receive every cent of the principal. He does not allege that they would receive one cent of interest for a delay of nearly a quarter of a century. This opinion is evidently founded upon that expressed by Mr. Gallatin, in a despatch dated on the 14th January, 1822, cited by Mr. Rives, in which the former expresses his belief that five millions of dollars would satisfy all our just claims. It ought to be observed that the sum stipulated to be paid by the treaty is only twenty-five million francs, or, about four million seven hundred thousand dollars; and that more than nine years had elapsed between the date of Mr. Gallatin's despatch and the signing of the treaty. These facts all appear on the face of the letter, with the additional fact that the statements of the claimants, which have, from time to time, been presented to Congress, carry the amount of the claims much higher. These statements, however, Mr. Rives did not believe were a safe guide. This is the amount of the letter, when fairly analyzed, which, it is alleged, destroyed the treaty before the French Chambers. If a copy of it had been placed in the hands of every deputy, it could not possibly have produced any such effect. That it did not occasion the rejection of the treaty is absolutely certain. I have examined the whole debate, for the purpose of discovering any allusion to this letter; but I have examined it in vain. Not the slightest trace of the letter can be detected in any of the numerous speeches delivered on that occasion. The topics of opposition were various, and several of them of a strange character; but the letter is not even once alluded to throughout the whole debate. If its existence were known at the time in the French Chamber, this letter, written by a minister to his own Government, expressing a favorable opinion of the result of his own negotiations, was a document of a character so natural, so much to be expected, that not one deputy in opposition to the treaty believed it to be of sufficient importance even to merit a passing notice. Still, I have often thought it strange it had never been mentioned in the debate. The mystery is now resolved. The truth is, this letter, which is alleged to have produced such fatal effects, was entirely unknown to the members of the French Chamber when they rejected the treaty. This fact is well established by a letter from Mr. Jay, the chairman of the committee appointed by the Chamber of Deputies to investigate our claims, addressed to Mr. Gibbs, and dated at Paris on the 24th of January, 1835. I shall read it:

Extract of a letter from Mr. Jay to Mr. Gibbs, dated 24th January, 1835.

"It is asserted in the American prints that the rejection of the American treaty by the Chamber of Deputies, at their last session, was chiefly owing to the publication of a letter from Mr. Rives to his own Government. This is an error, which justice to that distinguished statesman, and a sense of his unremitting exertions to promote the interests of his Government while here, induce me formally to contradict. No such evidence appears in the debates; and in none of my conversations with the members have I ever heard his letter alleged as the motive for disputing the amount due. I much question, indeed, if any other Deputy than myself ever read the letter alluded to."

We have now arrived at that point of time when a majority of the French Chamber arrayed themselves against the treaty. This decision was made on the 1st of April, 1834. Some apprehensions then prevailed among the King and his ministers. The business was now becoming serious. New assurances had now become necessary to prevent the President from presenting the whole transaction to Congress, which they knew would still be in session when the information of the rejection would reach the United States. In his annual message at the commencement of the session, it will be recollected, he had declared that, should he be disappointed in the hope then entertained, he would again bring the subject before Congress in such a manner as the occasion might require. They knew that he was a man who performed his promises, and a great effort was to be made to induce him to change his purpose.

Accordingly a French brig of war, the Cuirassier, is fitted out with despatches to Mr. Serurier. They reached him on the 3d of June. On the 4th he has an interview with Mr. McLane, and makes explanations, which the latter very properly requests may be reduced to writing. In compliance with this request the French minister, on the 5th, addresses a note to Mr. McLane. After expressing the regrets, of the French Government at the rejection of the bill, he uses the following language:

"The King's Government, sir, after this rejection, the object of so much painful disappointment to both Governments, has deliberated, and its unanimous determination has been to make an appeal from the first vote of the present Chamber to the next Chamber, and to appear before the new Legislature with its treaty and its bill in hand. It flatters itself that the light already thrown upon this serious question, during these first debates, and the expression of the public wishes becoming each day more clear and distinct, and, finally, a more mature examination, will have in the mean time modified the minds of persons, and that its own conviction will become the conviction of the Chambers. The King's Government, sir, will make every loyal and constitutional effort to that effect, and will do all that its persevering persuasion of the justice and of the mutual advantages of the treaty authorizes you to expect from it. Its intention, moreover, is to do all that our constitution allows to hasten as much as possible the period of the new presentation of the rejected law.

"Such, sir, are the sentiments, such the intentions, of his Majesty's Government. I think I may rely that, on its part, the Government of the republic will avoid, with foreseeing solicitude, in this transitory state of things, all that might become a cause of fresh irritation between the two countries, compromise the treaty, and raise up an obstacle, perhaps insurmountable, to the views of reconciliation and harmony which animate the King's council."

Now, sir, examine this letter even without any reference to the answer of Mr. McLane, and can there be a doubt as to its true construction? It was not merely the disposition, but "it was the intention of the King's Government to do all that their constitution allows to hasten as much as possible the period of the new presentation of the rejected law." The President knew that, under the constitution of France, the King could at any time convoke the Chambers upon three weeks' notice. It was in his power, therefore, to present this law to the Chambers whenever he thought proper. The promise was, to hasten this presentation as much as possible. Without any thing further, the President had a right confidently to expect that the Chambers would be convoked in season to enable him to present their decision to the Congress of the United States in his annual message. The assurance was made on the 5th June, and Congress did not assemble until the beginning of December. But the letter of Mr. McLane of the 27th June removes all possible doubt from this subject. He informs M. Serurier that "The President is still unable to understand the causes which led to the result of the proceeding in the Chamber, especially when he recollected the assurances which had so often been made by the King and his ministers, of their earnest desire to carry the convention into effect, and the support which the Chamber had afforded in all the other measures proposed by the King."

And again:

"The assurances which M. Serurier's letter contains of the adherence of the King's Government to the treaty, of its unanimous determination to appeal from the decision of the present to the new Chamber, and its conviction that the public wish, and a mature examination of the subject, will lead to a favorable result, and its intention to make every constitutional effort to that effect, and, finally, its intention to do all that the constitution allows to hasten the presentation of the new law, have all been fully considered by the President.

"Though fully sensible of the high responsibility which he owes to the American people, in a matter touching so nearly the national honor, the President, still trusting to the good faith and justice of France, willing to manifest a spirit of forbearance so long as it may be consistent with the rights and dignity of his country, and truly desiring to preserve those relations of friendship which, commencing in our struggle for independence, form the true policy of both nations, and sincerely respecting the King's wishes, will rely upon the assurances which M. Serurier has been instructed to offer, and will therefore await with confidence the promised appeal to the new Chamber.

"The President, in desiring the undersigned to request that his sentiments on this subject may be made known to his Majesty's Government, has instructed him also to state his expectation that the King, seeing the great interests now involved in the subject, and the deep solicitude felt by the people of the United States respecting it, will enable him, when presenting the subject to Congress, as his duty will require him to do at the opening of their next session, to announce at that time the result of that appeal, and of his Majesty's efforts for its success."

Had this letter of Mr. McLane placed a different construction upon the engagement of the French Government from that which M. Serurier intended to communicate, it was his duty to make the necessary explanations without delay. He, in that case, would have done so instantly. It was a subject of too much importance to suffer any misapprehension to exist concerning it for a single moment.

Notwithstanding all which had passed, the President, on the faith of those assurances of the French Government, suffered Congress to adjourn without presenting the subject to their view. This rash, this violent man, instigated by his own good feelings towards our ancient ally, and by his love of peace, determines that he would try them once more—that he would once more extend the olive branch before presenting to Congress and the nation a history of our wrongs. I confess I do not approve of this policy. I think the time had then arrived to manifest to France some sensibility on our part on account of her delay in executing the treaty. I believe that such a course would have been dictated by sound policy.

What were the consequences of this new manifestation of the kindly feelings of the President towards France? Was it properly appreciated by the French Government? Was it received in the same liberal and friendly spirit from which it had proceeded? Let the sequel answer these questions. I shall read you Mr. Livingston's opinion on the subject. In a letter to Mr. Forsyth, under date of the 22d November, 1834, he thus expresses himself:

"I do not hope for any decision on our affairs before the middle of January. One motive for delay is an expectation that the message of the President may arrive before the discussion, and that it may contain something to show a strong national feeling on the subject. This is not mere conjecture; I know the fact; and I repeat now, from a full knowledge of the case, what I have more than once stated in my former despatches as my firm persuasion, that the moderate tone taken by our Government when the rejection was first known, was attributed by some to indifference, or to a conviction on the part of the President that he would not be supported in any strong measure by the people, and by others to a consciousness that the convention had given us more than we were entitled to ask."

I shall now proceed to show in what manner the French Government performed the engagement which has been made by their representative in Washington to hasten the presentation of the rejected law as much as possible.

The Chambers met on the 31st July, and the King made them a speech. This speech contains no allusion to the subject of the treaty except the following: "The laws necessary for carrying treaties into effect, and those still required for the accomplishment of the promises of the Chamber, will be again presented to you in the course of this session." The rejected bill was not presented. After a session of two weeks, the Chambers were prorogued on the 16th August until the 29th December, a day almost a month after the next meeting of Congress. I admit that strong reasons existed for dispensing with that part of the obligation which required the French Government to present the bill at this short session. No good reason has ever been alleged to excuse them for proroguing the Chambers until so late a day as the 29th of December. They might have met, and they ought to have met, at an early period of the autumn. They have heretofore met, on different occasions, for the despatch of business, in every month of the year. It was in vain that Mr. Livingston urged the necessity of an early meeting on the Count de Rigny. It was in vain that he appealed to the positive engagement of the French Government made by M. Serurier. It was in vain that he declared to him "that the President could not, at the opening of the next session of Congress, avoid laying before that body a statement of the then position of affairs on this interesting subject, nor, under any circumstances, permit that session to end, as it must, on the 3d March, without recommending such measures as he may deem that justice and the honor of the country may require." All his remonstrances were disregarded. Instead of hastening the presentation of the rejected law as much as possible, they refused to assemble the Chambers in time even to present the bill before the meeting of Congress. Their meeting was so long delayed as to render it almost impossible that their determination should be known in this country before the close of the session, notwithstanding the President had agreed not to present the subject to Congress at the previous session, under a firm conviction that he would receive this determination in time to lay it before them at the commencement of their next session. Is there a Senator in this hall who can believe for a moment that if the President had been informed the rejected bill would not be laid before the Chambers until the 29th December, he would have refrained from communicating to Congress, at their previous session, the state of the controversy between the two countries? Upon this construction, the engagement of the French Government was mere words, without the slightest meaning; and the national vessel which brought it in such solemn form might much better have remained at home.

What was the apology, what the pretext, under which the King's Government refused to assemble the Chambers at an earlier period? It was that M. Serurier had made no engagement to that effect, and that the intention which he expressed in behalf of his Government to do all that the constitution allows, to hasten as much as possible the period of the new presentation of the rejected law, meant no more than that this was their disposition. The word "intention" is thus changed into "disposition" by the Count de Rigny, and the whole engagement, which was presented to the President in such an imposing form, was thus converted into a mere unmeaning profession of their desire to hasten this presentation as much as possible.

Sir, at the commencement of the session of Congress, it became the duty of the President to speak; and what could any American expect that he would say? The treaty had been violated in the first instance by the ministers of the French King, in neglecting to lay it before the Chambers until after the first instalment was due. It was then twice submitted at so late a period of the session that it was impossible for the Chambers to examine and decide the question before their adjournment. On the last of these occasions, the chairman of the committee to which the subject was referred had reported a severe reprimand against the Government for not having sooner presented the bill, and expressed a hope that it might be presented at an early period of the next session. It was then rejected by the Chamber of Deputies; and, when the French Government had solemnly engaged to hasten the presentation of the rejected law as soon as their constitution would permit, they prorogued the Chambers to the latest period which custom sanctions, in the very face of the remonstrances of the minister of the United States. I ask again, sir, before such an array of circumstances, what could any man, what could any American, expect the President would say in his message? The cup of forbearance had been drained by him to the very dregs. It was then his duty to speak so as to be heard and to be regarded on the other side of the Atlantic. If the same spirit which dictated the message, or any thing like it, had been manifested by Congress, the money, in my opinion, would ere this have been paid.

The question was then reduced to a single point. We demanded the execution of a solemn treaty; it had been refused. France had promised again to bring the question before the Chambers as soon as possible. The Chambers were prorogued until the latest day. The President had every reason to believe that France was trifling with us, and that the treaty would again be rejected. Is there a Senator within the sound of my voice, who, if France had finally determined not to pay the money, would have tamely submitted to this violation of national faith? Not one!

The late war with Great Britain elevated us in the estimation of the whole world. In every portion of Europe, we have reason to be proud that we are American citizens. We have paid dearly for the exalted character we now enjoy among the nations, and we ought to preserve it, and transmit it unimpaired to future generations. To them it will be a most precious inheritance.

If, after having compelled the weaker nations of the world to pay us indemnities for captures made from our citizens, we should cower before the power of France, and abandon our rights against her, when they had been secured by a solemn treaty, we should be regarded as a mere hector among the nations. The same course which you have pursued towards the weak, you must pursue towards the powerful. If you do not, your name will become a by-word and a proverb.

But, under all the provocations which the country had received, what is the character of that message? Let it be scanned with eagle eyes, and there is nothing in its language at which the most fastidious critic can take offence. It contains an enumeration of our wrongs, in mild and dignified language, and a contingent recommendation of reprisals in case the indemnity should again be rejected by the Chambers. But in this, and in all other respects, it defers entirely to the judgment of Congress. Every idea of an intended menace is excluded by the President's express declaration. He says: "Such a measure ought not to be considered by France as a menace. Her pride and power are too well known to expect any thing from her fears, and preclude the necessity of the declaration that nothing partaking of the character of intimidation is intended by us."

I ask, again, is it not forbearing in its language? Is there a single statement in it not founded upon truth? Does it even state the whole truth against France? Are there not strong points omitted? All these questions must be answered in the affirmative. On this subject we have strong evidence from the Duke de Broglie himself. In his famous letter to M. Pageot of June 17th, 1835—the arrow of the Parthian as he flew—this fact is admitted. He says:

"If we examine in detail the message of the President of the United States, (I mean that part of it which concerns the relations between the United States and

SENATE.]

National Defence.

[FEB. 1, 1836.]

France,) it will possibly be found that, passing successively from phrase to phrase, none will be met that cannot bear an interpretation more or less plausible, nor of which, strictly speaking, it cannot be said that it is a simple expose of such a fact, true in itself, or the assertion of such or such a right, which no one contests, or the performance of such or such an obligation imposed on the President by the very nature of his functions. There will certainly be found several in which the idea of impeaching the good faith of the French Government, or of acting upon it through menace or intimidation, is more or less disavowed."

It was the whole message, and not any of the detached parts, at which the French Government chose to take offence. It is not my present purpose to discuss the propriety of the recommendation of reprisals, or whether that was the best mode of redress which could have been suggested. Some decided recommendation, however, was required from the Executive, both by public opinion and by the wrongs which we had so long patiently endured. Who can suppose that the Executive intended to menace France, or to obtain from her fears what would be denied by her sense of justice? The President, in this very message, expressly disclaims such an idea. Her history places her far above any such imputation. The wonder is, how she could have ever supposed the President, against his own solemn declaration, intended to do her any such injustice. She ought to have considered it as it was, a mere executive recommendation to Congress, not intended for her at all—not to operate upon her fears, but upon their deliberations in deciding whether and what measures should be adopted to secure the execution of the treaty. But on this subject I shall say more hereafter.

We have now arrived at the special message of the President to Congress, of the 26th February last—a document which has a most important bearing on the appropriation of the three millions which was rejected by the Senate. I have given this historical sketch of our controversy with France, for the purpose of bringing Senators to the very point of time, and to the precise condition of this question, when the Senate negatived that appropriation.

What had Congress done in relation to the French question when this message was presented to us? Nothing, sir; nothing. The Senate had unanimously passed a resolution, on the 15th January, that it was inexpedient, at present, to adopt any legislative measure in regard to the state of affairs between the United States and France. This unanimity was obtained by two considerations. The one was, that the French Chambers had been convened, though not for the purpose of acting upon our treaty, on the 1st instead of the 29th of December—a fact unknown to the President at the date of his message. The other, that this circumstance afforded a reasonable ground of hope that we might learn their final determination before the close of our session on the 3d March. But, whatever may have been the causes, the Senate had determined that, for the present, nothing should be done.

In the House of Representatives, at the date of the special message, on the 26th February, no measure whatever had been adopted. The President had just cause to believe that the sentiments contained in his message to Congress, at the commencement of their session, were not in unison with the feelings of either branch of the Legislature. He therefore determined to lay all the information in his possession before Congress, and leave it for them to decide whether any or what measures should be adopted for the defence of the country. I shall read this message. It is as follows:

"I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of all the letters received from Mr.

Livingston since the message to the House of Representatives of the 16th instant, of the instructions given to that minister, and of all the late correspondence with the French Government, in Paris or in Washington, except a note of Mr. Serurier, which, for the reasons stated in the report, is not now communicated.

"It will be seen that I have deemed it my duty to instruct Mr. Livingston to quit France with his legation, and return to the United States, if an appropriation for the fulfilment of the convention shall be refused by the Chambers.

"The subject being now, in all its present aspects, before Congress, whose right it is to decide what measures are to be pursued on that event, I deem it unnecessary to make further recommendation, being confident that, on their part, every thing will be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country which the occasion requires."

The President leaves the whole question to Congress. What was the information then communicated? That a very high state of excitement existed against us in France. That the French minister had been recalled from this country; an act which is generally the immediate precursor of hostilities between nations. Besides, Mr. Livingston, who was a competent judge, and on the spot, with the best means of knowledge, informed his Government that he would not be surprised, should the law be rejected, if they anticipated our reprisals by the seizure of our vessels in port, or the attack of our ships in the Mediterranean by a superior force. Such were his apprehensions upon this subject, that he felt it to be his duty, without delay, to inform Commodore Patterson of the state of things, so that he might be upon his guard. Ought these apprehensions of Mr. Livingston to have been disregarded? Let the history of that gallant people answer this question. How often has the injustice of their cause been concealed from their own view by the dazzling brilliancy of some grand and striking exploit? Glory is their passion, and their great Emperor, who knew them best, often acted upon this principle. To anticipate their enemy, and commence the war with some bold stroke, would be in perfect accordance with their character.

Every Senator, when he voted upon the appropriation, must have known, or at least might have known, all the information which was contained in the documents accompanying the President's message. It has been objected that, if the President desired this appropriation of three millions, he ought to have recommended it in his message. I protest against this principle. He acted wisely, discreetly, and with a becoming respect for Congress, to leave the whole question to their decision. This was especially proper, as we had not thought proper to adopt any measure in relation to the subject.

Suppose the President had, in his special message, recommended this appropriation, what would have been said, and justly said, upon the subject? Denunciations the most eloquent would have resounded against him throughout the whole country, from Georgia to Maine. It would have every where been proclaimed as an act of executive dictation. In our then existing relations with France, it would have been said, and said with much force, that such a recommendation from the Executive might have had a tendency to exasperate her people, and produce war. Besides, I shall never consent to adopt the principle that we ought to take no measures to defend the country without the recommendation of the Executive. This would be to submit to that very dictation against which on other occasions gentlemen themselves have so loudly protested. No, sir; I shall always assert the perfect right of Congress to act upon such subjects, independently of any executive recommendation.

FEB. 1, 1836.]

National Defence.

[SENATE.]

This special message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations in the House of Representatives on the 25th February. On the next day they reported three resolutions, one of which was, "that contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France." The session was rapidly drawing to a close. But a few days of it then remained. It would have been vain to act upon this resolution. It was a mere abstraction. Had it been adopted, it could have produced no effect; the money was wanted to place the country in a state of defence, and not a mere opinion that it ought to be granted. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, therefore, on the 28th February, had this resolution laid upon the table, and gave notice that he would move an amendment to the fortification bill, appropriating three millions of dollars, one million to the army and two millions to the navy, to provide for the contingent defence of the country.

It has been urged that, because the President, in his last annual message, has said that this contingent appropriation was inserted according to his views, some blame attaches to him from the mode of its introduction. Without pretending to know the fact, I will venture the assertion that he never requested any member, either of this or the other branch of the Legislature, to make such a motion. He had taken his stand—he had left the whole subject to Congress. From this he never departed. If the chairman of any committee, or any other member of the Senate or the House, called upon him to know his views upon the subject, he no doubt communicated them freely and frankly. This is his nature. Surely no blame can attach to him for having expressed his opinion upon this subject to any member who might ask it. It has been the uniform course pursued on such occasions.

On the 2d of March the House of Representatives, by a unanimous vote, resolved that, in their opinion, the treaty with France of the 4th July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on. This was no party vote. It was dictated by a common American feeling, which rose superior to party. After this solemn declaration of the House, made in the face of the world, how could it be supposed they would adjourn without endeavoring to place the country in an attitude of defence? What, sir! the Representatives of the people, with an overflowing treasury, to leave the country naked and exposed to hostile invasion, and to make no provision for our navy, after having declared unanimously that the treaty should be maintained! Who could have supposed it?

On the 3d of March, upon the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. CAMBRELENGE,] and in pursuance of the notice which he had given on the 28th of February, this appropriation of three millions was annexed as an amendment to the fortification bill. The vote upon the question was 109 in the affirmative, and 77 in the negative. This vote, although not unanimous, like the former, was no party vote. The bill, thus amended, was brought to the Senate. Now, sir, let me ask, if this appropriation had proceeded from the House alone, without any message or any suggestion from the Executive, would not this have been a legitimate source? Ought such an appropriation to be opposed in the Senate because it had not received executive sanction? Have the Representatives of the people no right to originate a bill for the defence and security of their constituents and their country without first consulting the will of the President? For one, I shall never submit to any such slavish principle. It would make the Executive every thing, and Congress nothing.

Had the indemnity been absolutely rejected by the Chambers, the two nations would have been placed in a state of defiance towards each other. In such a condition it was the right, nay, more, it was the imperative duty, of the House of Representatives to make contingent preparation for the worst. The urgency of the case was still more striking, because, in ten or eleven of the States, Representatives could not be elected until months after the adjournment, and therefore Congress could not have been assembled to meet any emergency which might occur.

But, sir, does it require a recommendation of the Executive, or a vote of the House of Representatives, to originate such an appropriation? Any individual Senator or member of the House may do it with the strictest propriety. Did the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] ask the approbation of the President before he made the motion at the last session, which does him so much honor, to increase the appropriation for fortifications half a million? How did the amendments proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] to the fortification bill of the last session originate? I presume from the Committee on Finance, of which he was the chairman. No doubt he conferred with the head of the proper executive department, according to the custom in such cases; but still these appropriations of more than four hundred thousand dollars had their origin in that committee. It was a proper, a legitimate source. Is, then, the ancient practice to be changed? And must it become a standing rule that we are to appropriate no money without the orders or the expressed wish of the Executive? I trust not.

The form of this appropriation has been objected to. I shall read it:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy: Provided such expenditure shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

It has been urged that to grant the money in such general terms would have been a violation of the constitution. I do not understand that the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] at the present session, has distinctly placed it upon this ground. Other Senators have done so in the strongest terms. Is there any thing in the constitution which touches the question? It simply declares that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." Whether these appropriations shall be general or specific, is left entirely, as it ought to have been, to the discretion of Congress. I admit that, ex vi termini, an appropriation of money must have a reference to some object. But whether you refer to a class or to an individual, to the genus or to the species, your appropriation is equally constitutional. The degree of specification necessary to make the law valid never can become a constitutional question. The terms of the instrument are as broad and as general as the English language can make them. In this particular, as in almost every other, the framers of the constitution have manifested their wisdom and their foresight. Cases may occur and have occurred in the history of this Government, demanding the strictest secrecy—cases in which to specify would be to defeat the very object of the appropriation. A remarkable example of this kind occurs in the administration of Mr. Jefferson, to which I shall presently advert.

There are other cases in which, from the very nature of things, you cannot specify the objects of an appropriation without the gift of prophecy. I take the present to be a clear case of this description. The appropriation was contingent; it was to be for the defence of the country. How, then, could it have been specific? How could you foresee when, or where, or how, the attack of France would be made? Without this foreknowledge you could not designate when, or where, or how, it would become necessary to use the money. This must depend upon France, not upon ourselves. She might be disposed to confine the contest merely to a naval war. In that event it would become necessary to apply the whole sum to secure us against naval attacks. She might threaten to invade Louisiana, or any other portion of the Union. The money would then be required to call out the militia, and to march them and the regular army to that point. Every thing must depend upon the movements of the enemy. It might become necessary, in order most effectually to resist the contemplated attack, to construct steam frigates or steam batteries, or it might be deemed more proper to increase your ordinary navy, and complete and arm your fortifications. In a country where Congress cannot be always in session, you must, in times of danger, grant some discretionary powers to the Executive. This should always be avoided when it is possible, consistently with the safety of the country. But it was wise, it was prudent, in the framers of the constitution, in order to meet such cases, to declare, in general terms, that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." Not specific appropriations. The term is general and unrestricted. If the amendment had appropriated one million to fortifications, the second million to the increase of the navy, and the third to the purchase of ordnance and arms, it might have been found that a great deal too much had been appropriated to one object, and a great deal too little to another.

As a matter of expediency, as a means of limiting the discretion of executive officers, I am decidedly friendly to specific appropriations, whenever they can be made. I so declared in the debate at the last session. I then expressed a wish that this appropriation had been more specific; but, upon reflection, I do not see how it could have been much more so, unless we had possessed the gift of prophecy. But the constitution has nothing to do with the question.

After all, I attached more value to specific appropriations before I had examined this subject than I do at the present moment. Still, I admit their importance. The clause which immediately follows in the constitution is the true touchstone of responsibility. Although the appropriation may be general, yet "a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time." No matter in what language public money may be granted to the Executive, in its expenditure he is but the mere trustee of the American people, and he must produce to them his vouchers for every cent intrusted to his care. This constitutional provision holds him to a strict responsibility, much more severe than if Congress had been required in all cases to make specific appropriations.

How Senators can create a dictator, and give him unlimited power over the purse and the sword out of such an appropriation, I am at a loss to conceive. It is a flight of imagination beyond my reach. What, sir, to appropriate three millions for the military and naval defence of the country, in case it should become necessary during the recess of Congress, and at its next meeting to compel the President to account for the whole sum he may have expended! Is this to create a dictator? Is this to surrender our liberties into the hands of one man? And yet gentlemen have contended for this proposition.

What has been the practice of the Government in regard to this subject? During the period of our first two Presidents, appropriations were made in the most general terms. No one then imagined that this was a violation of the constitution. When Mr. Jefferson came into power this practice was changed. In his message to Congress of December 8, 1801, he says: "In our use, too, of the public contributions intrusted to our discretion, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition." Susceptible of definition! Here is the rule, and here is the exception. He treats the subject not as a constitutional question, but as one of mere expediency. In little more than two short years after this recommendation, Mr. Jefferson found it was necessary to obtain an appropriation from Congress in the most general terms. To have made it specific would necessarily have defeated its very object. Secrecy was necessary to success. Accordingly, on the 26th February, 1803, Congress made the most extraordinary appropriation in our annals. They granted to the President the sum of two millions of dollars "for the purpose of defraying any extraordinary expenses which may be incurred in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations." Here, sir, was a grant almost without any limit. It was coextensive with the whole world. Every nation on the face of the earth was within the sphere of its operation. The President might have used this money to subsidize foreign nations to destroy our liberties. That he was utterly incapable of such conduct it is scarcely necessary to observe. I do not know that I should have voted for such an unlimited grant. Still, however, there was a responsibility to be found in his obligation under the constitution to account for the expenditure. Mr. Jefferson never used any part of this appropriation. It had been intended for the purchase of the sovereignty of New Orleans and of other possessions in that quarter; but our treaty with France of the 30th April, 1803, by which Louisiana was ceded to us, rendered it unnecessary for him to draw any part of this money from the treasury under the act of Congress by which it had been granted.

Before the close of Mr. Jefferson's second term, it was found that specific appropriations, in the extent to which they had been carried, had become inconvenient. Congress often granted too much for one object, and too little for another. This must necessarily be the case, because we cannot say beforehand precisely how much shall be required for any one purpose. On the 3d of March, 1809, an act was passed, which was approved by Mr. Jefferson, containing the following provision:

"Provided, nevertheless, That, during the recess of Congress, the President of the United States may, and he is hereby authorized, on the application of the Secretary of the proper Department, and not otherwise, to direct, if in his opinion necessary for the public service, that a portion of the moneys appropriated for a particular branch of expenditure in that Department be applied to another branch of expenditure in the same Department; in which case a special account of the moneys thus transferred, and of their application, shall be laid before Congress during the first week of their next ensuing session."

Is this act constitutional? If it be so, there is an end of the question. Has its constitutionality ever been doubted? It authorizes the President to take the money appropriated by Congress for one specific object, and apply it to another. The money destined for any one purpose by an appropriation bill may be diverted from that purpose by the President, and be applied to any other purpose entirely different, with no limitation whatever upon his discretion, except that money to be expended by one of the Departments, either of War, or of the Navy, or of the Treasury, could not be transferred to another Department.

It is not my intention to cite all the precedents bearing upon this question. I shall merely advert to one other. On the 10th of March, 1812, Congress appropriated five hundred thousand dollars "for the purpose of fortifying and defending the maritime frontier of the United States." This was in anticipation of the late war with Great Britain, and is as general in its terms, and leaves as much to executive discretion, as the proposed appropriation of three millions.

I trust, then, that I have established the positions that this appropriation originated from a legitimate source, was necessary for the defence and honor of the country, and violated no provision of the constitution. If so, it ought to have received the approbation of the Senate.

When the fortification bill came back to the Senate with this appropriation attached to it by the House, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] instantly moved that it should be rejected. I feel no disposition to make any harsh observations in relation to that gentleman. I think, however, that his remark, that, if the enemy had been thundering at the gates of the Capitol, he would have moved to reject the appropriation, was a most unfortunate one for himself. I consider it nothing more than a bold figure of speech. I feel the most perfect confidence that the gentleman is now willing to vote all the money which may be necessary for the defence of the country. Of the gentleman's sincerity in opposing this appropriation I did not then, nor do I now, entertain a doubt. He was ardent and impassioned in his manner, and was evidently in a state of highly excited feeling. Probably, strong political prejudices may have influenced his judgment, without his knowledge. He thought that a high constitutional question was involved in the amendment, and acted accordingly. When the bill returned again to the Senate, after we had rejected and the House had insisted upon their amendment, the Senator immediately moved that we should adhere to our rejection. I well recollect, sir, that you (Mr. KING, of Alabama, was in the chair) remarked at the time that this was a harsh motion, and, should it prevail, would be well calculated to exasperate the feelings of the House, and to defeat the bill. You then observed that the proper motion would be to insist upon our rejection, and ask a conference, and that the motion to adhere ought not to be resorted to until all gentler measures had failed. The Senator now claims the merit, and is anxious to sustain the responsibility, of having moved to reject this appropriation. He also asks, in mercy, that when the expunging process shall commence, his vote upon this occasion may be spared from its operation.

For the sake of my country, and in undisguised sincerity of purpose, I declare, for the sake of the gentleman, I am rejoiced that the responsibility which he covets will probably not be so dreadful as we had just reason to apprehend. Had France attacked us, or should she yet attack us, in our present defenceless condition; should our cities be exposed to pillage, or the blood of our citizens be shed, either upon the land or the ocean; should our national character be dishonored, tremendous, indeed, would be the responsibility of the gentleman. In that event, he need not beseech us to spare his vote from the process of expunging. You might as well attempt to expunge a sunbeam. That vote will live for ever in the memory of the American people.

It was the vote of the Senate which gave the mortal blow to the fortification bill. Had they passed the appropriation of three millions, that bill would now have been a law. Where it died, it is scarcely necessary to inquire. It was in mortal agony when the consultation of six political doctors was held upon it at midnight, in our conference chamber, and it probably breathed its last on its way from that chamber to the House of Representatives, for want of a quorum in that body. Its fate, in one respect, I hope may yet be of service to the country. It ought to admonish us, if possible, to do all our legislative business before midnight on the last day of the session. I never shall forget the night I sat side by side, in the House of Representatives, with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] until the morning had nearly dawned. The most important bills were continually returning from the Senate, with amendments. It would have been in the power of any one member remaining in the House to have defeated any measure by merely asking for a division. This would have shown that no quorum was present. The members who still remained were worn down and exhausted, and were thus rendered incapable of attending to their duties. It was legislation without deliberation. I trust that this evil may be now corrected. Should it not, I do not know that, at the conclusion of a Congress, my conscience would be so tender as to prevent me from voting, as I have done heretofore, after midnight on the 3d of March.

I have one other point to discuss. I shall now proceed to present to the Senate the state of our relations with France at the present moment, for the purpose of proving that we ought to adopt the resolutions of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BAXTER,] and grant all appropriations necessary for the defence of the country. For this purpose, we must again return to Paris. The President's annual message of December, 1834, arrived in that city on the 8th of January following, a day propitious in our annals. The attack upon the British troops on the night of the 23d of December did not surprise them more than this message did the French ministers. After the most patient endurance of wrongs for so many years, they seemed to be astounded that the President should have asserted our rights in such a bold and manly manner. That message, sir, will eventually produce the payment of the indemnity. What effect had it upon the character of our country abroad? Let Mr. Livingston answer this question. In writing to the Secretary of State, on the 11th of January, 1835, he says: "It has certainly raised us in the estimation of other Powers, if I may judge from the demeanor of their representatives here; and my opinion is that, as soon as the first excitement subsides, it will operate favorably on the councils of France." There was not an American in Paris on that day who, upon the perusal of this message, did not feel the flush of honest pride of country mantling in his countenance.

On the 32d of November previous, Mr. Livingston was convinced that the King was sincere in his intention of urging the execution of the treaty, and then had no doubt of the sincerity of his cabinet. The Chambers assembled on the 1st of December; and, after an arduous struggle for two days against the opposition, victory perched upon the banner of the ministers. They were thus securely seated in their places. On the 6th of December Mr. Livingston again writes that "the conversations I had with the King and all the ministers convince me that now they are perfectly in earnest, and united on the question of the treaty, and that it will be urged with zeal and fidelity." In a few short days, however, a change came over their spirit. On the 22d of December Mr. Livingston uses the following language, in writing to the Department of State:

"My last despatch (6th of December) was written immediately after the vote of the Chamber of Deputies had, as it was thought, secured a majority to the administration, and it naturally excited hopes which that supposition was calculated to inspire. I soon found, however, both from the tone of the administration press and from the language of the King and all the ministers with whom I conferred on the subject, that they were not willing to put their popularity to the test on our question; it will not be made one on the determination of which the ministers are willing to risk their portfolios. The very next day after the debate, the ministerial gazette (Des Debats) declared that, satisfied with the approbation the Chamber had given to their system, it was at perfect liberty to exercise its discretion as to particular measures which do not form an essential part of that system; and the communications I subsequently had with the King and the ministers confirmed me in the opinion that the law for executing our convention was to be considered as one of those free questions. I combated this opinion, and asked whether the faithful observance of treaties was not an essential part of their system; and, if so, whether it did not come within their rule."

The observance of treaties was not an essential part of their system! Victorious and securely fixed, the ministers would not risk their places in attempting to obtain from the Chambers the appropriation required to carry our treaty into execution. It would not be made a cabinet question. It is evident they had determined to pursue the same course of delay and procrastination which they had previously pursued. But the message arrived, and it roused them from their apathy. All doubts which had existed upon the subject of making the payment of our indemnity a cabinet question at once vanished. We have never heard of any such since, and it was not until some months after that the French ministers thought of annexing any condition to this payment.

On the 13th of January Mr. Livingston had a conference with the Count de Rigny. He then explained to him the nature of a message from our President to Congress. He compared it to a family council under the French law, and showed that it was a mere communication from one branch of our Government to another, with which a foreign nation had no right to interfere, and at which they ought not to take offence. They parted on friendly terms, and again met on the same terms in the evening, at the Austrian ambassador's. Mr. Livingston was, therefore, much astonished when, about ten o'clock at night of the same day, he received a note from the Count, informing him that M. Serurier, the French minister at Washington, had been recalled, and that his passports were at his service. This seems to have been a sudden determination of the French cabinet.

Now, sir, upon the presumption that France had been insulted by the message, this was the proper mode of resenting the insult. Promptly to suspend all diplomatic intercourse with the nation who had menaced her or questioned her honor was a mode of redress worthy of her high and chivalrous character. The next impulse of wounded pride would be promptly to pay the debt which she owed, and release herself from every pecuniary obligation to the nation which had done her this wrong. These were the first determinations of the King's ministers.

France has since been placed before the world, by her rulers, in the most false position ever occupied by a brave and gallant nation. She believes herself to be insulted; and what is the consequence? She refuses to pay a debt now admitted to be just by all the branches of her Government. Her wounded feelings are estimated by dollars and cents; and she withholds twenty-five millions of francs, due to a foreign nation, to soothe her injured pride. How are the mighty fallen! Truly it may be said, the days of chivalry are gone. Have the pride and the genius of Napoleon left no traces of themselves under the constitutional monarchy? In private life, if you are insulted by an individual to whom you are indebted, what is the first impulse of a man of honor? To owe no pecuniary obligation to the man who has wounded your feelings; to pay him the debt instantly, and to demand reparation for the insult, or at the least to hold no friendly communication with him afterwards. This course the King's ministers had at first determined to pursue. The reason why they abandoned it I shall endeavor to explain hereafter.

Mr. Livingston, in his letter to Mr. Forsyth of the 14th of January, 1835, says:

"The law, it is said, will be presented to-day, and I have very little doubt that it will pass. The ministerial phalanx, re-enforced by those of the opposition (and they are not few) who will not take the responsibility of involving the country in the difficulties which they now see must ensue, will be sufficient to carry the vote."

Did Mr. Livingston intend to say that France would be terrified into this measure? By no means. But, in the intercourse between independent States, there is a point at which diplomacy must end, and when a nation must either abandon her rights, or determine to assert them by the sword, or by such strong and decided measures as may eventually lead to hostilities. When this point is reached, it becomes a serious and alarming crisis for those to whom, on earth, the destiny of nations is intrusted. When the one alternative is war, either immediate or prospective, with all the miseries which follow in its train, and the other the payment of a just debt to an ancient ally and firm friend, who could doubt what must be the decision? Such was the position in which France stood towards the United States. Not only justice, but policy, required the payment of the debt. In the event of war, or of a non-intercourse between the two nations, her wine growers, her producers and manufacturers of silk, and all her other manufacturing interests, especially those of her southern provinces, would be vitally injured. The payment of $5,000,000 would be but a drop in the ocean compared with the extent of their sufferings. In France they then believed that the time for diplomacy, the time for procrastination, had ended. The President's message had opened their eyes to the importance of the subject. It was under this impression that Mr. Livingston predicted that the bill would pass the Chambers. That it would have done so without any condition, had Congress responded to the President's message, I do not say by authorizing reprisals, but by manifesting a decided resolution to insist upon the execution of the treaty, will, I think, appear abundantly evident hereafter.

The French ministry having manifested their sensibility to the supposed insult by recalling M. Serurier, proceeded immediately to present the bill for the execution of the treaty to the Chambers. In presenting it, on the 15th January, M. Humann, the Minister of Finance, addressed the Chamber. His speech contains the views then entertained by the French cabinet. I shall read an extract from it. He says:

"General Jackson has been in error respecting the extent of the faculties conferred upon us by the constitution of the State; but if he has been mistaken as to the laws of our country, we will not fall into the same error with regard to the institutions of the United States. Now, the spirit and letter of those institutions authorize us to regard the document above named (the message) as the expression of an opinion merely personal, so long as that opinion has not received the sanction of the other two branches of the American Government. The message is a Government act, which is still incomplete, and should not lead to any of those determinations which France is in the habit of taking in reply to a threat or an insult."

National Defence.

[SENATE.]

The French ministry, then, considered the President's message merely his personal act, until it should receive the sanction of Congress. They then had not dreamt of requiring an explanation of it as the only condition on which they would pay the money. This was an afterthought. The bill presented by Mr. Humann merely prescribed that the payments should not be made "until it shall have been ascertained that the Government of the United States has done nothing to injure the interests of France." This bill was immediately referred to a committee, of which M. Dumon was the chairman. On the 28th March he reported it to the Chamber, with a provision that the money should not be paid if the Government of the United States shall have done anything "contrary to the dignity and the interests of France." Still we hear nothing of an explanation of the message being made a condition of the payment of the money. The clauses in the bill to which I have adverted were evidently inserted to meet the contingency of reprisals having been sanctioned by Congress.

The debate upon the bill in the Chamber of Deputies commenced on the 9th of April and terminated on the 18th. On that day General Valaze proposed his amendment declaring that "the payments in execution of the present law cannot be made until after the French Government shall have received satisfactory explanations with regard to the message of the President of the United States, dated the 2d December, 1834."

The Duke de Broglie, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, accepted this amendment. I shall read his remarks on this occasion. He says:

"The intention of the Government has always been conformable with the desire expressed by the author of the amendment which is now before the Chamber; (great agitation;) the Government has always meant that diplomatic relations should not be renewed with the Government of the United States until it had received satisfactory explanations. The Government, therefore, does not repulse the amendment itself."

After this, on the same day, the bill passed the Chamber by a vote of 289 to 137.

Well might the Chamber be agitated at such an announcement from the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Why this sudden change in the policy of the French Government? The answer is plain. Congress had adjourned on the 4th of March, without manifesting, by their actions, any disposition to make the fulfilment of the treaty a serious question. Whilst our treasury was overflowing, they had refused to make any provision for the defence of the country. They had left the whole coast of the United States, from Maine to Georgia, in a defenceless condition. The effect upon the French Chamber and the French people was such as might have been anticipated. To prove this, I shall read an extract from a speech delivered by M. Bignon, one of the Deputies, on the 10th April. I select this from many others, because it contains nothing which can be offensive to any Senator. It will be recollected that M. Bignon is the gentleman who had been more instrumental in defeating the bill at the previous session than any other member.

"President Jackson's message [says M. Bignon] has astonished them [the Americans] as well as us; they have seen themselves thrown by it into a very hazardous situation. What have they done? They are too circumspect and clear-headed to express, by an official determination, their disapproval of an act which, in reality, has not received their assent. Some of them, for instance, Mr. Adams, in the House of Representatives, may, indeed, from a politic patriotism, have even eulogized the President's energy, and obtained from the Chamber the expression that the treaty of 1831 must be complied with; but at a preceding sitting the same member took pains to declare that he was not the defender of a system of war; he proclaimed aloud that the resolution adopted by the Senate was an expedient suggested by prudence, and he thought the House of Representatives should pursue the same course. Gentlemen, the American Legislature had to resort to expedients to get out of the embarrassing dilemma in which the President's message had placed them; and they acted wisely."

From the conduct of Congress, the French Chambers were under the impression that the people of the United States would not adopt any energetic measures to compel the fulfilment of the treaty. They had no idea that the nation would sustain the President in his efforts. They had reason to believe that he was left almost alone. They appear ever since to have acted under this delusion. According to the impression of M. Bignon, the nation was astounded at President Jackson's message. This is the true reason why the ministry accepted the amendment requiring President Jackson to make an explanation.

The best mode of obtaining justice from the powerful as well as from the weak, the best mode of elevating this nation to the lofty position she is destined to occupy among the nations of the earth, the best mode of preventing war and preserving peace, is to stand up firmly for our rights. The assertion of these rights, not by threats, but boldly, manfully, and frankly, is the surest method of obtaining justice and respect from other nations.

At so early a day as the 29th of January Mr. Livingston addressed a note to the Duke de Broglie, distinctly disavowing any intention on the part of the President, by his message, to intimidate France, or to charge the French Government with bad faith. On the 25th of April, in another letter to the Duke, he communicated to him the President's official approbation of his former note. In this last letter he reiterates his explanations, and assures the Duke that, whilst the President intended to use no menace, nor to charge any breach of faith against the King's Government, he never could and never would make an explanation of his message on the demand of a foreign Government. This letter would, of itself, be sufficient to give its author a high rank, not only among the diplomatists, but the statesmen of his country. The sentiments it contains were unanimously approved by the American people. Although it was received by the Duke before the bill had been acted upon by the Chamber of Peers, it produced no effect upon the French ministry. The bill was finally passed, and obtained the sanction of the King, in a form requiring the President to explain his message before the money could be paid.

This state of facts distinctly raises the important question, whether a President of the United States can be questioned by a foreign Government for any thing contained in a message to Congress. The principle that he cannot has already been firmly established by the practice of our Government. Even in our intercourse with France, in former times, the question has been settled. This principle results from the very nature of our institutions. It must ever be maintained inviolate. Reverse it, and you destroy the independent existence of this republic, so far as its intercourse with foreign nations is concerned.

The constitution requires that the President of the United States "shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." This information is intended not only for the use of Congress, but of the people. They are the source of all power, and from their impulse all legitimate legislation must proceed. Both Congress and the people must be informed of the state of our foreign relations by the Executive. If the President cannot speak freely to them upon this subject, if he cannot give them all the information which may be necessary to enable them to act, except under the penalty of offending a foreign Government, the constitution of the United States to this extent becomes a dead letter. The maintenance of this principle is an indispensable condition of our existence, under the present form of Government.

National Defence.

[FEB. 1, 1836.]

If we are engaged in any controversy with a foreign nation, it is not only the right, but it is the imperative duty, of the President to communicate the facts to Congress, however much they may operate against that nation. Can we then, for a single moment, permit a foreign Government to demand an apology from the President for performing one of his highest duties to the people of the United States?

Let us put an extreme case. Suppose the President, after giving a history of our wrongs to Congress, recommends not merely a resort to reprisals, but to war, against another nation; shall this nation, which has inflicted upon us injury after injury, be permitted to change her position, to cancel all our claims for justice, and to insist that we have become the aggressors, because a resort to arms has been recommended? I feel the most perfect confidence that not a single Senator will ever consent to yield this position to France or to any other nation. I need not labor this question. The subject has been placed in the clearest and strongest light by Mr. Livingston, in his letter to the Duke de Broglie of the 25th of April.

If any possible exception to the rule could be tolerated, surely this would not present the case. The Duke de Broglie himself, in his letter to M. Pageot, is constrained to admit that there is not a single offensive sentence respecting France in the message, but yet he complains of the general effect of the whole.

With a full knowledge, then, that the President could not, would not, dare not, explain his message on the demand of any foreign Government, the Duke de Broglie addresses his famous letter to the chargé d'affaires of France at Washington. It bears date at Paris, on the 17th of June, 1835. Before I proceed to make any remarks upon this letter, I wish to bring its character distinctly into the view of the Senate. It commences by declaring, in opposition to the principle that the President of the United States cannot be called upon by a foreign Government to make explanations of a message to Congress, that, "by virtue of a clause inserted in article first, by the Chamber of Deputies, the French Government must defer making the payments agreed upon until that of the United States shall have explained the true meaning and real purport of divers passages inserted by the President of the Union in his message at the opening of the last session of Congress, and at which all France, at the first aspect, was justly offended."

It proceeds still further, and announces that "the Government having discovered nothing in that clause at variance with its own sentiments, or the course it had intended to pursue, the project of law thus amended on the 18th April by the Chamber of Deputies was carried on the 27th to the Chamber of Peers."

The Duke, after having thus distinctly stated that an explanation of the message was required as a condition of the payment of the money, and after presenting a historical sketch of the controversy, then controverts, at considerable length, the position which had been maintained by Mr. Livingston, that the President could not be questioned by a foreign Government for any thing contained in a message to Congress. He afterwards asserts, in the broadest terms, that the explanations which had been voluntarily made by Mr. Livingston, and sanctioned by the President, were not sufficient.

In suggesting what would satisfy France, he says:

"We do not here contend about this or that phrase, this or that allegation, this or that expression; we contend about the contention itself, which has dictated that part of the message."

And again, speaking of Mr. Livingston's letters of the 29th January and 25th April, he adds:

"You will easily conceive, sir, and the cabinet of Washington will, we think, understand it also, that such phrases incidentally inserted in documents, the purport and tenor of which are purely polemical, surrounded, in some measure, by details of a controversy, which is besides not always free from bitterness, cannot dispel sufficiently the impression produced by the perusal of the message, nor strike the mind as would the same idea expressed in terms single, positive, direct, and unaccompanied by any recrimination concerning facts or incidents no longer of any importance. Such is the motive which, among many others, has placed the French Government in the impossibility of acceding to the wish expressed by Mr. Livingston towards the inclusion of his note of the 29th of April, by declaring [to the Chamber of Peers probably] that previous explanations given by the minister of the United States, and subsequently approved by the President, had satisfied it."

After having thus announced the kind of explanation which would be expected, he states that the French Government, "in pausing then for the present, and waiting for the fulfilment of those engagements to be claimed, (the engagements of the treaty,) and expecting those to be claimed in terms consistent with the regard due to it, is not afraid of being accused, nor France, which it represents, of being accused, of appreciating national honor by any number of millions which it could withhold as a compensation for any injury offered to it." The letter concludes by authorizing M. Pageot to read it to Mr. Forsyth, and, if he be desirous, to let him take a copy of it.

It is impossible to peruse this letter, able and ingenious as it is, without at once perceiving that it asks what the President can never grant, without violating the principle that France has no right to demand an explanation of his message.

On the 11th of September M. Pageot, the French chargé d'affaires, called at the Department of State, and read this despatch to Mr. Forsyth. The latter did not think proper to ask a copy of it; and for this he has been loudly condemned. In my judgment, his conduct was perfectly correct.

No objection can be made to this indirect mode of communication with the Government of the United States adopted by the Duke. It is sanctioned by diplomatic usage. The rules, however, which govern it are clearly deducible from its very nature. It is a mere diplomatic feeler, thrown out to ascertain the views of another Government. The Duke himself justly observes that its object is "to avoid the irritation which might involuntarily arise from an exchange of contradictory notes in a direct controversy."

Had Mr. Forsyth asked and received a copy of this despatch, he must have given it an answer. Respect for the source from which it proceeded would have demanded this at his hands. If this answer could have been nothing but a direct refusal to comply with the suggestions of the French Government, then he was correct in not requesting leave to take a copy of it. Why was this the case? Because it would have added to the difficulties of the question, already sufficiently numerous, and would have involved him in a direct controversy, which it is the very object of this mode of communication to prevent. This is the reason why it was left by this despatch itself within his own option whether to request a copy or not; and his refusal to make this request ought to have given no offence to the French Government.

[SENATE.]

Now, sir, what answer could he have given to this communication but a direct refusal? Had not the Duke been fully apprized, before he wrote this despatch, that it could receive no other answer? It required explanations as a condition of the payment of the money, which he had been informed the President could never make. On this ground, then, and for the very purpose of avoiding controversy, the conduct of Mr. Forsyth was correct. But there is another reason to justify his conduct which, I think, must carry conviction to every mind. The President intended, in his annual message, voluntarily to declare that he had never intended to menace France, or to impeach the faith of the French Government. This he has since done in the strongest terms. As offence was taken by the French Government at the language of a former message, it was believed that such a declaration in a subsequent message would be, as it ought to be, entirely satisfactory to France. Had Mr. Forsyth taken a copy of this despatch, and placed it among the archives of the Government, how could the President have made, consistently with his principles, the disclaimer which he has done? A demand for an explanation would thus have been interposed by a foreign Government, which would have compelled the President to remain silent. The refusal of Mr. Forsyth to ask a copy of the despatch left the controversy in its old condition; and, so far as our Government was concerned, left this letter from the Duc de Broglie to M. Pageot as if it never had been written. The President, therefore, remained at perfect liberty to say what he thought proper in his message.

If this letter had proposed any reasonable terms of reconciling our difficulties with France, if it had laid any foundation on which a rational hope might have rested that it would become the means of producing a result so desirable, it would have been the duty of Mr. Forsyth to request a copy. Upon much reflection, however, I must declare that I cannot imagine what good could have resulted from it in any contingency; and it might have done much evil. Had it prevented the President from speaking as he has done in his last message concerning France, it might have involved the country in a much more serious misunderstanding with that Power than exists at the present moment.

I should be glad to say no more of this despatch, if I could do so consistently with a sense of duty. M. Pageot did not rest satisfied with Mr. Forsyth's omission to request a copy of it, as he ought to have done. He deemed it proper to attempt to force that upon him which the despatch itself had left entirely to his own discretion. Accordingly, on the 1st of December last, he enclosed him a copy. On the 3d, Mr. Forsyth returned it with a polite refusal. On the 5th, M. Pageot again addressed Mr. Forsyth, and avowed that his intention in communicating the document "was to make known the real disposition of my Government to the President of the United States, and through him to Congress and the American people." Thus it is manifest that his purpose was to make the President the instrument by which he might appeal to the American people against the American Government. After he had failed in this effort, what is his next resort? He publishes this despatch to the people of the United States through the medium of our public journals. I now hold in my hand the number of the Courier des Etats Unis of the 20th of January, a journal published in New York, which contains the original despatch in the French language. In a subsequent number of the same journal, of the 24th January, there is an editorial article on the subject of the President's special message to Congress, and of this despatch, of a part of which I shall give my own translation. It is as follows:

"Our last number contained the despatch of M. the Duke de Broglie to the chargé d'affaires of France at Washington, concerning which the Senate had demanded such explanations as were in the power of the Executive. On the same day the late message of the President of the United States, which had been expected with so much impatience and anxiety, arrived in New York. To this document are annexed many letters of the Duke de Broglie, of Mr. Forsyth, and M. Pageot, which will be read with great interest. We give a simple analysis of the least important, and an exact copy of those which have been written originally in French.

"The public attention was first occupied with this letter of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, which was known here some hours before the message of the President of the United States; and if some journals of the Government have found this publication unseasonable, made by the legation of France according to the orders which it had received, nobody at least has been able to deny the talent, the moderation, and the force of reasoning, which have presided at its preparation."

By whom was the legation of France ordered to publish this despatch? Who alone had the power of issuing such an order? The French Government. Against this positive language, I can still scarcely believe that the Duke de Broglie has given an order so highly reprehensible. The publication of this despatch was an outrage upon all diplomatic usage. It ought to have been intended as the harbinger of peace, and not of renewed controversy. From its very nature it was secret and confidential. If not received, it ought to have been as if it never had existed. Upon any principle, it would aggravate the controversy which such communications are always intended to prevent. It has now been diverted from its natural purpose by the French legation, and has been made the subject of an appeal by France to the American people against their own Government. It has thus greatly increased the difficulties between the two countries. It has proclaimed to the world that France requires from the President of the United States an apology of his message as an indispensable condition of the execution of our treaty. It has, therefore, rendered it much more difficult for her to retract.

The true meaning of this despatch is now rendered manifest to the most skeptical. The Duke de Broglie, in his interview with Mr. Barton on the 12th of October last, has placed his own construction upon it. The apology which he then required from the President contains his own commentary upon this despatch. I need not read the history of that interview to the Senate, to prove that I am correct in this assertion. It must be fresh in the recollection of every Senator. Considered as an appeal to the American people against their own Government, the publication of this despatch deserves still more serious consideration. Foreign influence, in all ages, has been the bane of republics. It has destroyed nearly all of them which have ever existed. We ought to resist its approaches on every occasion. In the very infancy of our existence as a nation, a similar attempt was made by France. It was then repulsed as became a nation of freemen. The present attempt will have the same effect on the American people. It will render them still more firm and still more united in the cause of their country.

Of Mr. Barton's recall I need say but little. It was the direct consequence of the refusal of France to execute the treaty without an apology from the President of his message.

Diplomatic relations between the two countries had been first interrupted by France. On this subject hear what the Count de Rigny said in his expose, read to the Chamber of Peers on the 27th of April last, on presenting the bill for the execution of our treaty. I give my own translation:

SENATE.]

National Defence.

[FEB. 2, 1836.]

"You know the measure which the Government of the King adopted at the very instant when the message presented by the President of the Union, at the opening of the last Congress, arrived in Europe. You know that, since that time, a similar measure has been adopted by President Jackson himself. The two ministers accredited near the two Governments are reciprocally recalled; the effect of this double recall is at this moment, if not to interrupt in all respects the diplomatic communications between the two States, at least to interrupt them in what regards the treaty of the 4th of July. If these relations ought to be renewed, and we doubt not that they ought, it is not for us hereafter to take the initiative."

On the 5th of June, the President had officially sanctioned the explanations which had been made to the French Government by Mr. Livingston in his letter of the 25th of April, as he had previously sanctioned those which had been made by the same gentleman in his note of the 29th of January. These were considered by the President amply sufficient to satisfy the susceptible feelings of France. In order to give them full time to produce their effect, and to afford the French ministry an ample opportunity for reflection, he delayed sending any orders to demand the money secured by the treaty until the middle of September. On the 14th of that month, Mr. Barton was instructed to call upon the Duke de Broglie, and request to be informed what were the intentions of the French Government in relation to the payment of the money secured by the treaty. He executed these instructions on the 20th of October. The special message has communicated to us the result. "We will pay the money," says the Duke de Broglie, "when the Government of the United States is ready on its part to declare to us, by addressing its claim to us officially in writing, that it regrets the misunderstanding which has arisen between the two countries; that this misunderstanding is founded on a mistake; that it never entered into its intention to call in question the good faith of the French Government, nor to take a menacing attitude towards France;" and he adds: "if the Government of the United States does not give this assurance, we shall be obliged to think that this misunderstanding is not the result of an error."

Is there any American so utterly lost to those generous feelings which love of country should inspire as to purchase five millions with the loss of national honor? Who, for these or any number of millions, would see the venerable man now at the head of our Government bowing at the footstool of the throne of Louis Philippe, and, like a child prepared to say its lesson, repeating this degrading apology? First perish the five millions—perish a thousand times the amount. The man whose bosom has been so often bared in the defence of his country will never submit to such degrading terms. His motto has always been, death before dishonor.

Why, then, it may be asked, have I expressed a hope, a belief, that this unfortunate controversy will be amicably terminated, when the two nations are now directly at issue? I will tell you why. This has been called a mere question of etiquette; and such it is, so far as France is concerned. She has already received every explanation which the most jealous susceptibility ought to demand. These have been voluntarily tendered to her.

Since the date of the Duke de Broglie's letter to M. Pageot, on the 17th June, we have received from the President of the United States his general message at the commencement of the session, and his special message on French affairs. Both these documents disclaim, in the strongest terms, any intention to menace France, or to impute bad faith to the French Government, by the message of December, 1834. Viewing the subject in this light—considering that, at the interview with Mr.

Barton, the Duke could not have known what would be the tone of these documents—I now entertain strong hope that the French Government have already reconsidered their determination. If a mediation has been proposed and accepted, I cannot entertain a doubt as to what will be the opinion of the mediator. He ought to say to France, you have already received all the explanations, and these have been voluntarily accorded, which the United States can make without national degradation. With these you ought to be satisfied. With you, it is a mere question of etiquette. All the disclaimers which you ought to desire have already been made by the President of the United States. The only question with you now is not one of substance, but merely whether these explanations are in proper form. But in regard to the United States the question is far different. What is with you mere etiquette, is a question of life and death to them. Let the President of the United States make the apology which you have dictated—let him once admit the right of a foreign Government to question his messages to Congress, and to demand explanations of any language at which they may choose to take offence—and their independent existence as a Government, to that extent, is virtually destroyed.

We must remember that France may yield with honor; we never can, without disgrace. Will she yield? That is the question. I confess I should have entertained a stronger belief that she would, had she not published the Duke's letter to M. Pageot as an appeal to the American people. She must still believe that the people of this country are divided in opinion in regard to the firm maintenance of their rights. In this she will find herself entirely mistaken. But should Congress, at the present session, refuse to sustain the President by adopting measures of defence; should the precedent of the last session be followed for the present year, then I shall entertain the most gloomy forebodings. The Father of his Country has informed us that the best mode of preserving peace is to be prepared for war. I firmly believe, therefore, that a unanimous vote of the Senate in favor of the resolutions now before them, to follow to Europe the acceptance of the mediation, would, almost to a certainty, render it successful. It would be an act of the soundest policy as well as of the highest patriotism. It would prove, not that we intend to menace France, because such an attempt would be ridiculous, but that the American people are unanimous in the assertion of their rights, and have resolved to prepare for the worst. A French fleet is now hovering upon our coasts; and shall we sit still, with an overflowing treasury, and leave our country defenceless? This will never be said with truth of the American Congress.

If war should come, (which God forbid!)—if France should still persist in her effort to degrade the American people in the person of their Chief Magistrate, we may appeal to Heaven for the justice of our cause, and look forward with confidence to victory from that Being in whose hands is the destiny of nations.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the resolutions offered by Mr. BENTON.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate for about an hour, in conclusion of his remarks commenced yesterday; the whole of which are embodied and given in preceding pages. When Mr. B. had concluded,

Mr. CRITTENDEN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. C. said he was very sensible of the small claims he had upon the attention of the Senate, and felt that he should stand in need of all its indulgence.

The debate had been of a very discursive character, and had led to some discussion of the conduct of the Senate. In the course of it, the Senate had, with great solemnity, been accused of neglecting proper measures for the defence of the country, and of having defeated the passage of the fortification bill of last session. As he (Mr. C.) was not then a member, and having no personal knowledge of the circumstances and proceedings on which the accusation was founded, he did not intend to engage in the controversy on that part of the subject. He would say, however, that the confidence he had long entertained in the wisdom and patriotism of the Senate had induced him to anticipate that their conduct would be found to be free from any merited reproach or imputation. He had been confirmed in that opinion by all the disclosures that had been made in the course of this discussion. But, sir, (said Mr. C.,) the Senate of the United States needs not my poor vindication. It needs no man's vindication. It is the same Senate that for years past has maintained here the noblest struggle for our laws, our liberty, and our constitution. Its conduct is before the world. It belongs to history, and its brightest pages will be illuminated with the names of those illustrious Senators who were foremost in that great struggle. To the accusations and reproaches with which they have been assailed throughout the long period of their trial and their glory, they may safely turn their backs, and look proudly forward for the grateful judgment of their country and posterity. In the great reckoning on which that judgment will be pronounced, the "fortification bill" of the last session will be but an insignificant item, and the secrets of its fate will be considered too worthless for any inquiry or research.

But, sir, (said Mr. C.,) I am called upon to consider the resolutions offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BEXTON,] and to vote in favor of them seems to be exacted by some gentlemen as the only admissible evidence of patriotism and proper American feeling. Modified as these resolutions have been by the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] they embrace, in the generality of their terms, room enough for almost every variety of opinion, and no Senator can probably feel any difficulty in voting for them. In the original form in which they were offered, they contained the distinct and simple proposition that the entire "surplus revenue of the United States, and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States," should be appropriated and applied exclusively to warlike preparations for defence of the country, by the construction of fortifications, the procurement of cannon and arms, and the increase of our naval means. As amended, the resolutions require only that so much of those funds shall be appropriated to those objects as may be necessary. How much is necessary, is a question left entirely open. But it is evident, from the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, and from his ready acceptance of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] that he considers that amendment as changing the phraseology, without altering the effect, of his original resolutions; and that, according to his view, the whole will be necessary, and ought to be applied to the warlike preparations recommended by him. This course of expenditure and warlike preparation, it must be recollected, is advocated by that Senator as a settled system of policy proper to be pursued in times of profoundest peace; for he tells us that he should equally urge and recommend it, if our difficulties with France (the only cause that threatens our peace) did not exist.

To this system, Mr. President, I am opposed, as unnecessary, unwise, and improper. For the necessary defence of our country I am ready to vote all the millions in your treasury, and ten times as much—ready to give every thing, and do every thing; and, if I were not, I should be a faithless representative of my constituents. But is the vast appropriation proposed by the Senator from Missouri necessary and proper for the defence of the country? That is the subject of inquiry.

The present surplus revenue, and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States, cannot amount to much less than thirty millions of dollars, if it does not exceed that amount; and this, with all the surplus revenue that may accrue in future, ought, according to the Senator from Missouri, to be set apart and appropriated exclusively to the warlike preparations before stated.

I object to this appropriation as an unparalleled extravagance. If the real object is to get rid of all this treasure, as of a troublesome thing, a more objectionable scheme could scarcely have been devised. The proposition to apply to military purposes all the surplus public revenue of the people, seems to me to be only less extravagant than to call upon them for their ploughshares to be moulded into swords. There is no necessity or reason for such a sacrifice. The ploughshare is much better employed, and so, in my judgment, may also be the money.

It is to be remembered that all this money has been the produce of peace. Has Peace no claims upon it? Is she to be considered as a mere slave, toiling to prepare for war? And are all her accumulations to be expended in warlike preparations? Are these to be made the paramount objects of Government? I trust not, sir. Our country every where presents us with objects claiming the parental care and bounty of the Government. Let these have a share out of your abundant treasure, and let portions of it be, in some mode or other, returned to the people, to increase those sources of national wealth from which it came. I am willing, sir, to go on in the policy which the Government has heretofore pursued on this subject, and to vote for suitable and even liberal appropriations for the general defence and security of the country. Such appropriations have been constantly made, from the very origin of our Government; and from official documents it appears that, from the 1st January, 1817, to the 1st January, 1835, there has been expended on our military and naval establishments $40,655,458 37. Of this sum, $11,171,712 70 was expended on the navy, and the balance of $29,483,745 67 upon the military establishment; of which last sum $15,025,812 04 was expended on fortifications. But, not content with the customary and usual appropriations for these objects, the honorable Senator [Mr. BEXTON] now asks us to appropriate the whole of the surplus revenue. Besides other objections that I have to this scheme of policy, one of no small consequence with me is, that it in effect confines the whole expenditure of the revenue to the line of our seacoast, and cuts off the Western and interior States from the hopes they have indulged of a more equal distribution and expenditure of the public revenue. The financial operations of this Government have always been such that the money drawn from the West has been expended on other sections of the country. This has heretofore been a matter of necessity, resulting from the condition of the Union. But the national debt is now paid, and the time has arrived when we might justly expect a more equal participation in the disbursement of the public money. This just expectation seems to be fortified by every consideration that belongs to the subject. We have contributed our full portion of the public revenue, whether resulting from direct or indirect taxation; and, in addition to this, vast sums of money have been paid into the treasury from the West, for the purchase of public lands. Heretofore we have been thus constantly paying, and receiving back nothing. This course of things has operated as a perpetual drain upon the West, and nothing but its extraordinary natural resources could have enabled us so long to bear up prosperously against it. We cannot always do so.

National Defence.

Of the surplus now in the treasury, more than twenty millions are the proceeds of the sales of public lands within the last three years. I do not, sir, cherish sectional feelings or jealousies; I look upon the whole United States as my country; but still, while ready to serve the general cause, I must not entirely forget the special interest of my own particular section of country, and of my own constituents. And it does seem to me that the time has come when, upon every principle of policy and justice, I may claim for it and them some share in the accumulated riches of your treasury. But to the undoing of these expectations, and to cut us off from future hope, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] proposes to seize upon and expend the entire surplus revenue on fortifications, the navy, &c.; thus continuing the old system, so exhausting to the West, of expending all the money received from it upon distant seacoasts. The unequal, and, as I think, unjust operation of such a course must constitute a strong objection in the minds of Western men.

I am willing to make the usual appropriations; to make liberal appropriations to the objects suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, and particularly for the navy: of that I am proud; I believe in its usefulness, and in its efficiency as a great arm of national power and defence. But, sir, I must confess that the fortifications suggested by the Senator [Mr. BENTON] are much less favorite objects with me, and that I shall vote, cautiously and with jealousy, any thing beyond the ordinary appropriations for them. Mr. C. said he had no great confidence in fortifications as means of national defence. In a few peculiar situations, and at a few points, they might, he supposed, be useful, and to that extent he was willing to go. But, from the magnitude of the appropriation now contended for, it was evident that the views of other gentlemen were not limited as his own were, and that it was designed to line our seacoast with a chain of fortresses that was to render us impregnable to an enemy. On such an extent of coast as ours the scheme is impracticable, if it were expedient. But he did not consider it expedient. The best and only sure defence of nations was the courage, the intelligence, and patriotism, of their people. Upon these must be our reliance in the hour of danger. The people is our bulwark; and the Government, by every act of wisdom and beneficence that increases their attachment to it and their prosperity, provides more effectually for national defence than by the erection of all the fortifications that could be built of brick or stone. His objection, as before stated, did not go to the comparatively few fortifications that might be necessary at particular points and situations, but to the extensive and costly system of fortifications that seemed to be designed for every assailable point of our coast. We did not, he said, stand in need of such defences. What enemy would dare to land on our shores? It may be necessary for the weak and the timid to labor, and toil, and expend their substance, in erecting walls around them for their defence. Such a course would be altogether inconsistent with the spirit, the power, and the policy, of this great republic. But suppose this scheme of fortifications completed, and our coasts girded with frowning battlements: what follows? You must have troops to garrison these fortresses. How many will this service require? Certainly a great augmentation of your present military force—a considerable army. And thus it will in the end turn out that the expenditure of millions in the erection of fortifications will fasten upon us the canker of a standing army, and entail upon the people a tax for the support of that army.

The policy of the honorable Senator, [Mr. BENTON,] by giving such paramount importance to all the preparations for war, seems to me calculated to give to our republic a military aspect, and dangerous tendency to war. The spirit of free Governments has always been sufficiently warlike. The pride and haughtiness of the republican character have ever been but too ready to kindle into war, and to seek for conquest. We need not stimulate that spirit. We have enough of it, and it will grow upon us, or there is no truth in history or philosophy. To moderate and restrain that warlike temper will be among the difficult tasks of this Government.

These views and considerations of the subject compel me to dissent from the policy recommended by the honorable Senator, [Mr. BENTON.] I am content to pursue the course that has been marked out to us on this subject by the former practice of the Government. We have had wars, and rumors of wars, and we shall have them again. But is it necessary, because of the possibility of occasional war, that we should be constantly clad in steel, and oppress ourselves with the weight of our own armor?

Sir, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has alluded to our present difficulties with France in terms calculated to excite our pride, if not our apprehensions; and has told us that our country is in a "naked," "miserable," and "defenceless" condition. It is with deep surprise that I heard such a declaration. How has it happened, how can it be, that our country is in so "naked, miserable, and defenceless a condition?" From the very origin of the Government such preparations as it deemed necessary and proper have been making for the security and defence of the country. And, from first to last, about two hundred millions of dollars have been expended upon our naval and military establishments. About twenty years ago we had a war with Great Britain; an enemy much more powerful and formidable, as it respects us, than France can be. We were then capable of resisting this more formidable enemy, and of successfully defending our country, its honor, and its rights. Since that war about forty millions of dollars have been expended upon our naval and military establishments. And let it also be remembered that, for the last seven years, the administration of this Government has been in the hands of a President renowned in war, and that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has been one of the leading supporters of that administration. Is it not then matter of surprise to hear that Senator, under all these circumstances, and near the close of such an administration, declaring the country to be in a "naked, miserable, and defenceless condition?" Sir, I must, in this particular, be the vindicator of the administration. I cannot agree in the opinion of the honorable Senator from Missouri, though sanctioned by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] and some other Senators, that our country is in a "naked, miserable, and defenceless condition." Compare its condition now with what it was at the period of our last and glorious war with Great Britain. The issues of that war will prove that we were not even then in a naked, miserable, and defenceless state. Since that war we have expended forty millions of dollars upon our naval and military establishments. Our largest public vessels at that time were frigates. We have since increased their number, and have added to them some of the most formidable line of battle ships that the world ever saw. Since that war we have doubled our population, and now number about fifteen millions. Since that war we have paid off our national debt, and now have an overflowing treasury, an abundant revenue, and unbounded credit. Add to all this, that our country, throughout its wide expanse, is full of energy, and teeming with prosperity; and then, sir, let me proudly ask of any one, if it can be said of such a country that its condition is "naked, miserable, and defenceless?" No, Mr. President, we are not defenceless. Give us a just cause of war, and we have nothing to fear. In a just quarrel we can meet any and all enemies, without danger of overthrow or disaster. My confidence in this is such that, except for the protection of our great cities and the great channels of our commerce, it does not seem to me that fortifications are necessary. I utterly object to them as a system of national defence—a system for which, together with other warlike preparations, its advocates at once, and now, call upon us for all the surplus in our treasury, estimated at thirty millions, and all the surplus that may accrue hereafter till the object be completed—a system that must lead to a standing army, and perpetual taxes for its support; and which, to a great extent, must permanently limit the expenditure of the revenue to the maritime frontier, to the prejudice of all the interior country from which it shall be collected.

But, Mr. President, if I thought less unfavorably of the proposed system of fortifications and defence, I should still think it very impolitic to apply to it all our surplus revenue. Some of it at least should be given or applied to the peaceful pursuits of society, to invigorate and replenish the sources from which it came. We are not probably doomed to have more, upon an average, than one year of war to twenty of peace, and it would seem to me, therefore, to be most unequal and unwise to neglect entirely the objects connected with the peaceful prosperity of the country, and to expend all the surplus revenue that peace has furnished on objects connected with war. Better uses, I think, may be made of it than the multiplication of forts, and the purchase of superfluous arms to be hung up at rest.

Mr. C. proceeded to state that a variety of subjects had been introduced into this debate, upon some of which he wished to make a few remarks. The alleged defenceless condition of the country had been broadly imputed to the Senate. This imputation, however, had resolved itself into the comparatively petty charge of having, at the last winter's session, defeated the passage of the "fortification bill," as it is called. This charge has been denied, and an animated discussion has ensued as to the causes of its failure. Having no personal knowledge of the circumstances attending that bill, I can enter into no controversy concerning them; but, sir, I have been a curious and interested listener to the debate, and have made up my verdict on the case. That opinion is founded on none of the disputed questions or details of the controversy, but upon this admitted state of facts—that the bill was in progress after night of the 3d of March last; that the two Houses of Congress differed about some of the appropriations contained in it; that the bill was likely to be lost in consequence of that disagreement; that, to avoid such a result, the Senate proposed a conference between the two Houses; that the conference was agreed to, and held by committees mutually appointed; that all the matters of disagreement between the two Houses were settled and agreed upon by these committees, and that each, as it was its duty, should report to its respective House, that the bill might accordingly pass; that the committee of the Senate did, without delay, make the proper report to that body; that the Senate was then ready and willing to act, and to pass the bill on the terms agreed upon; and so anxious, indeed, to do so, that, after waiting some time to hear from the other House, in whose possession the bill was, they sent a respectful message to that House to remind them of the subject; that there was some delay on the part of the committee of the House of Representatives, or its chairman, in making its report to that House; that the report was not made till about, or after, the hour of twelve o'clock at night, and that the House did not at all act upon it, owing to scruples of conscience on the part of some of its members in doing any thing after that hour of the night at which they supposed their congressional power ceased. As I have learned, and understand it, such is the plain and authentic history of the overt acts connected with the fate of this bill.

According to these facts, the Senate stands clearly acquitted, and the loss of the bill is imputable alone to the House of Representatives. It is not necessary to this conclusion to inquire or search for secret causes that may have prompted these scruples of conscience that destroyed that bill. It must be consolatory, I should think, to its patriotic friends here, who mourn so eloquently over its fate, to know, sir, that it died for conscience sake. All will, no doubt, admit that, to some extent, these scruples were very honest and sincere; but I grant, sir, that such a sudden and extensive ebullition of conscience may seem a little surprising, especially when it is recollected that it is against all former experience; that neither Washington, nor Adams, nor Jefferson, nor Madison, nor any of our former Presidents, nor any former Congress, ever indulged such scruples, or hesitated to act after twelve o'clock at night of the 3d of March, whenever it was necessary to the completion of the public business. But, sir, conscience does not go by precedents. Its ways are often mysterious and inscrutable; and after all, and notwithstanding all reasonings and precedents to the contrary, there is nothing, perhaps, unnatural or strange in those conscientious emotions which it seems interrupted the public business in the House of Representatives at the close of the last session. Remember, sir, that it was just about the hour of twelve, that witching time of night, when conscience, long pent up, and clogged with the politics of a whole session of Congress, would be most apt to break out, and make her "compunctious visitings."

Thus it is, Mr. President, as it seems to me, that the loss of the fortification bill is clearly accounted for; the Senate acquitted of its destruction, and the House of Representatives of the last Congress shown to have been the most conscientious and scrupulous with which the people of these United States have ever been favored.

I must say, Mr. President, that I have been not a little surprised at the great importance that has been ascribed to that bill, and at the sensibility that some gentlemen here have manifested at the bare recollection of its fate. I had supposed that this sensibility had been more confined to the seacoast, where the money was to have been expended; and to sorrowful contractors and undertakers, who were disappointed, perhaps, in their anticipation of good contracts and fat jobs. I am bound to state that, unpatriotic as such a want of sensibility may seem to be, there was not, in all the section of country from which I come, the least exhibition of popular distress, or even regret, upon the occasion. And if any of the Senators who are charged with having defeated that bill should be prosecuted for the offence, and can obtain a change of venue to Kentucky, they may be assured of a very impartial trial; for if there is any man there that made the fate of this bill a matter of any care, concern, or importance, I do not now recollect him. Yet Senators tell us here that a "tremendous responsibility" must rest somewhere for the loss of that bill. The process by which this "tremendous responsibility" is got up is curious enough. It is by supposing that, in consequence of the loss of the bill, the French had invaded our country, captured our cities, and destroyed our people.

Can any thing, sir, be more idle or extravagant than such suppositions—suppositions gravely made the basis of argument here long after they have all been contradicted by facts?

The French had no cause to invade us; we had no ground to apprehend such an invasion; and, in point of fact, they did not invade us, or capture our cities, or destroy our people. What, then, becomes of this imagined "tremendous responsibility," that has resounded so much and so fearfully in this debate?

Our present relations and our pending controversy with France have also (said Mr. CRITTENDEN) been discussed at large on this occasion. That subject (he said) had for some time past created much concern and agitation in the public mind, and war was by many anticipated as the most probable result. For his part, he had not believed that war could be made out of such slender materials; but still he could not avoid all apprehension on the subject. The parties were in that state of irritation easily to be inflamed, and in which trivial circumstances might produce important consequences. In this critical situation of affairs, he was curious and anxious to know what measures were designed, and to be recommended by the Executive. It was (he said) in this anxious and listening mood that, on a former day of this debate, he observed with pleasure the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GUNDSY] rise to address the Senate on the subject. Whatever should fall from so distinguished a friend and supporter of the administration might, he supposed, be regarded as high evidence of the course intended to be pursued by that administration. He was, therefore, an attentive listener. That Senator, after discussing the grounds of controversy with France, and concluding that our Government had been in the right throughout, that France was in the wrong, and persisted in the wrong, then demanded "what was to be done;" and called upon Senators "to come up to the mark, and to say openly what they were for." This (said Mr. C.) was just the point on which I wanted to hear the gentleman himself. And when that Senator proceeded immediately to say "that, for his part, he had no objection to declare frankly what he was for," my attention was quickened to the utmost. The gentleman paused for an instant, as if to collect himself for the occasion, and then made his promised frank avowal, by stating "that he was not willing things should remain exactly as they were." You must judge, Mr. President, how I was enlightened and affected by this most frank and explicit disclosure. That Senator, sir, is an old and valued acquaintance, and I claim some sort of affinity with him as an old Kentuckian. Willing to reciprocate all good offices with him, I am determined that his extreme frankness on this occasion shall be fully reciprocated; and happy I am, sir, to be able to repay the obligation literally, by here declaring, as I now most conscientiously do, to that gentleman, [bowing to Mr. GUNDSY] "that I am not willing that things should remain exactly as they are."

Mr. President, the belligerency of this debate seems to have increased as the prospect of war has decreased. Since our last adjournment on Thursday or Friday, we have all heard of the offered mediation of Great Britain for the amicable settlement of our controversy with France, and of the acceptance of that mediation by our Government. This intelligence has diffused a general satisfaction, and an almost perfect assurance of the continuance of peace, and the restoration of all our former friendly relations with France. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] expresses his confidence that war will be averted; and yet, sir, at this very moment of returning peace and good will, that Senator has indulged in a hostile and reproachful strain of discussion. With rufel industry he has gone over the whole ground of our controversy, and all the diplomacy connected with it, collecting together every little circumstance, and odd end of speech, message, or correspondence, that could be made the subject of reproach or animadversion against France; and finally concludes with a charge of wilful bad faith against her King and Government. Why is all this? Mr. President. We have had an unfortunate dispute with an old friend. We are on the eve of an honorable reconciliation, and are about to shake again, in friendship, the only hand, among all the nations of the earth, that fought with us, and for us, in the battles of our Revolution. Why, at such a time, and on such an occasion, does the Senator [Mr. BUCHANAN] assume such a tone and language of insult and exasperation? Why insult the people of France by accusing their Government of bad faith? In the midst and heat of the controversy, our President has often and solemnly disclaimed the making of any such accusation. There was certainly much less reason for the Senator's making it, now that the contest is virtually ended:

But I remember, Mr. President, that the Senator differs very much with the President of the United States in relation to these French affairs. He thinks that the President has been altogether too forbearing and too moderate in his conduct towards France, and he openly expresses his disapprobation of that forbearance, and rebukes that moderation. Yes, sir, we have seen and heard the Senator from Pennsylvania—that land of honest peace and honest industry—the land of the peaceful Penn—gravely rebuking General Jackson for his gentleness and too great moderation. Nothing can be added, sir, to that picture.

The same Senator, further to aggravate the bad faith which he charges against the French Government for the failure to perform on their part the treaty of July, 1831, has represented that treaty as most favorable and beneficial to France, and states that, in consequence of the reduction of duties or taxes, stipulated for by that treaty, upon the importation of French wines and silks into our country, France has already pocketed $3,000,000 of our money, and was still reaping this golden harvest. If this be really so, what becomes of the much-boasted diplomacy to which we are indebted for that treaty? a treaty by which France has been enabled to pocket, and will continue to pocket, about $1,000,000 per annum of our money. But I think it must be very clear that the gentleman is entirely mistaken, and that his statement, though sanctioned, as he supposes it to be, by official authority from our Treasury Department, is altogether erroneous. It may be true that, if the importations of French wines and silks had been the same under the undiminished duties that they have been under the duties as diminished in conformity to that treaty, the difference, in point of revenue to this Government, might have been the same (three millions) stated by the gentleman. But it by no means follows that, because that sum has been prevented from going into our treasury, it has gone into the pocket of France. The gentleman has only mistaken the pocket into which it has gone, as will be evident to him on a moment's reflection. The chief effect of the reduction of duties on the articles of wines and silks has not been to put the amount of the reduction into the pockets of the importers of these articles, but to cheapen them to the consumer. And thus, sir, instead of transferring three millions of our money to French pockets, the principal effect of the diminished duties is to enable some poor girl to buy a silk dress, or some poor fellow to buy a draught of wine, which they could not otherwise do. Such an effect, I hope, would not be at all obnoxious to the Senator.

The same honorable Senator seems to think that it is, somehow or other, indispensable to our dignity and independence that we should, at all hazards, compel France to pay the sum of money which, by treaty, she owes us, and that her failure and refusal to make that payment reflect dishonor and disgrace upon us. Whenever it shall become necessary, Mr. President, I hope that I shall be ready—I know that my constituents will be ready—to go to every extremity of honorable warfare for the vindication of our country's dignity and honor. But I confess that I have not sensibility enough to discover how the honor and dignity of our country are much concerned on this occasion. I cannot perceive how our honor and dignity are to be affected by the failure or refusal of France to pay us the debt she owes. If the debtor fails or refuses to pay the debt he owes, the reproach, whatever it may be, falls upon him. Who ever heard that, in such a case, the honor of the creditor was supposed to be affected by the misconduct of the debtor? The non-payment by France of the debt she owes us seems to me to be a matter that affects our interest rather than our honor; and, therefore, that all questions as to measures of redress, by war or otherwise, are merely questions of expediency for our own discretion to determine.

I agree with the honorable Senator [Mr. BUCHANAN] that France owes us twenty-five millions of francs, being something less than $5,000,000, and that she assigns an insufficient reason for withholding payment. But this is the whole head and front of her offending. We have no other complaint against her. Would it be expedient and proper for us to make war for such a cause? There is no other cause of complaint on our part France has in no way offended against us, on this occasion, except only by her failure to pay the money in question. Shall we go to war to enforce its payment? It is needless to discuss the question. Thank God, the danger of this war has passed by, and we have, as I believe, an almost certain assurance of reconciliation and peace with France. Such an issue of this controversy cannot be regarded otherwise than as a matter of public congratulation. If war had been its result, I should have contributed all that was in my humble power to render my country successful in that war. War of itself would have been a sufficient reason with me to take my country's side, without reference to its cause. But, sir, I must confess that I should have been most loth to witness any such a war as that with which we have been threatened. A war with whom, and for what? A war with France, our first, our ancient ally—whose blood flowed for us, and with our own, in the great struggle that gave us freedom and made us a nation. A war for money! a petty, paltry sum of money! I know of no instance, certainly none among the civilized nations of modern times, of a war waged for such an object; and, if it be among the legitimate causes of war, it is surely the most inglorious of them all. It can afford but little of that generous inspiration which, in a noble cause, gives to war its magnanimity and its glory. War for money must ever be an ignoble strife. On its barren fields the laurel cannot flourish. In the sordid contest but little honor can be won, and victory herself is almost despoiled of her triumph. If we should attempt, by war, to compel France to pay the money in question, none who know the two nations can doubt but the contest would be fierce, bloody, and obstinate. Suppose, however, that our success is such as finally to enable us to dictate terms to France, and to oblige her to pay the money. Imagine, Mr. President, that the little purse, the prize of war and carnage, is at last obtained. There it is, sir, stained with the blood of Americans, and of Frenchmen, their ancient friends. Could you, sir, behold or pocket that blood-stained purse, without some emotions of pain and remorse?

I will follow the subject no further.

Permit me, Mr. President, in conclusion, to express my thankfulness for the hope and confidence I now entertain that we are to be saved from the calamity of such a war. And I will, sir, indulge the further hope, that the amicable settlement of all our difficulties with foreign nations may contribute to restore more harmony to our councils here, and enable us, in a more fraternal spirit, to act together upon the great subjects of domestic policy in which the permanent interest and prosperity of our common country are more immediately concerned.

On motion of Mr. MANGUM,
The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

FRENCH AFFAIRS.

Mr. HILL offered the following resolution; which lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That the President cause to be communicated to the Senate, so far as there may be information in the Department of State, the number and amount of claims for spoiliations, presented to the commissioners under the French treaty of 1831, which were rejected, and the reasons for said rejection.

Mr. CLAY rose to make a proposition to the Senate, which, although informally put, he hoped would meet with no objection. The press of business was likely to embarrass the Senate, unless some mode were adopted to get through some part of it. He hoped that the Senate would consent to devote Friday next to the consideration of those bills, without the necessity of changing the rule. If it were to be considered as the general understanding that Friday next will be devoted to these bills, he would make no specific motion on the subject.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said he hoped such would be the general understanding.

The CHAIR. The Chair will so understand it.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the previous orders were postponed, in order to consider the resolution he offered some days since, calling for information from the President, which it was necessary that the Committee on Foreign Relations should have before it. The resolution was accordingly taken up, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if they be at his command, copies of the expose which accompanied the French bill of indemnity from the Chamber of Deputies to the Chamber of Peers of France on the 27th of April, 1835, and of the report of the committee presented to the Chamber of Peers on the 5th of June, 1835; and, also, a copy of the original note in the French language, from the Duc de Broglie to Mr. Barton, under date of the 20th October, 1835, a translation of which was communicated to Congress with the President's special message of the 18th January, 1836.

Resolved, also, That the President be requested (if not incompatible with the public interest) to communicate to the Senate a copy of a note, if there be one, from Mr. Livingston to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, under date of the 27th day of April, 1835, and copies of any other official note addressed by Mr. Livingston, during his mission to France, either to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs or to the Secretary of State, not heretofore communicated to Congress.

Mr. KING moved to amend the resolution by adding the following:

Resolved, also, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate an analytical abstract of the awards of the commissioners under the convention with France of July 4, 1831, with the amounts respectively awarded to each category, for which indemnification was acknowledged to be due by Mr. Dumas, in his report to the French Chamber of Deputies on the 28th of March, 1835.

Resolved, further, That the President be requested to cause an estimate to be furnished to the Senate, showing the probable advantages already derived by France from the execution of the treaty of July 4, 1831, on the part of the United States, and also under the laws of the United States gratuitously favoring French commerce.

Resolved, further, That the President cause to be communicated to the Senate any information under the control of the Executive on the subject of discriminating duties imposed by France unfavorable to the commerce of the United States.

Mr. CLAY accepted the amendment as a modification, and it was agreed to.

The resolutions were then adopted in their amended form.

EXECUTIVE PATRONAGE.

An act to repeal the first and second sections of an act to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named was read a third time.

Mr. MORRIS asked for the yeas and nays on the passage; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Clay, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King of Georgia, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Morris, Niles, Robinson, Rugles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Wright—20.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions offered by Mr. BENTON; when

Mr. MANGUM rose and said that, until very recently, it had not been his purpose to participate in this debate. Indeed, the resolutions immediately under consideration admitted of but little discussion and slight diversity of opinion.

The first resolution, in its original form, was novel, bold, and decided, and, in his opinion, eminently inexpedient. It bore the impress of its paternity. As it is now modified, at the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] it embodies one of that gentleman's felicitous conceptions, importing nothing definite, presenting nothing tangible, disarming resistance, because it disarms itself. It is a smooth jingle of words, awakening no precise idea, indicating no defined practical views, and sinking entirely out of sight those bold and novel features that characterized its original form. It now presents one of those comfortable positions on which either wary or scrupulous gentlemen may stand well screened from responsibility, and say "ay" or "no" with equal impunity. It is now like nothing but itself, unless it may be likened to the Senator from Tennessee, so far as it affirms that things "ought not to stand exactly as they are." When we shall come to divide upon it, if we shall vote upon it at all in its present form, gentlemen will find it difficult, having regard to its merits, to discover any motive for its support, or to suggest any precise and decisive reason wherefore it should be rejected. Unimportant as are these resolutions in themselves, they have been made the occasion of discussing much higher and graver matter. Gentlemen had taken a wide and discursive range, and touched every topic that could supply materials for taunt, crimination, and injurious comment.

The Senate had been assailed for refusing the supply of the three millions on the last night of the last session. Our foreign relations, and especially the French war, had been elaborately discussed, and the surplus revenue had been assailed with a vigor proportioned to the magnitude of the prize. In truth, thirty millions of surplus revenue, and the future surpluses accruing from year to year, are a great prize. To retain the surplus, and an unchecked control of it, is to retain power in the hands of the present holders, and to wield it with an unresisted and irresistible domination, in defiance of constitutional right, in scorn of ancient usages, and in contempt of a dignified moderation.

Mr. M. said he had disapproved the direction given to most of the debate by those with whom he usually acted. He had all along felt that Senators exposed themselves to the suspicion of feeling a sense of weakness in their position, when they suffered themselves to be arraigned here by a Senator, and they seriously and gravely set about defending themselves against the charge. As to his vote upon the three million supply, it was right. His first impression, strong as it was, had been strengthened by mature reflection and subsequent developments. Upon that vote of the Senate depended the uniform usage of Congress, the integrity of the constitution, and the peace of the country. He would not, therefore, submit to be arraigned either by Senators here or by the other House, or, strange as it might sound to willing ears, by the Executive itself. He would submit to arraignment by no power under Heaven, save that constituent body in North Carolina to which he always felt amenable, and to which he owed and cherished all duty and respect. Nor would he undertake the disgusting task of delineating the history of the three million supply, its rise, progress, and fall. Its career was brief and eventful, conceived in profligacy, nurtured by empiricism, and brought to its death by sinister designs and crooked policy. The fabled god that devoured his offspring was not more cruel than the projectors of this outrage upon the constitution, the treasury, the pacific relations, and the patience of a betrayed and insulted people. Who doubts that this fruit of intrigue was crushed by the hand of its parent?

Mr. M. said he should take his stand upon higher ground. There was no necessity for any extraordinary appropriation. To the close of the last session there had not been a word or movement, on the part of France, indicating hostile purpose; nor has there been to the present moment. Not a man, woman, or child, in the United States, apprehended war at that time, and, least of all, that the first hostile demonstration would be made on the part of France. It is true that, at the opening of Congress in December, 1834, the President had thrown a fire-ball into the halls of Congress. The question of reprisals upon French commerce was distinctly submitted to Congress. Every one of the least intelligence knows that reprisals by one Power upon the commerce of another, supposing them to be at all equal in the resources of defence and annoyance, are as necessarily connected with war as is the shadow with the substance.

Did that message find an echo in either branch of Congress? Did its recommendations find favor with any party, either in or out of Congress? Did not the Senate, by a unanimous vote, resolve that no legislative measure, under the existing circumstances, was necessary? Was there a single individual in this body found pliant enough to flatter the peculiar views of the Executive by compromising the peace of the country?

Did not the other House, at the very close of the session, by unanimous vote, abstain from any specific recommendation indicating the slightest apprehension of collision? Above all, did the Executive itself, high strung as it was, indicate to Congress any new cause of apprehension, or new development, requiring extraordinary appropriations for defence and protection? If any such new cause existed, was it not the bounden duty of the Executive, charged as he is by the constitution with the care of our foreign relations, to make it known officially to Congress? Will Senators press upon us a state of the question that must necessarily imply a defect of sagacity in the Executive, or a plain dereliction of duty? Such is the inevitable consequence. For, if cause for extraordinary defences existed, the Executive either did know, or ought to have known it. If he did know it, and failed to apprise Congress of it, it was a flagrant dereliction of duty. If he did not know it, he was discreditably deficient in vigilance, sagacity, and forecast. The truth is, no such cause existed, nor is there the least ground for imputing to the President, in this respect, either dereliction of duty or deficiency in sagacity.

National Defence.

[SENATE.]

Whence came the recommendation for the supply of the three millions, and for what purpose did it come? It did not come from the Executive; it did not come from any head of Department; nor did it come re-enforced by the deliberate judgment of any committee. It came under cover of the darkness of the last night of the session, upon the individual responsibility of a member of another body, [Mr. Cambreleng.] As it was sprung upon us under the cover of night, so its mysterious end is enveloped in impenetrable darkness. Half of the whole truth has not been told; sir, it never will be told. And, sir, what sort of authority is this, upon which the Senate is required to vote this appropriation? To vote a supply extraordinary in amount, unconstitutional in its form, in the absence of estimates, and, above all, in the entire absence of the least necessity, either shown or alleged, upon any exhibition of fact? This sort of authority may be deemed sufficient by the "faithful." To me it comes with no title to respect, and scarcely with claim to a decent forbearance. And for what purpose did it come? Was it to sooth the roused sensibilities of the Executive? Was it designed as balm for feelings wounded and pride chafed by discomfiture? Was it intended as an equivalent for the refusal of reprisals? As a delicate mode of flattery, by the strong expression of unlimited confidence, implied in the unconditional surrender of the purse, the sword, and the constitution? Did it look incidentally to the providing of a contingent fund for the summer campaign? To enlist recruits, and to carry the ballot-boxes by fraud or by force? And did it not look to the embarrassing of an eminent Senator on this floor, [Mr. WHITE], "the Cato of East Tennessee?" Sir, the position of this pure and distinguished Senator may well arouse the fears, excite the hatred, and put in motion all the puppets, "Punch, the devil, and all of them," that play in this great presidential game. Well may intrigue be afoot, and under the cover of night. It never had more motive and greater necessity to make a desperate push. The watch-fires are kindling on every hill, from the Potomac to the Balize. The White banner is unfurled; countless crowds are thronging to that standard. The Albany banner yet waves its motley folds over the "disciplined and the faithful." But even discipline begins to quail before superior numbers. That banner begins to bow, and will yet be dragged in the mire, if the Hero of New Orleans come not to the rescue. Yes, sir, to the rescue. To turn his back upon the honest, the steadfast friend of forty years—a friend through good and through evil report; the same firm, fast friend in the log cabin of the wilderness as in the marble walls of a palace: a friend too proud and too pure to stoop to sycophancy, too honest to flatter, and too straightforward for the crooked ways of modern policy. To turn his back upon this friend, and for whom? For one that the hero took to his bosom as of yesterday. One who spurned him in the hour of tribulation; who would have trod upon him in his first painful struggles for power, but who has a quick eye for the rising sun, and the smooth tongue of flattery for the ear of power. If such injustice shall be found in the heart of man, I feel a strong assurance that it will find no echo in the bosoms of a just and generous people. Give us but an open field, a fair contest, the people's money locked in the strong box, and the hands of power off, and we promise to give a good account of the intriguers on the south of the Potomac. We shall drive them out. They will find no foothold in Maryland, in Delaware, and, least of all, in the great and glorious "key-stone State." They may be safe in the North, and the strong holds of the empire State, but the presidency and the country will be safe from the contamination of their systems, and the blight of their tortuous and sinister policy. But to return. Suppose the three millions had been granted, does any one doubt that we would have been in war? By the phraseology of the grant, both the means and the implied discretion would have been placed in the hands of the President. The French Chambers had taken a false position. The French Government had solemnly stipulated the payment of the twenty-five millions of francs. It had not complied; the delay had produced irritation; the message of 1834 had taken very strong ground; strong expressions were used. The French Government took offence—recalled its minister here—offered passports to ours at that court. The law for complying with the stipulations of the treaty was passed, with a condition annexed not found in the treaty, nor contemplated by it; with a condition that satisfactory explanation of the President's message should be given before the payment should be made. All this was clearly wrong. The position is utterly untenable. I, for one, (said Mr. M.,) as an humble American citizen, protest against all or any explanations, in any manner or form whatsoever. If France has any ground of complaint, let her first perform her own duty, pay the money solemnly stipulated by treaty, and then, and not till then, demand reparation for any injury, real or imaginary, to the French Government and people.

In that event, I doubt not that the justice and unanimity of this Government will do every thing compatible with its honor to remove heart-burnings and ill-will. In that event, we may well do it, without seeming to be stimulated by low and mercenary considerations. Looking to the actual position which France assumed, suppose the three million supply had been granted, accompanied with unrestrained discretion, what would have been the consequence? Is not the probability strong, nay, is it not almost certain, that measures would have been adopted that would have brought war? Look to the history of this matter. On the 11th September last, the Duc de Broglie caused to be laid before the Executive of this country a paper drawn with signal ability and fairness, and obviously designed as a pacific overture to this Government, and seeking the means of escape from a false position. What was the reception given it? High, cold, and haughty. Breathing any thing but the calm and conciliatory spirit of that overture. In three days afterwards, on the 14th, this Government sent peremptory instructions to our chargé d'affaires at Paris to leave that Government forthwith, in case the money should not be paid: an order hastily, and, in my judgment, rashly given—cutting off every channel of communication between the two Governments. Sir, if the three millions, with the implied discretion contained in the proposition for the grant, had been at the disposition of the Executive, might we not have looked for measures as strong as those recommended at the previous session? And would not those measures have brought war? Sir, what have been the conduct and tone of Senators in the confidence of the administration during this session?

SENATE.]

National Defence.

[FEB. 3, 1836.]

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has brought forward resolutions looking not only to the thirty millions now in the treasury, but to the expenditure of all accruing surpluses in future years, for the fortification and the arming of our Atlantic frontier; contemplating a gigantic scheme, hitherto not dreamed of, and the expenditure of countless millions for defence alone, as if, in this enlightened age, war were the only object and purpose of mankind. The teeming abundance of the times, instead of seeking investment in those great lines of internal communication; instead of giving strength, wealth, happiness, and ornament, to the finest country under the sun, and impulse to the spirit of enterprise; in a word, instead of being distributed among the States for the purpose of consolidating and strengthening all the permanent interests and ties of social life—this abundance is to be poured out upon the maritime frontier, in the construction of fortifications, to frown defiance towards all the world. A scheme well worthy of the spirit of the iron age! And these resolutions are accompanied with a speech mild, subdued, and guarded in language, but breathing the furious war spirit of Mars himself. Then follows the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GAVNDR.] It is difficult to determine whether his voice is for war, or still for peace. There is no one but must perceive that he means to whip up, and keep in the front ranks of the administration, go where they may. We learn the fact, portentously announced, that he is not willing "that things shall remain exactly as they are." In the midst of this discussion, which seems well pitched to bring the public mind up to the war point, there comes the offer of mediation by the Government of Great Britain.

Never has so beautiful a scheme of operations been so completely marred by an unlucky incident. War, war, horrid war, engrossed every mind, and employed every tongue. A French war was preferred, if we could have the good luck to get it. At all events, we must have a war. If not a French war, the treasury has charms—a war upon that, as well as the Senate, may afford an amusing interlude in these "dull piping times of peace." This magnanimous offer of mediation on the part of Great Britain, it is understood, has been accepted by this Government; indeed, it could not be refused. In this state of things, when every consideration of delicacy, in connexion with our own honor, as well as the feelings of the mediator, would seem to dictate, if not profound silence, yet entire abstinence from every topic of irritation or offensive allusion, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] rises in his place, and delivers the most elaborated and high-toned war speech that has been heard in this Capitol since 1812. He charges, directly and unequivocally, dishonorable equivocation and bad faith upon the French Government, in terms the harshest and most offensive. He goes a bow-shot beyond any thing said by the Executive.

Sir, I regard the Senator's speech as an exposition of the views and feelings of the Executive. We perfectly understand the division of labor among the leaders of the party in power. Is it not known that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has in charge the "better currency," the bank rags, the yellow jackets, and the public domain? The Senator has strangled the monster, more fearful than the fabled Lernaean hydra, or, rather, he has cut off its head; but I fear he has not skilfully cauterized the wound. The monster seems to be in process of resuscitation, as well as hundreds of other smaller but pernicious monsters that seem to have sprung from its blood, sprinkled by the Hercules in the struggle for its decapitation.

I trust the Senator will inform us, at some early day, how the experiment of suppressing bank rags, and increasing the circulation of the gold currency, succeeds.

I suppose the proportion of paper money to the precious metals in circulation does not now exceed more than three or four times that which existed half a dozen years ago. In other words, I suppose the fictitious capital is not more than three or four times greater in reference to the actual capital than it was six or seven years ago. As this is an interesting experiment, under the scientific superintendence of the Senator, I trust he will give us such lights from time to time as his leisure and convenience may allow. I frankly confess that I am not without fear that the rapid and unexampled augmentation of fictitious banking capital portends throes and convulsions that may shake the prosperity of this country with the force and destructiveness of an earthquake.

Do we not likewise understand that the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] has in charge all the peculiar and especial interests of the Albany regency throughout the Union? And have we not all admired the skill and dexterity with which he manages and controls this intricate and complicated machinery?

And who does not know that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] has charge of our foreign relations? His wary sagacity and polished diplomacy, deriving strength and ornament, as they do, from a long experience, indicate the wisdom and fitness of the choice. Therefore, upon this subject, I take his speech as indicating truly the tone and temper of the Executive. I have alluded to the harshness and offensiveness of the matter and manner of that speech, as well as to the time and the circumstances under which it was delivered. Sir, Mark Antony's speech over the dead body of Cæsar was a perfect failure compared with that of the Senator. But Mark Antony was "a plain, blunt man," whereas the Senator is an eloquent and practised diplomatist. He shows us the wounds of our sweet country's bleeding honor, "poor, poor, dumb mouths," and, surpassing the skill of Antony, he "puts a tongue in every wound," which aforesaid tongues discourse so eloquently that they "move the very stones to mutiny;" and my friend from Kentucky [Mr. CURTIS] may look out for his "ploughshares," lest they be converted, in the twinkling of an eye, into Bowie knives and the most approved hair-triggers; and, strange to tell, all this display of eloquence and exhibition of elaborate skill in fixing perfidy upon the French Government at the very instant that our Government is accepting, yes, accepting, perforce, the offered mediation of the British Government. Does the Senator suppose that, when his speech shall assume a neat pamphlet form, if the President, amusing himself with his franking privilege, as is his wont, should perchance frank a copy to his brother Louis Philippe, it would materially contribute to the success of the mediation? Does the Senator desire war, or does he desire peace? If the latter, I can perceive no reason for keeping up this show of war, unless it be to subject the surplus revenue to a sort of legislative plunder. Sir, war is resolved on, if war can be had under circumstances to carry with it the patriotic feeling and the enthusiasm of the country. But war will not come. Thank God! war cannot now come. I have never felt a stronger reliance than at this instant, that an overruling and favoring Providence, which has made this great country what it is, will continue to it prosperity and greatness.

I think I see, in the divided and peculiar interests of the great sections of the dominant party, the surest guarantee of continued peace. I think I see, what I never expected to see, much good, yes, the blessings of continued peace, likely to come from the peculiar and selfish interests of the worst party that has ever threatened the prosperity of this country with its terrible scourge. Such are the glorious ends that a gracious and benign Providence works out by the employment of the meanest and basest instruments. But, sir, if, contrary to all my anticipations, war shall come, whatever may be my opinions of the wretched bungling or wicked designs of its authors, I shall regard it as no longer a party matter, but as a great national question, demanding the zealous co-operation and best energies of every American citizen. I shall feel it my duty, in whatever position I may stand, to lend my humble aid to the concentration of all the resources of the country to give vigor to the public arm, and to sustain, gloriously sustain, the national character.

But, sir, I repeat that war will not come. The heads of the dominant party have peculiar and divided interests, and, consequently, divided and conflicting counsels. The present head of the Government, high-toned, bold, daring, impatient, and eminently warlike, is obviously bent upon bringing France to his feet, or trying the hazards of war. His peculiar views are re-enforced and sustained by a numerous, powerful, and, for the most part, interested corps. Almost the entire official corps, the anxious expectants of place, and the greedy seekers of jobs and contracts, will be found on the side of the strongest executive measures. War necessarily brings with it vast accessions of power to the executive branch of the Government—vast accessions of officers and employees to the public service, and a corresponding increase in the expenditure of public money. Besides, the army and the navy, opposite in every thing to the mercenary tribe to which I have alluded, will be found on the side of war. Their high military spirit, their love of enterprise, their aversion to the “cankers of a calm world,” and their devotion to glory, naturally and necessarily place them on the side of war. “’Tis their vocation.” “The pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war” have charms for the soldier not to be resisted. We are upon the eve of a presidential election. The present head of the Government, brave, bold, and warlike, is yet surrounded with the halo of glory won in many a stricken field. I have not heard that the nominee for the succession is particularly distinguished either for military spirit or military achievement. Though he reposes under the shade of the laurels that have sprung up on the glorious field of New Orleans, yet I have not learned that he has moistened their roots with either his sweat or his blood.

Suppose war should come, and the presidential election at hand—who would be called to the helm of the vessel of state, that she might ride out in safety the storm and the breakers ahead?

Sir, the lion is a noble animal; the tiger is a powerful and fearful one; the fox is cunning, stealthy, subtle, remarkable for his doublings and nimble dexterities. The lion is lord of the woodland domain, in peace as well as in war. If, perchance, an alliance should be formed between the lion and the fox, (a most unnatural one,) or between the tiger and the fox, (less so,) it is easy to perceive that, in time of peace, the subtle reynard might rob half the tenants of the wood, and, by nimbleness of foot and dexterity in doubling, reach without harm his noble ally, lay his spoils at his feet, and crouch down at his paws for security and protection. But if the woodland domain should be awakened by the notes of war, and the tenants of the wood should prepare for the conflict, while the lordly lion would shake the dew-drops from his mane, and rouse to maintain his ancient supremacy, the cunning little fox would hie him away to the cleft of some rock, from which he might securely scan the dangers and devastation of the battle-field.

Who would be best qualified to lead on in a war with France? The French are known to be a gallant, warlike, and powerful nation. Our national pride, national honor, and national safety, would all be staked upon the issue. Might not the people, by universal acclamation, call to the head of the Government the bravest, the ablest, and most warlike? Would any eye be turned in the hour of danger upon the buzzing favorites “in the perfumed chambers of the great?” Would not a common sense of danger beget common counsels, looking to energy and ability as the best hope for honor and safety? It is in the contemplation of this state of things, of the imminent dangers to the designated succession in the event of war, that I see, or think I see, the safest guarantee for a continuance of peace.

If all apprehensions of the French war shall pass from men’s minds, yet a war of subjugation will be waged upon the Senate. The dangers of this war, though less exigent, are but little less interesting to the calm and philosophical observer of the tendency of political events.

Sir, the issue of this great struggle is to determine the fearful question whether this Government shall retain its ancient federative character, such as the framers of the constitution designed it to be, or whether it shall be ingulfed in the great Maelstrom of consolidation. It is to determine whether the sovereignty of the States is a mere ideal, visionary conception, or whether it is a sensible practical barrier against the excessive action of irregular power. In a word, it will determine the question of ascendancy between well-regulated liberty and the irregular excesses of irresponsible power. Sir, this contest is most unequal, whether viewed with reference to the characters of the parties to it, or with reference to their resources for defence, annoyance, or open assault.

The Executive is essentially active, the Senate necessarily passive. The Executive, in its very unity, possesses a great element of strength. As an emanation from the popular will, it possesses great power, because of its popularity. The power of nomination and appointment, and, yet more, the power of removal from office, secures support, and subdues the spirit of resistance. It has the expenditure of vast amounts of public money in various forms, the power of creating hope and expectation in the distribution of patronage, and the distribution of money to favorite contractors. The glitter of office, rank, and station, may be held up to tempt the ambitious, and the glitter of gold to tempt the mercenary. These great and various powers, centred in a single individual, upheld and controlled by a single will, capable of indefinite expansion and the minutest contraction, like the proboscis of an elephant, now tearing up an oak by the roots, and now picking up a pin; now overawing and subjugating a State Legislature, and now subsidizing a political hack; and all this re-enforced and sustained by an unscrupulous press, acting in perfect concert, re-echoing the word of command from the centre upon every hill and in every vale of this great confederacy; against the shafts of which a long life of virtue and integrity afford no protection, but the higher and more shining the merit, the more certainly will the poisoned arrow be sped—against all this fearful array of power and influence, how can an individual, or how can the Senate, expect to escape the doom already denounced against them?

The Senate, on the contrary, is merely passive; it has no patronage or gold to tempt the ambitious or mercenary. It possesses none but mere conservative powers. It is a mere staying power—a sort of political break-water—resisting on the one side the excessive ebullitions of executive ambition, and the waves of a temporary popular fury on the other. The individual Senators have no sympathy or encouragement beyond the limits of their respective States, nor, indeed, there, unless they be pliant, or unless, what can hardly be expected, the virtue and intelligence of the people shall be able to resist this formidable array of executive power and influence.

SENATE.]

National Defence.

[FEB. 3, 1836.]

In its legislative character, it is merely co-ordinate with the other branch of Congress. In its executive capacity, it must either follow the lead of the Executive, or be driven to the exercise of odious and unpopular powers. In the former case, it derives no strength, as there is no ascription of merit; in the latter, it has to encounter the denunciation of the Executive, its retainers, and disappointed nominees. Is it not wonderful that, in this unequal contest, the Senate, planting itself upon the ramparts of the constitution, has been able to hold out so long against an Executive as remarkable for his popularity as for the fury of his assaults? Right or wrong, does it not afford consoling evidence of individual firmness and integrity? Does it not manifest on the part of Senators a confidence in the ultimate right judgment of the people, as refreshing to our hopes as it is complimentary to the intelligence, good sense, and virtue, of our countrymen?

The events of another year, though they may not solve, yet they may throw much light upon this interesting problem. If the Senate shall be permanently broken, either by direct action upon it, or indirectly, through the State Legislatures, one of the great safeguards of liberty will have fallen. The direct and inevitable tendency will be to the centralization of all political power.

If there be any truth in political science, perfectly clear it is that centralized power is but another name for despotic power. Precisely in proportion as you centralize, in the same proportion do you approach absolute power. Power begets power, and a tendency to centralization, in the long run, will reach that point.

To render power innocuous, it must be broken up into fragments, and such a distribution made of it that, without the power of one department to control another, it may yet check and stay its action. To stand still is safe. To move onward with the concurrence of all the parts is accomplishing the highest object of Government. But for one department to be endowed with the strength of silencing or dragging on all the others, per fas aut nefas, willing or unwilling, is to consummate the highest disasters of an irregular and despotic Government. Opposing powers in politics are not unlike opposing powers in physics. By delicate adjustment, perfect harmony may be preserved, and a just equilibrium attained. If, in the distribution of power, all the great interests that Government is designed to protect shall be fairly represented, and that representation shall be so adjusted, upon organic principles, that no interest can act on another without the concurrence of a majority representing each and every interest, it would present a scheme corresponding to our highest conceptions of a just and wise Government. The history of all ages, and of all Governments, shows that where power has been centralized, there it has been absolute; and that liberty, in every country, has borne a direct proportion to the equality and skill with which opposing though not conflicting powers have been distributed. The characteristic difference between the Governments of Asia and Europe is, that, in the former, there is a centralization of power, and, of course, the dead level of despotism; in the latter, power is more or less distributed, and, of course, more or less liberty in exact correspondence. I will not pursue this subject, though examples drawn from history might shed a flood of light on these propositions.

Sir, the French war disposed of, and the Senate put out of the way, or rather the "factious majority" got rid of, the dominant party will at length reach the great immediate object of all their efforts; I mean, the surplus revenue, the thirty millions on hand, and the rapidly accruing revenues of the country. All the rest, sir, are mere pretexts, decoys for gulls. That stubborn majority in the Senate out of the way, a show of war must yet be kept up to decoy the people, through their feelings of patriotism, to yield assent to the lavish and profligate squandering of thirty millions; yes, and all the future accruing surpluses, until thirty millions shall be more than three times told upon jobbers, contractors, favorites, and all the vampyres belonging to the set, under the guise of warlike preparations, as if war were the sole business of life. I know gentlemen are not so shallow as to attach so much importance to these gigantic schemes of national defence as their speeches might seem to indicate. The surplus revenue must be seized upon. Sir, it will be so comfortable, it will not only serve to fill their pockets, but will give a prodigious activity to all the electioneering operations in the making of their President. Sir, it is vain to speak of the intelligence and virtue of the people being able to resist the power of a party backed by thirty millions in money, and an amount not much less in the shape of the public domain. I know (said Mr. M.) that there are States, and people in some of the States, that scarcely feel the influence. But at other points of the line of battle, where a decisive impression is necessary to be made, it can and will be made. The Government is too rich. It must be made poor before it can be made economical and pure. As you increase the surplus means of the Government, you multiply the schemers, projectors, and sturdy beggars, who will fall upon devices that will infallibly reach and squander the money.

Sir, we stand in a new position, one wholly unknown, until now, in modern history. We have all the symptoms of a highly diseased plethora. We have too much money. Economy is rapidly giving place to a wasteful profligacy. Chimerical projects are set on foot merely to get the money expended. Public men are losing all sense of the responsibility that habits of rigid economy enforce.

Sir, when I first came to Congress, if a proposition had been introduced requiring the expenditure of thirty millions in military defences, it would have been laughed to scorn. The mover would have been derided as the merest moonstruck visionary. All would have seen then, as they must now, that it is impossible to lay out that amount annually; that the requisite skill and the necessary labor cannot be procured, if you had the power of Midas to convert the mountains into solid gold. Yet, this is the natural downward course. Twelve years ago, the annual expenses of Government were under ten millions. Under this administration, which came into power with such lavish promises of economy, and pledges to bring back the Government to the cheapness, simplicity, and purity, of its earlier and better days, the expenditure has increased to a sum largely above twenty millions, and in the future we may expect to see those expenses exceed thirty millions a year. Is there the slightest necessity for this increase? None at all. Is it possible that the people would tolerate this state of things, if they were fully awakened to it? Sir, the treasury must be reduced, or this Government will sink into profligacy, and its retainers into utter corruption. But I tell you, sir, and I tell the people, from my place here, that this administration and its active corps of supporters will not suffer this money to be taken out of their hands. I tell the people that the administration will not suffer the States and the people to take and enjoy their own money. I tell the people that every plan of equal distribution of this surplus treasure, that is not now needed, that is lying idle to be scrambled for, will be resisted to the death by the administration and its loyal supporters. I tell them that the friends of the administration will vote for the most extravagant appropriations, exceeding far, very far, in amount, the most extravagant ever known heretofore, with the view of reducing this surplus as much as possible, and for the purpose of expending it among its retainers and employees, for works but little needed, if at all. I say to the people, mark this prediction, and see if it shall not be verified to the letter. I tell them that these unappropriated surpluses are of no use to any one, except to the deposite banks; and that to them they serve as precisely so much capital, upon which they trade and make profit exactly as if they were their own. I tell the people that in this way the administration holds a power over thirty or forty banks in the different States, that, if exerted, would crush three fourths of the number in a day. I tell them that a power of life and death over thirty or forty banks is a power over the directors, stockholders, and their debtors, to a greater or less degree. It is a power, to a great extent, over the money concerns of the country, and over thousands and tens of thousands of our people. I ask the people whether this power (abused or not, or to be abused or not) is not too great and dangerous a power to be lodged in the hands of any man? I ask the people whether these privileged corporations are better entitled to have the use of the public money and to make profit out of it, as if it were their own, than the States and the people of the States, by the sweat of whose brows it was earned?

And yet the banks will keep it. The States and the people will not be permitted to have it equally distributed during this administration. Sir, it is not in the nature or temper of power to surrender any of its advantages. If this money were given up, there might not any longer be inducement for thousands and tens of thousands of those now engaged in the work to continue their efforts to appoint the successor, to make the Baltimore nominee the next President.

If the land bill were permitted to pass, this money would be handed over to the States, for the use of the people of the States. More than nine hundred thousand dollars would immediately go to my own State. In internal improvement, education, railroads, and the many other beneficial forms in which it might be applied, it would give a prodigious impulse to the wealth, prosperity, and happiness, of the people of that State. Really it seems that this surplus and useless public money had as well go to the use of the people of the States, to make them prosperous and happy, as to go to the use of the banks to build up overgrown fortunes for the stockholders. But our venerable President thinks otherwise; and what Senator shall dare to call himself the friend of the President, if he dare to think differently?

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] distinctly says that this gigantic scheme of national defence was introduced expressly to defeat the land bill, and to prevent an equal distribution of the surplus among the States. I thank him for this frank and manly avowal.

We now understand each other. These, then, are competing propositions. Let us calmly examine the merits of each. I beg the people to examine them calmly, fairly, and dispassionately.

It is a great and interesting question. It must give rise to a keen and protracted contest. The parties on either side are strong and powerful. The States and the people, on one side, against the general Government, and its office holders, friends, and retainers, on the other. These are the parties. I take my stand on the side of the States and the people. I take it with confidence, though with certain knowledge that all our present efforts will be defeated. I rejoice to see every party compelled to take position. I am gratified to see gentlemen come up to the mark. There is no middle ground. They must fall into the ranks on the side of the States and the people, or they must fall into the ranks of this Government and its official corps. Take position, gentlemen. Let the people see where you are. I know your strength. I know that present defeat is our lot. We know that our cause is good; and, with the blessing of God, we shall be ready to do battle for it, from day to day, from year to year; yes, sir, firmly and fearlessly will we do battle for it, for the term of the longest of the Punic wars. The people will look on; they will investigate its merits; they will come to our aid; they will achieve the victory over power, and its friends and myrmidons, even in their intrenchments. Sir, I know we are beaten for the present. The official corps and its adherents have a tower of strength in the President and his veto. They will keep the money for a while. The President's influence may screen and sustain them yet a little longer. Beware of the hour when that protection shall be withdrawn. Beware of the vengeance of an abused people. You may bind poppies, mingled with the laurel of New Orleans, yet a little longer, round the brows of the people. But, beware: the day of retribution will surely come. Many of us may, and most probably will, sink under the hoof of power. "The blood of the martyr is the seed of the church." There will be those to follow who will drive the spoiler from his prey.

I have said the States and the people are on one side. Is it not so? Have not the most decisive expressions of popular opinion been heard, in the old States, in favor of the land bill? Have not the Legislatures that were free from party control expressed their approbation strongly? Do they not know that the public debt is paid? Do they not know that the money here is not needed, and cannot be properly used? Do they not know that this superabundance destroys responsibility, begets extravagance, and must end in profligacy and corruption? Do they not know that it is in this form only that they can hope to be sharers in this rich and princely public domain? Do they not know that an equal distribution would awaken enterprise, stimulate industry, and enrich and embellish the States? And is it wonderful that the people every where desire the measure? But not so the politicians. To them it is wormwood and gall. To the great "spoils party" it brings terror and alarm. To all others it brings healing on its wings, unless, perchance, to a very few whose pride of opinion may be startled, or to some from the new States, who may hope by other modes to derive yet greater benefits from the public lands than this measure promises. If the measure shall pass, I know it will be vetoed. That is a great evil, and yet I would not abrogate, modify, or touch, the veto power. I regard the veto as one of the contrivances in our system to break the shock of consolidated power; a wise contrivance to break sudden excesses in legislative action. In the long run, it must yield to the settled, dispassionate judgment of the country. In this case, I venture to predict that result. But the "spoils party"—how is it that this party can have an interest distinct and separate from the communities through which it is distributed? Let us look into this matter.

This great scheme of civil and political liberty of ours, the admiration and wonder of the age, is yet but an experiment: an experiment thus far illustrating, and gloriously illustrating, the truth of the great principle upon which our whole system rests: that man is capable of self-government. This system, in its successful and splendid career, is year by year developing new symptoms, new tendencies, and unforeseen phenomena; some portending evil, others full of refreshing promise and encouragement.

In the early and purer times of the republic, parties were divided upon great principles, growing out of the workings of the system itself. With equal zeal and patriotism, they took essentially different views of the tendencies of the system. This diversity of opinion was found in every State, connected with no local interest or sectional bias, but having reference solely to great questions, on which each and every part of the body politic had an equal interest.

These parties were the best and purest that have sprung up in our history. Time alone could settle the great questions between them, and time has settled definitively many of them. In the progress of events, these parties took a tinge from sectional prejudice and local interest, and were exposed to other occasional disturbances and deflections, from strong and heady personal ambition. In the fulness of time, in more than half the States, they lost almost every thing but their names, and were merged in the great and fearful vortex of sectional interests, and sectional interests alone, except so far as personal ambition yet clung to them, and occasionally modified their action. This modification of parties existed at or about the time that I first took a place in the councils of the Union. I then regarded them as having taken the most dangerous, the most remorseless, and the very worst combination that was compatible with the forms of the constitution, and a reasonable guarantee of practical liberty. How short-sighted and how erroneous were my views. This modification, resting essentially upon great sectional interests, banded together for the oppression and legislative plunder of the rest, produced an irregular overaction in the political machine, as well as in the great pecuniary interests of the country. This again run into a new modification, or rather produced a political phenomenon, eluding, as yet, the calculations of the philosopher, in reference either to the probable term of its duration, or the magnitude and extent of its mischief.

We now see, for the first time in this country, a great, numerous, and powerful party, formed without reference to any great principles of national policy, without regard to sectional interests, maintaining a sort of neutral ground upon all the interesting and deeply agitating questions of the times—a middle position, from which, with a dexterous skill in the art of balancing, they may incline to the north, south, east, or west, as exigencies may require: neither tariff nor anti-tariff, neither internal improvement nor anti-internal improvement, neither abolitionists nor anti-abolitionists, different sections of the party holding antagonist principles upon all these questions; and the party itself, or rather the heads of it, holding, at different periods, opinions favorable to both sides of these as well as other vital questions. We see them disregarding or despising principle, acknowledging no test, save only that of loyalty to their chief for the time being, and the behests of party, knitted together by selfish interests; with no element of coherence but the love of office and the desire of public plunder.

This party has acquired the appropriate and significant appellation of "the spoils party." The idea was first suggested by one of their high priests, who ministers with becoming devotion at the altars reeking with public spoils. They go for office and the spoils of office. Their greatest interests are centred in the treasury and the offices of the country. To increase the means of the treasury, and to multiply offices, contracts, and jobs, is to increase their prosperity. It is clear that the interest of the spoils party is directly opposite to the interests of the people. It is equally clear that they are a corps separate and alone, having a common interest among themselves, but no interest in common with the rest of the community. As they have a separate interest, so they have a separate organization, which, in its character, is hard, stern, and inexorable.

They are in the nature of a great military encampment in the midst of a peaceful community, living upon the fruits of honest men's labor, feared, hated, and yet for the most part implicitly obeyed. Their discipline is exact, and their strategy masterly. They occupy every important post throughout the Union. They are moved by a single will. An impulse at the centre is felt throughout the extremities. They are endowed with a sort of political ubiquity. A single word of command from head-quarters brings upon foot more than a hundred thousand office-holders and expectants, dispersed throughout the Union, animated by one spirit, and intent upon a single object. Re-enforced by a subsidized press, they simultaneously utter a spurious coinage of public opinion, which is borne from the extremities to the centre, whence the reflux sweeps over the entire confederacy. By this process, a man of straw, or certainly a John Den or Richard Fen, may be presented as a presidential candidate, with high claims and a commanding popularity. To consummate the scheme, another order issues for a great Baltimore convention "fresh from the people," to determine precedence between the rival pretenders to the throne. This trained band is instantly afoot, delegates are sent, some with and some without constituents. They take their seats in convention, with cap in hand, ready to register the edicts of their chief—the dispenser of the spoils; and these edicts are sent to all the ends of the earth, as the collected will and wisdom of "the great democratic republican party."

It is easy to perceive that no merit, however exalted, no public service, however illustrious, can contend, single-handed and alone, against this stupendous array of power and influence. It is easy to see, if the President for the time being shall place himself at the head of this fearful organization, bringing his official power, patronage, and influence, to bear upon freedom of opinion and the freedom of suffrage, that successful resistance will be difficult, nay, almost impossible. It is easy to see that, if the people shall not rise in their might, while it is yet time, and brand with scorn all arrogant interference with their rights, and impudent attempts to dictate the succession, the day is not far distant when they will surrender in despair, and abandon all hope of ever seeing another President freely chosen by the unbiased suffrage of the people.

Sir, I pronounce it as my deliberate and solemn conviction, that if the people, in the pending contest, shall not rise in their strength and rebuke executive interference, and the odious dictation of a successor, unless convulsion shall produce a new state of things, we shall never see another President freely chosen. Not more surely did the Emperors of Rome, backed by their prætorian bands, in the worst periods of her history, dictate the succession, than will this organization, headed by the President, appoint, from term to term, his successor. If this organization shall prevail at this time, where is the ground of hope for defeating it in the future? Will the people ever have a stronger case, or can the "powers that be" well have a weaker one?

Is this nominee either eminent for talent or illustrious for public service? Where are the fruits of his ability, or the monuments of his statesmanship? Where the proof of elevation of principle, broad statesmanlike views, decision of character, or pure political integrity? Where? Where? And yet, without pretension to distinguished public service, without eminence of ability, or, least of all, high public virtue, he is a powerful and formidable competitor. Who can estimate the power and influence of "the spoils party?" Look to the entire South. You see their candidate holding a doubtful struggle in every State, save one, from the Potomac to the Gulf of Mexico, against an eminent citizen of their own, with identity of views, identity of principles, and a common interest. You see him borne on without a feeling in common, a principle in common, or an interest in common, with the great body of our people. You see him borne on, in despite of his having been against them upon odious tariffs; against them upon the profligate squandering of money upon internal improvements; against them upon the slave question; and against them upon every essential view touching the pure and economical administration of this Government.

Sir, what individual popularity, necessarily local, can contend against this factitious popularity, endowed with ubiquity, and supported by the keenest selfish interests? Sir, the only hope is in the virtue and intelligence of the people. And yet the people, scattered, dispersed, without unity of purpose and concert of action, can make but feeble head against a corps, powerful, disciplined, active, and controlled by a single will. The truth is, organization must be met with organization, as far as practicable, or the freedom of election will be gone for ever.

To return. Sir, what are we debating about? The loss of the fortification bill at the last session. Why consume time in criminating the Senate, supposing this body to be culpable? Gentlemen say the horizon is lowering; that a cloud of war hangs upon its distant verge in the east; that it may yet come and burst upon us in its fury. They say our maritime frontier is naked and defenceless, and that we are destitute of all the muniments of war. Why, then, consume time in vain and unprofitable discussion? Why have two months of the session been suffered to pass without executive recommendation, or any estimates from the Departments for extraordinary appropriations? Why does the executive department sleep, while the enemy are upon us? Why do gentlemen waste the precious time in a war of words, when they should, according to their own views, be preparing for a sterner war? What bill have they introduced? What measure have they proposed? The French fleet of fifty or sixty sail, it is said, is hovering on our coast? They came to overawe the deliberations of the Senate, or to strike a decisive blow? Are the friends of the administration paralyzed? What preparation have they made to meet this formidable enemy? What preparation have they proposed? What increase of the naval power? Sir, they have a proposition on the subject of the naval defences. What do you suppose it is? Ten or twenty line of battle ships of the first class? No, sir; it is much more modest. The administration asks for two frigates, one sloop, and one steam battery.

If gentlemen suppose their alarms well founded, what must they think of the inertness, the imbecility, yes, sir, and the fatuity, of the administration that they seem so proud to support? Sir, gentlemen must be satisfied by this time that they are to have no war, except the war upon the Senate, and the war upon the treasury. Gentlemen say they have carried their elections, and will carry the Senate. I shall not regret it. This body, then, may look for a cessation of hostilities. It needs repose. Besides, it is time that gentlemen should take the whole responsibility of their measures. Who will not feel a sentiment of compassion for the distresses and annoyances of our venerable President, when he shall get possession of the Senate? How many debts are unpaid? How many importunate claimants of office, how many sturdy beggars, supple sycophants, and despicable tools, have been turned away with soothing assurances and bitter denunciations "of the factious Senate," that would not allow the party in power to keep good faith with their friends, and fulfil their just and reasonable expectations? Will not this tribe come thundering at the doors of the presidential mansion? Will they not press upon and annoy him by day and by night? But, sir, I differ from many of my friends.

If the party had carried the Senate two years ago, though the country would have suffered in the mean time, the defenders of the constitution and the laws would have acquired greater strength to place them both upon a safer and more durable basis. And, sir, what are two years of lawless domination, in the life of a great Government?

The opposition, without incurring the calumny and odium that have closed the public ear against them, would have been heard. The fruits of a weak and wicked policy would have ripened into their full maturity of bitterness. The people would have tasted them. The "glory" fruit might have been beautiful to the eye, but, like the fabled fruit on the borders of the Red sea, would to the taste have turned to ashes and bitterness.

The people may yet have to taste some of these bitter fruits. If an explosion shall come, as come it must, sooner or later, in the paper system, and twenty or thirty millions of public money shall be lost by broken banks, (which is not at all improbable,) the wise and sober-minded may regard it as a bitter fruit of the "hard money" humbug. "The faithful" will defend it as not too high a price for the "glory" of the experiment.

If war shall come, I learn from military men that a thousand or fifteen hundred gun-carriages will be immediately needed to work the guns in the fortresses now ready to receive them. I learn that there are scarcely one hundred fit for use, and that, with all the labor that can be applied to it, not more than one hundred and fifty or sixty can be made in a month. So that, notwithstanding regular appropriations for that object have been made for the last seven years, not more than one hundred guns can be mounted, nor can the full number for five or six months. This is a fair specimen of the ability and vigilance to be found, nowadays, in the public service. Sir, the fact cannot be disguised, that almost every department of the Government is in a state little short of utter disorganization.

The only department over which energy, skill, science, and a sleepless vigilance preside, is the one unknown to the law, created during this administration, without law and against law, but yet well known in practice—I mean the electioneering department. In this last department every thing is full of life, activity, vigor, alertness, and precision. If the elections of a State are to be carried, though we have but few gun-carriages, yet every gun is brought to bear upon it; emissaries and agents are afoot, the whole battery of the press opens, and the whole pack unkenelled; and, amidst shouts of glorification, humbug, calumny, smoke, smut, fire, and thunder, victory usually perches on the banner of this department, and approves itself well worthy of its high and distinguished reputation. If State Legislatures are to be carried, whether to make Senators, or to make "black lines," no troops but such as the Spartans of Tennessee or the Romans of Pennsylvania, can guard against insidious surprise, or repel the fury of assault. But as to the other departments, their condition can neither command admiration nor excite envy.

The Post Office Department sunk, two years ago, under a load of guilt, corruption, and disgusting rottenness. The public eye was turned for a moment on a spectacle so appalling in so young a Government, but it was again dazzled by the glory of this administration, and the whole Department, with its rottenness and corruptions, passed from under the eye as it passed out of the minds of men. It scarcely produced a sensation, it hardly left an impression. I trust it is getting better under the present head; I hear that it is, in its financial condition. I would humbly suggest that a little more expedition and a little better sealing-wax might decidedly enhance its usefulness and character.

The State Department may safely rest its hopes of immortality upon its masterly diplomacy in the late negotiation with France. Besides the enduring fame in lexicography which it has achieved for our country, it has well nigh got us into a war with our earliest friend and most ancient ally, upon a cause so slight that it might have defied the inventive genius and wily dexterity of Talleyrand himself to make so much of it.

The Treasury Department, I trust, keeps a steady eye on its deposite banks and the "better currency." If, when they shall come to account for the thirty millions in their vaults, they shall be as wide of the mark as are the Secretary's reports and estimates to Congress, the Government will be either very rich or very poor. If I might take the liberty, I would recommend the purchase of Pike's arithmetic. Learning and science in this enlightened age, whether in lexicography or arithmetic, are quite commendable, particularly in a Department.

There can be no reason to doubt that the Secretary of the Navy will infuse into that branch of the public service a sufficient degree of zeal and energy to have his two frigates, his sloop, and steam battery, in the highest condition by the arrival of the French fleet of sixty sail on our coast.

Of the War Department—but of that I will say nothing, for I know but little. If I knew any thing in it demanding censure, it would give me no pleasure, indeed, it would cost me pain, to cast it. But this I will say: that I sincerely hope, when we shall come to look into the causes of this disastrous and disgraceful Indian war in Florida, no ground for censure will be found either in the want of good faith, of due forecast, or a seasonable preparation to meet the exigency. Sir, one feels, while ranging in these Departments, that he is in the midst of a wilderness of sweets. I will pursue the subject no further for the present; I may, on some future occasion, in an humble way, pluck a few of them.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4.

INCENDIARY PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the select committee to whom that part of the message of the President was referred, made a report at much length, accompanied by the following bill; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

A BILL prohibiting deputy postmasters from receiving or transmitting through the mail, to any State, Territory, or District, certain papers therein mentioned, the circulation of which, by the laws of said State, Territory, or District, may be prohibited, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful for any deputy postmaster, in any State, Territory, or District, knowingly to receive and put into the mail, any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation, touching the subject of slavery, addressed to any person or post office in any State, Territory, or District, where, by the laws of the said State, Territory, or District, their circulation is prohibited. Nor shall it be lawful for any deputy postmaster in said State, Territory, or District, knowingly to deliver to any person any such pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation, to any person whatever, except to such person or persons as are duly authorized by the proper authority of such State, Territory, or District, to receive the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to dismiss from office any deputy postmaster offending in the premises, and such deputy postmaster shall, on conviction thereof, in any court having competent jurisdiction, be fined in any sum not less than — dollars, and not more than — dollars, according to the aggravation of the offence, at the discretion of the court.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of deputy postmasters, mail carriers, and other officers and agents of the Post Office Department, to co-operate, as far as may be, to prevent the circulation of any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation as aforesaid, in any State, Territory, or District, where, by the laws of said State, Territory, or District, the same are prohibited; and that nothing in the acts of Congress to establish and regulate the Post Office Department shall be construed to protect any deputy postmaster, mail carrier, or other officer or agent of said Department, convicted of knowingly circulating in any State, Territory, or District, as aforesaid, any such pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation, forbidden by the laws of such State, Territory, or District.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to furnish to the deputy postmasters, and the agents and officers of the Department, copies of the laws of the several States, Territories, and Districts, prohibiting the publication or circulation of any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation, within the limits of said States, Territories, or Districts, for their government in the premises; and make such regulations, and give such instructions for carrying this act into effect, as may not be contrary to law.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the deputy postmasters of the offices where the pamphlets, newspapers, handbills, or other papers, printed or written, or pictorial representations aforesaid, may be deposited, shall, under the instructions of the Postmaster General, from time to time give notice of the same, so that they may be withdrawn by the person depositing them; and, if not withdrawn in the space of one month thereafter, shall be burnt or otherwise destroyed.

Mr. MANGUM moved that five thousand extra copies of the report be printed.

Mr. DAVIS said that, as a motion had been made to print the paper purporting to be a report from the select committee of which he was a member, he would remark that the views contained in it did not entirely meet his approbation, though it contained many things which he approved of. He had risen for no other purpose than to make this statement, lest the impression should go abroad with the report that he assented to those portions of it which did not meet his approbation.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said that, lest the same misunderstanding should go forth with respect to his views, he must state that the report was not entirely assented to by himself. However, the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] in making this report, had already stated that the majority of the committee did not agree to the whole of it, though many parts of it were concurred in by all.

Mr. DAVIS said he would add further, that he might have taken the usual course, and made an additional report, containing all his views on the subject, but thought it hardly worth while, and he had contented himself with making the statement that he had just made.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said this was a departure from the usual course—by it a majority might dissent; and yet, when the report was published, it would seem to be a report of the committee of the Senate, and not a report of two members of it. It was proper that the whole matter should go together with the bill, that the report submitted by the majority might be read with the bill, to show that the reading of the report was not in conflict with the principles of the bill reported. He thought the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] had better modify his motion, so as to have the report and bill published together.

Mr. LINN remarked that, being a member of the committee, it was but proper for him to say that he had assented to several parts of the report, though he did not concur with it in all its parts. Should it become necessary, he would, when the subject again came before the Senate, explain in what particulars he had coincided with the views given in the report, and how far he had dissented from them. The bill, he said, had met with his approbation.

Mr. CALHOUN said he hoped his friend from North Carolina would modify his motion, so as to include the printing of the bill with the report. It would be seen, by comparing both together, that there was no non sequitur in the bill, coming as it did after this report.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, had only stated his impressions from hearing the report and bill read. It appeared to him unusual that a report should be made by a minority, and merely acquiesced in by the committee, and that the bill should be adverse to it.

Mr. DAVIS said the report was, as he understood it to be read from the Chair, the report of the committee. He had spoken for himself only, and for nobody else, lest the impression might go abroad that he concurred in all parts of the report, when he dissented from some of them.

Mr. CALHOUN said that a majority of the committee did not concur in the report, though there were two members of it, himself and the gentleman from North Carolina, who concurred throughout; three other gentlemen concurred with the greater part of the report, though they dissented from some parts of it, and two gentlemen concurred also with some parts of it. As to the bill, two of the committee would have preferred a different one, though they had rather have that than none at all; another gentleman was opposed to it altogether. The bill, however, was a natural consequence of the report, and the two did not disagree with each other.

Mr. CLAY said reports were merely argumentative papers, and were not considered as adopted paragraph by paragraph, by the Senate, in ordering them to be printed. If a bill embracing the principles of a report was adopted, the reasoning of the report might, so far as applicable, be considered as adopted.

Mr. LEIGH rose merely to state to the Senator from Alabama that the bill did not contradict the reasoning of the report, and was confirmatory of that portion of it to which it referred. This the gentleman would see when he came to read the report and bill together.

Mr. MANGUM then modified his motion by moving to print 5,000 copies of the report, together with the bill; which motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The Senate then took up Mr. BENTON's resolution for appropriating the surplus revenue to national defence; when

Mr. MANGUM, who was entitled to the floor, yielded to

Mr. CLAYTON, who addressed the Senate till the usual hour of adjournment; when, without concluding, he gave way to

Mr. PORTER, on whose motion
The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 5. SMITHSONIAN LEGACY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution to authorize the President to appoint an agent to represent the United States in any suit concerning the Smithsonian legacy.

Mr. PRESTON expressed some doubts whether the United States Government could or ought to avail itself of this bequest, and wished that the resolution should be laid on the table until the Senate should be more full.

Mr. LEIGH replied that he had entirely made up his mind both that the Government had the power to take this bequest, and that it was its duty to do so. He assented to the motion to lay the resolution on the table for the present.

The resolution was then laid on the table.

ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TIPTON offered the following resolutions; which lie one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire whether the army is sufficiently numerous for the duties they are required to perform, and for the occupation of our various forts.

Resolved, also, That the Committee on Military Affairs inquire and report to the Senate whether, in their opinion, the pay and emoluments to the officers of the army is sufficient compensation for the services they are required to perform.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. TIPTON said: These resolutions direct the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire whether our army, as at present organized, is sufficiently numerous for the occupation of our fortifications and the performance of the various other duties which necessarily devolve upon it.

In submitting the resolutions for the consideration of the Senate, I feel it to be my duty to accompany them with a few brief remarks, explanatory of my motives for proposing the inquiry. I do not wish to be considered an alarmist; my fears have not been operated upon by the rumors of war so frequently heard. I do not expect to raise recruits in time to terminate the war now raging between us and the Seminole Indians, nor am I influenced in the course I have taken by any thing that has been said here or elsewhere on the subject of any other war, but purely by a desire to put our peace establishment upon a respectable footing, and to prevent the recurrence of these conflicts with the Indians on our borders.

I am unable to see any just cause for war, unless it arise from unfortunate collisions, which will occasionally occur between our border inhabitants and the neighboring Indian tribes; and, sir, I am convinced that the sure way to prevent war is to be well prepared for it. If we expect to keep peace with the Indian tribes, we must provide and keep constantly stationed in their immediate vicinity an efficient military force to awe them into submission.

I have waited until two months of the session have passed away, hoping that some other Senator, better qualified than myself, would institute this inquiry; but seeing that such has not been the case, I have determined to move in it, and I beg honorable Senators to examine and decide upon this subject, not as a party question, but as one intended solely for the good of our common country. I do it, sir, with great diffidence, for many reasons. I consider it a matter of some consequence, and have no doubt that it will meet with opposition. The mover should possess more ability than I do, to defend it. I have consulted no one. The measure is my own, and I am answerable for it. I am aware that the people of this country look with a jealous eye upon every step taken to augment our military force. The people, when rightly informed, will do what is right. The army is their army; the money to support it is theirs; the Government is theirs; and I feel assured that they desire to see the army sufficiently numerous to answer all the purposes for which it was created.

SENATE.]

Army of the United States.

[FEB. 5, 1836.]

Before I sit down, I will exhibit it to the Senate a tabular statement, showing the forts on our seaboard, as well as on our northwestern, western, and southwestern border, occupied and unoccupied. When I have stated the facts, I must leave it to those Senators who represent the seaboard to judge whether any additional force is necessary there or not, I, of course, do not pretend to determine. I have instituted the inquiry under the conviction that a more efficient force is necessary in the West.

I do not advocate the propriety of raising new regiments, nor of increasing the number of commissioned officers. I believe they are sufficiently numerous already, but I am confident that the rank and file of the army should be augmented, by which measure we will place our peace establishment upon a much more respectable footing, and make our army more efficient, without incurring heavy additional expense.

I have prepared tables, showing the present distribution of the troops, and the condition in which our military posts are at present, for the want of more men to preserve them.

In the Western department there are twenty-two posts, nine of them unoccupied by troops. Many of these forts are substantial, well built, and capable of affording protection, if properly occupied, and preserved from falling into ruin. If not preserved, the money expended in their erection is thrown away. The number of the rank and file of our army, as at present organized, is so small that it is impossible for the troops to occupy all the forts. The companies, now consisting of about fifty men, should be increased to sixty or eighty, with four sergeants and four corporals to each, so as to enable them to render all the service required to be performed by an army. Our forts must be kept in repair and our guns and gun-carriages preserved. Several companies have been recently removed from their stations to perform service in Florida; two of these companies have been entirely cut off by the Indians, thus farther reducing the number of the rank and file, already too small. By concentrating the troops in Florida, the forts in Louisiana have been mostly left without men to preserve them.

The unsettled state of affairs in Mexico, and the actual war in Texas, will cause a restiveness among the Indian tribes on the southwestern border of the United States, which should not be unprovided for. General Gaines, we are told, has been ordered to that frontier to prevent an interference by our Indians with the enemies of our neighbors, and it is possible that some portion of the force now on the upper Mississippi will have to be withdrawn and sent south. This will leave the northwestern frontier exposed to the mercy of the innumerable tribes on the upper Mississippi and Missouri rivers. Nothing but the presence of a force sufficient to crush all opposition will keep our Indians long quiet, and it is our wisest policy to provide that force at this time.

The presence of a respectable force at Forts Armstrong and Snelling, in 1831-'2, would have prevented the war with the Southees, which cost us two and a half millions, and a similar array of troops, if stationed at Fort King and Tampa Bay last year, would certainly have prevented the war now going on in Florida—a war which will probably cost us two millions more, and must certainly end in the annihilation of the poor deluded Seminoles.

Mr. T. said that, in relation to the second resolution, for increasing the pay and emoluments of the officers of the army, he was not prepared to give an opinion that an increase was necessary, but he knew that there were some who thought an increase should be made in the compensation to some grades of the officers of our army. He considered the officers of our army a most meritorious class of men; they brave the dangers of every clime where duty calls them; they risk their health, their lives, their all, in our defence, and he felt confident that every citizen of our country would concur in giving them an ample compensation, he would say a liberal one. He hoped that the Military Committee would give the subject a careful investigation, and report the facts to the Senate; and he felt confident that the Senate and the country would do this valuable class of men ample justice, and that he knew the officers would be content with a just reward of their valuable services.

These, sir, are briefly the reasons which have induced me to offer the resolutions, and I hope they may be adopted.

SCHOOL LANDS.

A bill to authorize the relinquishment of the 16th sections of public lands, reserved for the use of schools, and the substitution of other lands in lieu thereof, was taken up for consideration.

Some discussion took place on this bill, in which Mr. CLAY, Mr. MOORE, Mr. KING of Alabama, and Mr. BLACK, took part. After the bill had been reported by the committee,

Mr. CLAY expressed his hope that this munificent bill, which allows the new States to select a section, instead of being compelled to take every sixteenth section of a township, whether valuable or valueless, would be appreciated by the West.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, protested against the bill being considered in the light of an obligation to the West.

Mr. CLAY intimated that if the Senator from Alabama was in a different situation from that which he now filled, in that situation in which he (Mr. C.) hoped to see him shortly, he would be more ready to allow the liberality of a measure which provided the means for the education of the rising generation—a liberality which every father of a family would know how to value.

Mr. LINN admitted the importance of the bill to the interests of the West, but declined giving any opinion as to the amount of gratitude due.

The bill was ordered to a third reading.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

A bill to continue the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was taken up.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to amend the clause appropriating $320,000 for the road in Ohio, by striking out two and inserting five, so as to read $350,000.

After some remarks from Mr. CLAY,

Mr. CALHOUN moved to lay the bill on the table, to remain there until the question as to a war should be determined.

After a few words from Mr. HENDRICKS,

On motion of Mr. NAUDAIN, it was ordered that when the Senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8.

MEDIATION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

A message was received from the President of the United States on the subject of the mediation of Great Britain, as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1836.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The Government of Great Britain has offered its mediation for the adjustment of the dispute between the United States and France. Carefully guarding that point in the controversy which, as it involves our honor and independence, admits of no compromise, I have cheerfully accepted the offer. It will be obviously improper to resort even to the mildest measures of a compulsory character, until it is ascertained whether France has declined or accepted the mediation. I therefore recommend a suspension of all proceedings on that part of my special message of the 15th of January last, which proposes a partial non-intercourse with France. While we cannot too highly appreciate the elevated and disinterested motives of the offer of Great Britain, and have a just reliance upon the great influence of that Power to restore the relations of ancient friendship between the United States and France, and know, too, that our own pacific policy will be strictly adhered to until the national honor compels us to depart from it, we should be insensible to the exposed condition of our country, and forget the lessons of experience, if we did not efficiently and sedulously prepare for an adverse result. The peace of a nation does not depend exclusively upon its own will, nor upon the beneficent policy of neighboring Powers; and that nation which is found totally unprepared for the exigencies and dangers of war, although it come without having given warning of its approach, is criminally negligent of its honor and its duty.

I cannot too strongly repeat the recommendation already made, to place the seaboard in a proper state for defence, and promptly to provide the means for amply protecting our commerce.

ANDREW JACKSON.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION IN THE ARMY.

Mr. SWIFT offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision to extend to the officers and soldiers of the army the benefits of moral and religious instruction.

Mr. SWIFT explained that he had offered this resolution at the instance of an officer of the army, who was well acquainted with the wishes and interests of that branch of the service. At our remote posts, both officers and soldiers were deprived of the opportunity of receiving such instruction. It was not expected that a chaplain could be appointed to every post; but an arrangement might be made by which the means of this instruction might be proportioned to the number of troops.

NEW YORK SUFFERERS.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, urging the passage of the bill now before the House of Representatives for the extension of the time of payment of the duty bonds falling due in the city of New York subsequent to the great conflagration of the 16th of December last, and said he felt bound to occupy a few moments of the time of the Senate in bringing to their attention the suggestions contained in this memorial. The memorial stated that the importance of the passage of the bill had been vastly increased by the delay which had already taken place.

1st. Because, by the expectation of time for payment, excited by the passage of the bill in the Senate, a large amount of bonds had been suffered to pass the time of payment, and to remain unpaid; and that a call now for the immediate payment of these deferred bonds would produce great additional distress, and immensely endanger the solvency of the debtor merchants.

2d. Because the merchants who have bonds due and unpaid are, by a provision of the revenue laws of the United States, prohibited from entering their goods daily arriving from foreign countries, until the outstanding bonds are paid, and those merchants have, therefore, been compelled to place their goods thus arriving in the public stores, without the usual entry for the payment of duties; that their goods to the amount of many millions in value remain in the public stores "uncensured;" that these goods thus stored are unusually exposed to destruction by fire, in consequence of the great severity of the winter, the almost obstructed condition of the streets by snow and ice, and the necessarily resulting difficulty of extinguishing fires, if once lighted.

Mr. W. said he must remark that he was convinced the failure to ensure these goods thus situated proceeded solely from the almost entire destruction of the insurance companies of New York by the fire referred to, and the memorial represents that the owners of these goods are imminently exposed to the danger of the further loss of the millions thus invested, and that the Government is equally exposed to the loss of the duties upon these goods, inasmuch as all hope of responsibility for the payment of duties must cease, if this further loss should be heaped upon the already severe misfortunes of that afflicted city.

3d. Because a further deposit of the importations, daily arriving, in the public stores will, when a decision upon the bill shall be finally had, impose upon the officers of the customs in the city of New York such a load of accumulated duties as to cause great and injurious delay in placing the goods in a condition for advantageous sale.

4th. Because this mode of importation, in addition to the danger of exposure and delay, necessarily imposes upon the importing merchant great additional expense and trouble, and that every delay increases this just cause of complaint.

Mr. W. said he did not pretend to have used the language of the memorial in his statement of its substance; that he had received it since he had come into the chamber; that he believed he had given a just view of its material suggestions; in any event, he had given the views which a hasty reading of the memorial had impressed upon his mind. He was aware that the memorial did not concern any bill now in the possession of the Senate. The Senate had passed the bill very many days since, and he made the remarks in the hope that they might reach the notice of the members of the other branch of Congress, in case it should be impossible to present this same memorial to that body on this day. He did hope this bill might meet an early and definitive action in that body. He would not speak of the result of that action, but decision was immensely important to the interests of his valued constituents, who, by an unexampled calamity, had been compelled to represent their embarrassments to the Legislature of the nation, and ask relief.

Mr. W. then moved that the memorial, without reading, be laid on the table and printed; which motion prevailed without a division.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The unfinished business of Friday, being the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road through Indiana and Illinois, was taken up;

The pending motion being that of Mr. CALHOUN to lay the bill on the table, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the order for the yeas and nays was, by unanimous consent, withdrawn, that the motion to lay on the table might also be withdrawn, to permit Mr. TIERN to make some remarks.

The further consideration of the subject was then postponed until to-morrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions offered by Mr. BENTON.

Mr. CLAYTON, who was entitled to the floor, rose and concluded his remarks; the whole of which follow entire.

Mr. CLAYTON said: Mr. President, a full discussion of the leading topics which have been introduced into this debate is now demanded of us. It is due to the country that our sentiments on the great subject of national defence should be frankly expressed, and it is due to the character of the Senate that we should not suffer its former action on that subject to be misrepresented or misunderstood. It now appears that honorable gentlemen, acting here as the avowed friends of the administration, have left us no other alternative than that of silent submission to their charges, or a vindication of the past. Whether their object be to wage war on the Senate, or to prepare for war against France, mine is equally the duty of self-defence. For a war with any foreign Power which may assail us I wish to be fully prepared; and I am now ready, without further preparation, to meet the war against myself and my friends.

FEB. 8, 1836.]

National Defence.

[SENATE.]

The resolution before us, as now modified, proposes to pledge this body, so far as its action can be efficient for the purpose, to set apart and apply so much of the surplus revenue (including the dividends on the bank stock of the United States) as may be necessary for the defence and security of the country. Thus stands the proposition as made by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] and as by him modified on the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY.] But with this proposition, thus made by the friends of the administration, some gentlemen on this side of the House are not fully satisfied, because in their view it contemplates the postponement of the duty of self-defence to what they consider as minor and inferior objects. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] has said that he deems the duty of providing for the common defence to be a primary obligation imposed on us by the constitution, and is not content merely to declare that he will give the surplus for that object, if necessary, but the whole revenue; and not only that which has accrued, but that which shall accrue hereafter. The resolution does not go far enough for him; and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] objects to its phraseology, as implying an absurdity, inasmuch as while the common defence is unprovided for, he cannot understand how any "surplus" can exist to be appropriated. My object, sir, is to change the proposition to such a shape as that, when adopted, the Senate may be understood as pledged to do its utmost for the necessary defence of the country, and to gain for this pledge, if possible, the unanimous vote of this body. I hold it to be desirable that we should make no party question of this matter, and that we should present an unbroken, undivided front to all other nations on a subject of such vital importance to the people. I shall, therefore, before I have done, move to strike out the word "surplus" from the resolution, so that it shall pledge all our resources, if necessary to be resorted to, for the objects proposed. Let us, by the unanimous adoption of such a resolution, show the world, and especially the American people, that, in the event of a struggle between our own country and any foreign Power under the heavens, no matter how that struggle may originate, there are none here attached to any but the land that gave us birth; that there is no feeling here but the true American feeling; and no sentiment here but the true American sentiment, which holds all other nations "enemies in war, in peace friends." Let us refute by this pledge now, and by the honest redemption of it hereafter, any slanderer, if such there be, who would seek to cast a stain on the character of the Senate, by the vile insinuation that we are or can be partisans of a foreign Power. Such a stain cannot be placed there without degrading the character of the proud States whose representatives we are, without the consequent humiliation of all that is elevated and noble in the American character, nor without inflicting a pang of regret upon every man who has a true American heart beating in his bosom.

It is objected to the adoption of a general and extensive scheme of appropriations for defence at this time that there is danger to be apprehended from the propensities of the existing administration to expend the public money for electioneering purposes; that political favorites will, according to the system of "the spoils party," be preferred to all others in letting the contracts for the construction of the requisite public works; and that the expenditure of many millions of the public treasure by unprincipled men will lead to a still more general prostitution of the beneficent powers of the Government to party purposes than we have ever witnessed. It is true, sir, the power proposed to be conferred may be abused. But the power will be in the hands of those whom the people have preferred should expend it; and deeply as I regret their decision, yet I shall bow in submission to it. And let me say to my friends who anticipate the abuse of this power for party purposes, that if those who have it shall determine thus to prostrate the elective franchise by the corrupt employment of the public money, we can erect no barrier to save the republic from this danger by withholding the appropriations for the public defence. We have no other sure safeguard for the preservation of our liberties than public virtue. If public opinion can be purchased by such means, the experiment of free Government must prove a failure. Let us do our duty, then, and leave the consequences to that Providence which has thus far protected us. The patriot who shall steadily reflect upon the consequences of an accumulated surplus in the treasury, now amounting to thirty, and, unless thus disposed of, soon to increase to a hundred millions of dollars, will see far greater danger to our free institutions from this hoarded treasure than may arise from its improper expenditure at this time. If permitted to gather in the treasury until its force, when expended, shall be absolutely irresistible, it will prove for years to come a standing bribe for the exertions of party; the struggle for office must degenerate into a struggle for money only; and this wealth may at last fall into the hands of some successful partisan, who may, by an illegal seizure of it all, ensure our final downfall and his own elevation on the ruins of the constitution. Nothing is more evident than that if no common object can in the mean time be found to which it can be appropriated, it must prove a subject of ceaseless contention among the States and the people.

It has been further said, that the object of the resolution is to defeat the bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public domain among the States, according to their federative population. But such cannot be the effect of adopting a liberal scheme of national defence, really adapted to the wants of the country. The land bill itself provides that no part of the money which it proposes to distribute shall be disposed of according to its provisions, in case of war with any foreign country; and it never has been any part of the object of the friends of that just and salutary measure to divert one dollar of the public treasure from the object of necessary defence. The passage of that bill could have had no such effect. As a sincere friend of that bill, I do ardently desire that it may, at some future time, receive the action of Congress under more favorable auspices. At present, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the President has once put his veto upon it, and has even resorted to what I shall ever consider as a most unjustifiable measure on his part, to prevent Congress from passing it into a law in despite of his veto, by the requisite constitutional majority of two thirds of each House. We have good reasons to know that, when we passed that bill simultaneously with the compromise act, such was the state of kind feeling which the latter had awakened in the bosoms of gentlemen, who had before voted against the land bill, towards its friends, that, had the President, who received both bills in the same hour, returned the latter to us with his qualified negative upon it, at the time when he sent back the compromise act with his approval upon that, the requisite constitutional majority of two thirds was ready in this body, as well as in the other House, to make the bill a law in despite of his veto. He chose to keep the bill until another session, and then sent it back to a new Congress, many of whose members were not members of that which passed the act. Is there any evidence of a change in his determination as to this bill; and, if not, can any man hope for the passage of the land bill into a law, while he who resorted to such means to defeat it, as I have in part described, still has it in his power to resort to similar means again? No, sir; though I hold it to be my duty, uncontrolled by the executive will, to vote for the measure as often as it shall be presented, yet I feel that we must wait till other counsels shall prevail in the executive mansion before the people of any of the old States which conquered these public lands from the Crown of Great Britain, by the expenditure of their blood and treasure, can be permitted to touch a dollar of the money arising from the sale of them. But, without reference to this state of things, it is sufficient now to say, that the objection that a liberal system of appropriation for public defence might come in collision with the distribution under the land bill, proceeds upon the admission of what is erroneous in point of fact; for we have ample resources for national defence, without touching the funds which that bill was intended to affect; and, were it otherwise, I should not hesitate a moment in deciding that not a dollar should be distributed or applied to other purposes, while it remains necessary to put the country in a state of preparation to meet any and every emergency that may arise out of the unsettled state of our foreign relations.

National Defence.

Another objection has been suggested. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has offered a proposition, which now lies on the table, to so amend the constitution of the United States as to authorize the distribution among the States of all the surplus in the treasury not necessary for the expenses of Government, whether proceeding from the avails of the public domain, or from any other source. If it be any part of the design of his resolution to defeat the appropriations for those objects, (which, I have already observed, are, in my estimation, paramount to all others,) I have yet to learn it; and, whenever that shall be avowed as its object, or shall appear to my judgment to be its effect, I shall hold it to be my duty, without reference to any other arguments against it, to resist it to the utmost. Sir, I do not propose to discuss its merits; but I am free to declare that, in my opinion, it is a proposition which, in its present form, can never be attended with any practical results. Many of those who desire the distribution believe that the object can be attained whenever Congress shall pass an act to effect it; and that the proposed amendment to the constitution is objectionable, not merely because it is unnecessary, but because it involves an admission of the want of a power already conceded to Congress. The elaborate addresses, on this subject, of a late Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKENSON], now a member of the cabinet, were made in vain, if there be no considerable number of men friendly to the object, and yet confident of the existence of a power to effect it. The President, in his annual messages to Congress, has repeatedly avowed himself friendly to the object of distributing this surplus among the States; yet he had rejected the land bill, which is the only measure that has ever been proposed by friend or foe to carry out, by a practical effort, any part of his suggestion. Considering these things, and reflecting at the same time upon the difficulty, not to say the absolute impossibility, of procuring any change in the constitution whatsoever, on any subject, I cannot view this proposition as presenting, even to the friends of the distribution which it contemplates, any ground upon which an opposition to the great measure of national defence can be rested. Sir, it is visionary. If the surplus must accumulate until that proposition shall be adopted, it will never find an avenue through which it may escape to the people, to whom it rightfully belongs.

Nor does that other objection, that, by these means, the expenditures for internal improvement will be arrested, stand on any better foundation. Sir, the expenditures for internal improvement are effectually arrested by executive action alone, no matter what may be our decision on this or any other subject. The President alone now governs the destinies of the country, so far as national improvement is involved in them. We may, indeed, rejoice if we can find useful objects for which he will permit us to expend any part of the money of those who sent us here. While a little band of us, one of the rank and file of which I am proud to avow myself, in vain oppose that construction of the constitution which has thus arrested the exercise of one of the most beneficent powers of this Government, we are borne down by the force of those who adhere to the Executive on all questions. The President's repeated exercise of the veto power on former bills for internal improvement has left no room for conjecture as to the fate of any future bill which shall contain objects of a similar character. Until the people shall desire it otherwise, and manifest that desire by the elevation of some one to the presidential power who will consent that their money shall be expended in making railroads and canals, to bind and connect together the distant sections of our country, as well as in the purchase of arms, the equipment of fleets, the raising of armies, and the erection of forts, we have no alternatives left to us but that of appropriating largely for defence, or suffering this wealth to accumulate until the sum of its enticing glories shall win the heart of some one to use it for the mastery of us all and the conquest of the liberty that is left to us. And, sir, I say again, in reference to this objection, as well as all others of a similar character, that, so long as the public money can be usefully applied to the indispensable object of the necessary protection and safety of the country, any and every other object of expenditure sinks, in my judgment, into inferiority with that.

Still another objection to the measures proposed by the resolution before us remains to be answered. We are told there is no danger of a war. It may be that there is no immediate danger. Sir, I believe it will be found so. But is it wise, is it consistent with that primary obligation to "provide for the common defence," which the constitution imposes upon us, to wait till that danger comes before we take measures for security—to sleep till we hear the cannon of the enemy, without an attempt at self-protection? The building of a navy, or the erection of a fort, is not the work of a day or a year. To build ships, and to build them so that they may, in the hands of American seamen, sustain the American character; to erect fortifications for the permanent security of our commercial cities and our important harbors, to arm them, and man them, are ends not to be attained without the preparation of years, even if we had five times the wealth of the treasury to offer for them. We must go to work, for the accomplishment of so great an object, as all others have done who have achieved any thing worthy of a nation's honor or security—not hastily, and without reflection, but with caution and circumspection, in the choice and use of all the means requisite. If we listen to the suggestion that there is no danger of war, we shall never do any thing, until it is too late to attempt it with certainty of success. When such danger is imminent, and comes upon a nation unprepared, as we are, every thing done is accomplished in confusion; but nothing is well done, and the expenses occasioned amidst hurry and excitement are enhanced greatly beyond those which a prudent and vigilant superintendence, in time of peace, would ever tolerate.

Our real condition may be easily understood, without an appeal to official documents. On both sides of the House, and by gentlemen of all parties, it is reiterated that our whole seaboard is in a wretched state of defence. The honorable chairman of our Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. BENTON] was the first to proclaim the fact in this debate, and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] has added to the picture he presented of our naked, exposed, and defenceless situation. To enable others to understand this, let every member from the Atlantic States bear evidence of the situation of the defences existing within his own personal observation. Years have passed away, during which not a gun, from any fortification, could have been brought to bear upon a hostile squadron passing the Delaware, from Cape Henlopen to Philadelphia. Five years ago, the only effective fort known there was accidentally destroyed by fire, and no serious effort has been made to rebuild it. No, sir; every thing requisite for defence, not only in that quarter, but every where else, has been viewed as a secondary consideration, when brought into competition with a party object—to make the boast of having paid off the national debt during the existence of this administration. The honorable chairman of our Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. SOUTHWARD] has informed us, in this debate, how utterly insufficient are our naval preparations for a state of war; and, in connexion with the fact demonstrated by him, that we could not now concentrate, within any reasonable period, a sufficient naval force, upon any point of our whole Atlantic seaboard, to resist, with success, a formidable attack suddenly made by a foreign fleet, permit me again to invite your attention to the peculiar situation of the country on both sides of the Delaware. At the entrance of that bay, on whose waters floats the commerce of one of our largest cities, and of a country than which none could be more inviting to a rapacious foe, we have erected a break-water for the protection of shipping against the effects of storms and ice. It is, indeed, a noble and enduring monument of the sagacity and wisdom of Congress, and exhibits proof of a disposition to protect the commercial interests of the whole country, which I hope to see cherished and encouraged hereafter. It is said to have been thus far constructed on terms which prove that, in the erection of such public works as this, we are capable of performing more labor for less money than any foreign nation of whose operations, in the same way, we have any correct information; and although, in consequence of its unfinished condition, we have not yet realized all the advantages of this great work, yet, it is believed by those whose means of judging I rely on, that, by the protection which it has already given to our shipping, from nearly all parts of the Union, against the danger of shipwreck, property has been saved which is of greater value than the whole cost of the work. It furnishes now an excellent harbor; but it is a harbor, of all others, the most inviting to a hostile fleet; and not a gun is yet mounted to defend it, nor has there been any attempt to erect a fortification for its protection. Without such a defence, it will prove, in time of war with a nation of superior naval and maritime power, a curse to the country; for while it deprives us of all benefit from the operations against an enemy of our ancient allies, the winds and ice, it must become the point from which a hostile fleet may pillage our coast, blockade our vessels, and harass, in a greater or less degree, our whole commerce. The entrance to the Chesapeake and Delaware canal is also left undefended, by the burning of Fort Delaware, and the neglect to rebuild it—a neglect which, if longer continued, I shall be compelled to consider as a violation of the contract by which the State which ceded the island on which it stood to the Government stipulated, in the act of cession, for the erection and maintenance of a fortification upon it for ever after.

Our Western frontier is scarcely less exposed. For years past we have been steadily pursuing the policy of driving the Indian tribes beyond the States; and, by the gradual operation of this system, we have thrown nearly all the ancient Indian population, formerly within their limits, on our Western border, where it now rests, strengthened by connexion with other tribes, and by a density which it never knew before. At this moment a war is raging in Florida with a remnant of this fierce and untameable people; and a feeling is enkindled in the bosoms of the whole race, which, at the slightest appearance of a rupture with a foreign Power, might, under the management of a skilful leader, bring thirty thousand savage warriors into the field to desolate our Western settlements.

Sir, it is said, and repeated with great confidence, that there is no danger of a war with France. Although I hope that God in his mercy may avert from us as a nation that worst of all scourges; although I believe that we shall be saved from it in this instance, and intend to exert all my humble means to prevent it, so long as I can do so consistently with the honor of my country, yet it is impossible to review the facts connected with the controversy between us and France without perceiving that we have arrived at that point at which the power of retreating with honor from our own position is not left to us alone, unless, indeed, the resolutions passed at the last session, that the treaty of July, 1831, ought to be insisted on, shall now be receded from by us. France may recede; but the negotiation has been so conducted that, unless we abandon the treaty, we cannot step backwards without dishonor. To show this, a very brief history of that controversy will be sufficient. The French spoliation on our commerce, for which that treaty provided an indemnity to us of twenty-five millions of francs, (about four millions seven hundred thousand dollars,) all occurred more than twenty-five years ago, and have ever since been the subject of just complaint against that nation. These spoliations were of the most unjustifiable, cruel, and outrageous character. We submitted to them at the time they were committed only because they were accompanied by still more atrocious violations of neutral rights by another one of the great belligerent nations of Europe, against which we shortly afterwards declared war. Against the latter Power we proceeded, and obtained whatever satisfaction a war could give us. Our claim on the other was never abandoned; it was always insisted on. The real amount of injury we had sustained far exceeded the petty sum which at last we obtained as an indemnity by a solemn treaty made on the 4th of July, 1831. The commissioners appointed by Congress to ascertain and liquidate the demands of the rival claimants under this treaty, whose property had been burnt or captured by the French, have fixed those demands at sums the aggregate of which is nearly twice the sum of twenty-five millions of francs, the indemnity allowed us. Yet, without taking into the estimate any of the spoliations committed by France under the Berlin and Milan decrees, the sum assessed by the commissioners under the treaty is far below what would have been assessed by arbitrators, had such been appointed to settle the dispute between our country and France. Without now going into a statement of the principles which govern every commission, where rival claimants under the same nation, instead of rival nations, are contending for justice against each other, I content myself with saying that there does not rest a doubt on my mind that the sum allowed us by France, by the treaty of July, 1831, was not equal to one fourth of the actual loss we had sustained by that nation in the pride of its power, and inflicted upon us by means the most wanton, cruel, and unprovoked. Sir, I was one of those who ratified, in this hall, the treaty of July, 1831. We did it with a full knowledge that the indemnity proposed was not, in amount of money, a real indemnity for the wrongs which had been inflicted upon us. We did it with a full knowledge of all the immense advantages conceded to France by that provision in the treaty which established a discriminating duty in favor of her wines and silks, in consideration of the return of our ancient friend and ally to that justice which had marked the period of our earliest connexion with her. We thus, for the sake of harmony with France, introduced a principle into the exercise of our treaty-making power, which, if not novel, is certainly very unusual; for, in the exercise of our authority simply to ratify the treaty, we pledged our own legislative power, and that of the other House of Congress, to regulate the tariff of the nation according to the treaty. Immediately, and without delay, Congress did so regulate the tariff, and the discrimination in favor of the staples of France over those of all other nations was embodied in our statute book. My honorable friend, but political opponent, from Pennsylvania, [MR. BUCHANAN,] has said that, by means of this clause in the treaty, France has already gained more than the whole indemnity which she thus stipulated to pay to our citizens; that he has called upon the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of ascertaining the amount; and he exhibited a tabular statement, prepared at his request, which proved that, had the duties on French wines and silks remained as they were at the date of the ratification of the treaty, these articles since that time would have paid into the treasury, on the 30th September, 1834, (more than a year ago,) the sum of three million sixty-one thousand five hundred and twenty-five dollars. The honorable gentleman added, that, before the conclusion of the ten years mentioned in the treaty, France will have been freed from the payment of duties to an amount considerably above twelve millions of dollars. To this statement my honorable friend from Kentucky [MR. CRITTENDEN] justly excepts, but considers the reduction of duties as a benefit to the American consumer only. Sir, both the gentlemen are in error. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is wrong in considering that France alone has pocketed the benefit resulting from the reduction; and the gentleman from Kentucky is wrong, if he supposes that the importing merchant, as well as the producer of the articles of wines and silks in France, has not enjoyed, together with the consumer here, the advantages derived from the discrimination. The fact is, that the duty on French wines and silks was reduced, as I have stated, to take effect at the time of ratifying the treaty, and the duty of five per cent. on French silks was utterly abandoned by the subsequent act of March 2, 1833; so that the silks of France have ever since been admitted here duty free, while silks of a much better quality, coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, still are subjected to a duty of ten per cent. It is needless to stop here for the purpose of working out, by the different systems of political arithmetic, how much the consumer, the importing merchant, and the French producer, have respectively gained by the established reduction; but one thing I take to be certain, that, while the French treasury has not received the benefit of the sum mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the treasury of the United States has lost every dollar of it.

Foreseeing the consequences of this discrimination in favor of French products, as we certainly did at the time of ratifying the treaty, what, it may be asked, could possibly have been the motive for our ratification of that treaty? Not, sir, as has been most unjustly charged, for the sake of French gold; no, sir, not for the sake of any mere pecuniary advantage. It was not to enrich our own coffers, or to fill the pockets of American merchants whose ships had been burnt by French cruisers, although mere justice required of us to demand of France to repay them for their losses. Had money (as has been most untruly alleged) been our only object, we should never have concluded and ratified such a treaty. Our object was peace and harmony with an ancient ally and friend—with a nation towards which every pulse in the American's heart has beat with sympathy in all her sufferings, and towards which one of the most lofty, generous, and grateful of emotions which man can feel or tell of, has ever been fondly cherished and proudly expressed. The tranquillity of nations, the peace of the civilized world, and, above all other considerations, the cause of liberal principles, the preservation and maintenance of harmony between those nations whose forms of Government, so far as they preserve the seminal principle of popular representation, now form the last best hope of all men—these, sir, were the powerful arguments which impelled the American Senate to ratify this treaty, and again to offer to France not only forgiveness for the past, but benefits for the future. The honor of the nation had required of us to demand some indemnity for the past; and, however inadequate to the injuries we had suffered, we felt disposed to overlook the amount of the damages for the acknowledgment of the outrages and the confession of the wrongs inflicted. But, after all this, what was done by France? Year after year passed away after the exchange of the ratifications of this solemn treaty, during which France received an unquestioned benefit from it, and our treasury sustained an unquestioned loss by it; yet no law was passed to carry the treaty into effect, and no further act was done to admit these wrongs, or offer us a dollar of remuneration for them. Passing by all the irritating topics to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has alluded, casting no imputation on any one branch of the French Government more than all the others, I say that France has not redeemed the pledge given in her solemn treaty with us, although we have redeemed ours to the very letter. The law to carry the treaty into effect has been once actually rejected by the French Chambers; and at last it has been passed with a precedent condition annexed, requiring an explanation of the President's message to Congress of December, 1834.

This message, sir, was sent here after the first rejection of the treaty. It contained a recommendation to invest the President himself with the discretionary power to issue letters of marque and reprisal—to make a quasi war with France at his discretion. The recommendation found no advocates in either branch of Congress that I have ever heard of. It is possible there may have been such, but I have not known them. It was, in my private opinion, an ill-advised and most imprudent message. Such may have been the opinion of the American people; such surely was the opinion of the American Congress. No motion was ever made in either House to carry out the recommendation of the message by the grant of the power asked for; and the Senate did, on the 14th of January, 1835, pass a unanimous vote, on the recommendation of our Committee on Foreign Relations, declaring, in response to the message, that no legislative provision whatever ought then to be adopted in reference to the state of our relations with France. The report which led the committee to that conclusion was drawn by their chairman, [MR. CLAR,] and will stand for ever as one of the brightest leaves in the proud chaplet which adorns that statesman's brow. That was no partisan document. No, sir; all men, of all parties, in this body, convinced by the argument and pleased with the tone of eloquent patriotism which spoke in every sentence of that report, then concurred in the opinion that no power should be granted to the President to issue letters of marque and reprisal for the seizure of French commerce. France received the intelligence of the passage of this resolution, and felt assured, when she received it, that at least one entire branch of the American Government intended no menace, and meant that this Government should give no offence to her. But, after all this, the French Chambers only at last passed the bill of indemnity with a proviso that no part of the money due under the treaty should be paid us before an explanation of the message should be given to France by the President.

We have now arrived at that part of the history of this controversy where the President has taken his stand. We know that he will not, in any event, consent to make any explanations of his former message, except to Congress or the American people; but the President has, in the strongest terms, disclaimed, in his message to Congress of December last, any intention to insult or menace the French Government by his message of December, 1834. Our own minister at Paris (Mr. Livingston) had long before denied that such was the intention of that message, in an official communication to the French minister; and the French Government had been assured by an official letter from the Secretary of State, written by order of the President, that the President approved of the communication made by Mr. Livingston. It is said, however, that all this is unsatisfactory to France. If the message of December last, taken in connexion with the previous disavowal of our minister at Paris, be now held to be insufficient, what alternative is left us but to rescind all our resolutions to insist on the treaty, and to abandon our claims on France, or to enter upon a system of restrictive measures against French commerce, as the President has lately recommended, which must probably terminate in a war? It is answered by some, I know, sir, (and possibly there may be men of all parties who think so,) that, to avoid these difficulties, the President ought to be called on to make the requisite apology directly to the French Government. Such, sir, is not my opinion. I hold that the President made the communication to Congress by his annual message in 1834, under the sanction and in obedience to the requisitions of an express clause in our constitution which commands him to make such recommendations to Congress "as he shall think fit;" and that, whether the sentiments contained in that message be right or wrong, he is responsible for them only to Congress and the country. I hold, further, that, for any thing contained in such a message, no foreign Government has any right to hold this Government responsible, unless the sentiment be adopted and acted upon by the Government itself. The mistake made by France, in this respect, arises out of the misconception which men living under a monarchical Government are prone to fall into when considering the powers of a mere President as resembling those of a King. The President is not the Government, although he has been too much accustomed to consider himself as such; and, in the discharge of his advisory duties, under the injunction which the constitution imposes upon him to "recommend to Congress such measures as he shall think fit," he is no more the organ of the Government than either House of Congress, taken singly and apart from the other co-ordinate departments of that Government. Nay, this Government is no more responsible to a foreign nation for his sayings in a message under the constitution, than it is for the exercise of the freedom of debate, which is the right of every member on this floor; and it is not less important that his right to express himself freely and fully to us in these messages should be preserved inviolate, than that a member of this body should remain unquestioned in any other place for the expression of his free opinions on every subject which he may think fit to discuss. Yet, if a member of this or the other House had used the same language in debate which the President employed in his message of December, 1834, for which an explanation is demanded by France, the demand of an explanation for it, and the refusal to pay the twenty-five millions of francs due to us under the treaty, because of such exercise of the right of opinion in debate, would have been held a gross infringement of the constitutional provision that members of Congress, "for any speech or debate in either House, shall not be questioned in any other place;" and the Government would have been held not responsible for any part or all that he had uttered. Were we now to demand of France an explanation for the language of every member of her Chambers who, in discussing the treaty, assailed, as several among them did, our national character, the demand would be met with an indignant frown and a peremptory denial. Sir, we can never surrender to any foreign nation the right of the Executive to communicate, unquestioned by any authority other than our own, what he thinks fit to Congress. The surrender of that involves at once the surrender of a similar right to take offence at, and compel an explanation for, every imprudent act or saying in every other department; and, in principle, it is nothing less than a surrender of the independence of the Government. The President, we are assured, will never yield to such a demand. My own conscientious convictions are, that he ought not to yield to it; and, though I am not, never have been, and never shall be, his partisan, yet I will stand by him in the assertion of his right to give to me and others here any opinions or advice which he may think fit to disclose by his messages, unquestioned by any foreign nation whatever. Permit me here to add that, whatever my own opinions of this or any future President may be, whether sustaining or opposing his views, I shall ever hold it to be the true part of a Senator to resist all interference from abroad in our party divisions and domestic dissensions, and to put down at once, so far as I may be able to do so, every attempt of any foreign Power to come between us, and make itself a party to any controversy among us.

With this view of the President's own determination, and the reasons for adopting it, it is clear that, while France persists in her demand, we cannot recede from our position, unless we abandon the treaty. Sir, we are at that point in the game of diplomacy where not another move is left us but to advance or surrender. France now has every opportunity afforded her to retreat without dishonor from her position, and to put an end to the controversy by the payment of the indemnity. Nay, she has no pretext left her to refuse it. The last annual message of the President ought to be held satisfactory to France. I trust she will act as becomes her; but, while it is solely at her option, or that of any other foreign nation, to select for itself at the next moment, without further admonition to us, either pacific or warlike measures, I consider it our duty to prepare for either contingency. I would not avail myself of this opportunity to expose the errors of our Government in this controversy, if I desired to expose them. The question now is not a question of war or no war. It is merely a question of defence; and for that I am prepared to act, without the slightest reference to what party may have provoked danger, or to what cause that danger may be ascribed.

Before I take leave of the subject of our foreign relations, indulge me, sir, with a very few remarks in reply to a single observation made by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY.] That gentleman, after detailing with great care some of the events which had transpired between us and France, and after assailing the Senate for not having last year voted for the then proposed amendment of $3,000,000 to the fortification bill, called upon us all (as the gentleman from Kentucky has already stated) to come out freely and frankly, and to declare whether, in the present aspect of our affairs, we were willing to remain quiet, or whether we would adopt a plan of non-intercourse with France. And, after this demand upon us all to leave the non-committal policy, and declare our future course with candor, he proceeded, he said, to declare his own sentiments. But, when he had thus excited much attention by this preface to his expected annunciation, he left us with a most lame and impotent conclusion, simply declaring that, for his part, he was—what? why, “not satisfied that things should remain exactly as they are.” The message which announces the mediation of England has since been received; and I hope the gentleman will be content that things should remain, for the present at least, exactly as they are. Let us wait, sir, till we learn the effect of the last annual message on France, and what is the feeling of that country in regard to the English mediation. And, in future, let me beg the honorable gentleman not to be so rash, but adopt a little more of the non-committal policy, by avoiding such hasty and inconsiderate avowals.

Throughout the whole debate on this resolution, the principal object of honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House seems to have been not so much to sustain the resolution itself as to inculcate those who, during the last session in this body, rejected what is called the three million amendment to the bill making appropriations for fortifications. Having now considered all the objections to the resolution before us, I shall follow the gentlemen so far as to meet and repel their unjust assault on the last Senate; and, in doing this, I shall not hesitate to put them on the defensive in return for their attack. I shall not follow the example of my honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] by refusing to be tried for my votes on that fortification bill before this Senate. I shall not plead, as he declared he would, to the jurisdiction. Here, or elsewhere, I stand prepared to refute and put down all accusations that have been, or may be now, levelled against me for my conduct as a member of this body, in regard to our foreign relations, as well as the great duty of providing for the national defence. No matter where, or by whom, a charge against any vote of mine on those subjects has been made, sir, I answer them all, that I have been faithful to the country, and that I am ready to prove it.

The first charge in which I, in common with every other member of the Senate, am involved, was made by a member of the House of Representatives from Massachusetts, [Mr. J. Q. ADAMS,] in his place, during the last session. After the proceedings of the Senate on the report of our Committee on Foreign Relations, and our unanimous vote to sustain the resolution which was recommended by that committee, as modified by the chairman, [Mr. CLAY,] that member of the House, at the last session, pronounced in debate that the Senate had dodged the question. Yes, sir, according to his judgment at the time, men of all parties here; men of the most opposite political opinions; friends and foes; administration men, whigs, and anti-masons, had all combined to dodge the question, because all had united in a vote on the 14th of January, 1835, declaring that, at that day, no legislative provision ought to be adopted in relation to the state of our affairs with France. The member from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] and the chairman, [Mr. CLAY,] the members from Pennsylvania, New York, Georgia, Tennessee, and every other State; men who never were before arraigned together on the same charge, and who, whatever other faults may have been imputed to them, were certainly never before charged with dodging any thing, were all thus arraigned together. Passing over for the present the kind feeling exhibited by such a remark towards our chairman, [Mr. CLAY,] and, indeed, all others here, and the degree of decorum which it evinced towards the whole mass of members in a co-ordinate branch of the Government, I ask now that the Senate may turn their attention to the propriety of the vote thus condemned. On the very day we thus voted, by way of response to the executive message recommending reprisals, Mr. Livingston, in Paris, was inditing a despatch to our Secretary of State, in which he uses the following language. Referring to the projet de loi, or bill of the French Chambers to make the appropriation for payment of our whole claim, he says, in his letter dated Paris, January 14, 1835: “The law, it is said, will be presented to-day, and I have very little doubt that it will pass. The ministerial phalanx, re-enforced by those of the opposition (and they are not a few) who will not take the responsibility of involving the country in the difficulties which they now see must ensue, will be sufficient to carry the vote. The recall of Serurier, and the notice to me, are measures which are resorted to to save the pride of the Government and the nation.” Sir, if Mr. Livingston had been present on the 14th of January last, holding the seat in this chamber which he formerly held, he must, for the very reason assigned in this despatch, have joined with us all in our vote. If we dodged the question in Washington, he, too, was dodging it at the same time in Paris; for, at the very time we were voting the resolution, he was writing the very reason for adopting it in a letter. Yet this despatch and the contents of this letter were wholly unknown to us until the 26th day of February, after our vote was given, when it was communicated by the President in a message to the other House, and ordered to be published. [Mr. C. here referred to the document of that date, and, having read it, continued.]

Sir, was there ever before presented to the mind of man more conclusive evidence of wisdom, foresight, firm, lofty, and patriotic purpose, in any statesman, than was given by the chairman of our Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. CLAY,] who drew that report, and under whose lead we all, with one voice, yielding up, as we all did that day, every party feeling on the altar of our country's welfare, voted a respectful but unanimous and decided dissent from the executive recommendation of reprisals, which we published to the world in connexion with the report, vindicating to all mankind the justice of our claims on France, and avowing a fixed resolve to insist on the execution of the treaty? It was a moment when a mistake on our part would have been fatal to the peace and prosperity of the whole country. It was a moment when, if we had yielded to the impetuosity of the executive recommendation, war must have been inevitable. It was a moment when, forming our own opinions from the data disclosed in the report, without any knowledge of the existing views of our minister at Paris, and possessed of no such means of ascertaining them as the President enjoyed, we dared to differ with him, and frankly to express our determination not to comply with his desire for hostile measures. At such a crisis in our affairs, we dared to stake our character before the people by the firm expression of an opinion which, if erroneous, would have prostrated us for ever. We staked upon it, under all the disadvantages of our situation, as to means of information, compared with the Executive, all that the statesman's aspirations can hope for, and all that the patriot's heart can wish; feeling that, if we erred, we should be denounced, but that, if right, we had saved our country from one of the greatest curses that could befall it. The report, sanctioned by this unanimous vote, was wafted across the Atlantic as rapidly as the winds and waves could bear it; and the effect of its reception in France was immediately perceptible there, in the general restoration of kind feeling towards our countrymen. That proud, sensitive, and warlike nation, at once felt that there was a power in this country to control the irritable and impetuous temper of the Executive; equally prepared, on the one hand, to offer no insult to any foreign nation, and, on the other, to submit to no meditated injury when mild and pacific remonstrances should fail to obtain redress for it. Sir, it was eminently by the force of this powerful document, this unanimous vote of the Senate, that the friends of justice and peace in the French Chamber of Deputies quelled the fierce spirits, eager there to find even a plausible pretext for a war, which, while it would have inflicted incalculable damage upon France, must, also, in six months, have swept our commerce from the ocean. The whole debate on the projet de loi shows it. Yet, sir, for this act we were charged with having dodged the question. The member of the other House who made this charge was, at the time, a prominent candidate for the vacant seat in the Senate from the State of Massachusetts. The election was still pending there when the charge was made. In a few days afterwards (I refer to his speech of the 14th February, 1835, for the fact) the same member appeared again in his place in the other House, and, by way of some atonement for his own denunciation, made an effort to dodge its effects upon himself, by declaring that, had he not been stopped at the time by the Speaker of the House for using disrespectful language of the Senate, he would have recommended to the Representatives of the nation also to dodge the question.

Sir, the Senate has been again attacked for the same vote, and from the same quarter. Not satisfied with his last year's exploits in the field against us, which were entirely unprovoked by us, but were passed over in pity to him and sincere respect for the feelings of his former friends, the same individual has introduced into another body a resolution to furnish him with a standing theme of declamation against us: and in a public newspaper has now assailed the very resolution in reference to which he, last year, on the 14th February, declared in a public speech in the other House, that "he thought that the Senate had acted as it was their duty to do; and the conclusion to which they had unanimously arrived was the conclusion which he should have been desirous that the House should adopt." Sir, is it not astonishing that this very same gentleman should, but the other day, have published of this same resolution, that it was "a resolution not only declining to do that which the President had recommended, to vindicate the rights and the honor of the nation, but positively determining to do nothing—not even to express a sense of the wrongs which the country was enduring from France;" that "no trace was to be found upon the journals of the Senate of the last session of Congress of sensibility to the wrongs which our country was enduring from France; and if upon those journals such a trace could be found, it must be to clearer and more searching eyes than his;" that the simple vote of the other House that the treaty should be maintained, and its execution insisted on, and which, he says, was moved by him, was "not only a departure from the do-nothing policy of the Senate, but might be felt to contain a pungent though tacit rebuke upon that paralytic policy;" that, had the Senate concurred in the three million appropriation "that vote would have made the Senate the unwilling accessory to implied censure upon its own quietism under foreign wrong?" Yes, sir; these and other like phrases, accompanied by charges of "overbearing arrogance," have been within a few days fulminated against that very Senate by the identical individual who last year proclaimed the very vote he now censures as that vote which, of all others, he would have recommended the House of Representatives to adopt. This second assault upon that Senate (a majority of which was composed of his friends when a majority of the people had driven him from power) is foiled and made powerless by the rashness and folly of its author. It falls on all parties, and alike, unfortunately for the real object of the individual who made it. Its effect is to insult even the most violent of the hot and high-toned advocates of executive power, though its only design was to strike down the powerless but inflexible opponents to executive encroachment in this body. I was pleased to be able to say to the honorable members from Missouri and Pennsylvania themselves, while I read this passage, stand up you who are so given to accusation against others, and hear the indictment against yourselves, for evincing by your vote for the Senate's resolution of the 14th of January last, a want of due and patriotic sensibility for the wrongs inflicted on your country by France. Sir, those gentlemen would do well to make some efforts to defend themselves against the attacks of others, before they commence any more assaults upon us; and this I will now endeavor to demonstrate to their satisfaction, better than by reading extracts from the speeches of the member of the other House who has assailed them in common with all the members of the last Senate.

The principal attack on me and my political friends here rests on the fact that we refused to vote on the last night of the last session for the following amendment, then proposed by the House of Representatives to the fortification bill:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance and increase of the navy: Provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

Before this amendment was offered, the appropriation bill providing for fortifications, which originated in the other House, had passed the Senate, which had already added by way of amendment $421,000 to the sums originally proposed by the House as sufficient. It was not until about 8 o'clock at night of the very last day of the session that the House proposed this amendment to our amendments, after rejecting some of ours, and among which so rejected by the House was an increase of $75,000 made by the Senate to the appropriation to rebuild Fort Delaware.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] has misconceived the scope of the argument against this three million amendment, and particularly that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who preceded him in this debate. Independently of the notorious fact that no such extraordinary appropriation was asked of us by the Executive, whose duty it was, if this sum was wanted for defence, to communicate the fact to Congress, most of those who voted down that amendment did hold, and did so express themselves at the time, that an appropriation in such general terms, proposing no object of expenditure but "the naval and military service," was forbidden by the spirit and the letter of the constitution. If it be new to him, it is because the gentleman has entirely overlooked the principle upon which the Senate acted. Sir, I invite the gentleman to examine the subject, which he says is novel to him, and to defend his vote, if he thinks he can do so, when we who voted otherwise retaliate upon him and his associates who endeavored to carry this amendment, by charging them with having, so far as they were able to effect it, assisted to break down the best barrier provided by the constitution against the absorption of the legislative in the executive power. With the view to test the confidence of honorable gentlemen in their opinions, as well as the accuracy and extent of their researches on this subject, it may be useful to ascertain how far they will carry their principles. I beg leave to know of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania whether, if the proposition for which he voted had been to appropriate three or thirty millions, "to be expended in whole or in part under the direction of the President, for the civil, naval, and military service, including fortifications," &c., he could have supported it consistently with his constitutional obligations or not? I pause for a reply to this question.

[Mr. BUCHANAN said he did not consider himself bound to declare any opinion beyond the one before expressed. He would, therefore, decline answering the question put to him by the gentleman from Delaware.]

Mr. CLAYTON continued. Sir, it was the part of prudence not to answer. I put the question to him, because I know of no man here, advocating his doctrine, better prepared or better able to resist or parry such a blow than the honorable gentleman himself. I claim no right to catechise him; but if he should think proper to answer the question proposed to him on another day, after he has had ample time to select that horn of the dilemma presented by it which pleases him best, it will gratify some of his friends here, among whom I rank myself, to learn whether he can possibly be driven to the absolute surrender of all legislative power to the Executive, so far as regards the appointment of the uses to which the public money shall be applied; or whether he will prefer, on reflection, to encounter the foregone conclusion which a denial of the constitutionality of so broad an appropriation as I have proposed for his consideration must necessarily result in. That amendment, for which the honorable gentleman and his political friends in this body did vote, proposed no other objects for expenditure than the naval and military service, including fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy. One hundred, or even ten dollars, bestowed on the objects included in the sweeping phrase "naval and military service," would satisfy the requisitions of the law, and leave, under the direction of the President, the whole residue of the three millions to be applied to any kind of naval and military service which he might designate. A law, in the very same words, granting fifty millions, to be expended by the President as he shall think proper, "for naval and military service," is not prohibited by the constitution if this be not. A law granting all the money in the treasury, to be expended under his direction, or as he shall think proper, "for civil, naval, and military service," is not prohibited by the constitution if this be not. The result then is, that whenever a popular President is in office, Congress must grant the whole money in the treasury, if required, or the whole sum requisite for civil, naval, and military service, which will embrace all the known objects of legitimate expenditure under this Government; or, should they fail to do so, they must subject themselves to the very exceptions taken to the vote of the Senate by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] who intimated that the vote of his colleague [Mr. WHITE] and others here indicated that they had not confidence in the President. Such a construction breaks down the Legislature whenever a popular man is at the head of the Government; and a popular Executive is the only one from which either the friends of the Legislature or the constitution can have any thing to fear. Should such a construction be established, it must inevitably lead Congress at last to a vote, under the administration of some popular chief, of all the money requisite for the support of Government, without any further designation of object or restriction of power than this—that the President shall expend it for the public service. In that day, no Senator here shall dare raise his voice against it, or, if one should follow our example, the charge of want of confidence in the President will crush him as a rebellious subordinate, and a factious legislator; the people themselves will hunt him down, and the State Legislatures will recall him, with a view to send another to expunge his vote. If our Government is to endure for any considerable period, it will witness the elevation to power of many men far more popular than President Jackson has ever been; and should the doctrine of the friends of the administration now become, by the prostration of the Senate for this cause, the received exposition of the constitution, the next popular Executive, pointing to this precedent, may demand it as due to the character he possesses, and as evincive of the confidence to which he is entitled, that a grant of three millions, for naval and military service, to be expended under his direction, shall be annually inserted in the appropriation bill. Another, ambitious of still further exhibitions of confidence, will soon demand a greater sum, under pretext of some other exigency; and, at last, precedent being built upon precedent, the legislative power will expire under these reiterated blows, and, with it, the liberties of the people. Sir, I have set my face against all this doctrine, with a stern resolution to resist it to the utmost. I will make no terms, I will know no compromise with it. I read in the constitution that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but by appropriations made by law. And I have heard no plausible answer to the simple but conclusive argument, that an appropriation does, ex vi termini, necessarily import a designation, an allotment or setting apart, for specific objects, specific sums of money. I go for the established definition of the word, as the English language was spoken, written, and understood, when the constitution was made, and as it is now and has ever been understood. I deny that a grant of fifty millions, "for the public service," to be expended under the direction of the President, is any appropriation. It is nothing more than an unconstitutional attempt to delegate representative power. It strikes at the root of the whole principle of representative government. I deny that a grant by Congress of three millions of dollars to the President, for the "naval and military service," differs a whit in principle from a general grant of all the revenue to be expended by the President for the naval and military service. In either case he may raise an army or build a navy with the money. The eighth section of the first article of the constitution gives to Congress alone the power "to raise and support armies," and "to provide and maintain a navy." In the execution of this trust power, we owe it to the country and its constitution to define, if practicable at the time to do so, how many men shall compose the army which we undertake to raise and support; what kind of troops it shall consist of; how many ships shall compose the navy which we undertake to provide and maintain, and of what class they shall be; and, in general, the whole course and practice of Congress, under the constitution, ab urbe condita, has been in accordance with this duty. The three million amendment was not only objectionable because it was a departure from our whole course of legislation in these particulars, but because it was, if sustained, a grant of money to raise either an army or a navy at the discretion of the President alone, without even limiting the amount to be applied to either purpose. It was an abandonment of the whole trust confided to us, to the full extent of the sum to be taken thus from the treasury.

The power "to raise and support armies," and to "provide and maintain a navy," conferred by the eighth section of the first article of the constitution, is accompanied by other trust powers in the same section, a reference to which may be useful to illustrate the extent to which the principle contended for by the advocates of this amendment will carry them. Would it be constitutional, I ask, to grant three millions, or any other sum, to be expended under the direction of the President, for the purpose of "laying and collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," without specification of the tax, duty, impost, or excise, or even the extent of each? or for the purpose of "borrowing money on the credit of the United States," and "regulating commerce," without directing how much should be spent in borrowing money, how much in regulating commerce, how much money should be borrowed, and how the commerce should be regulated? or for the purpose of "coining money, and fixing the standard of weights and measures," without saying how much should be spent for each purpose, and even without declaring how the money should be coined, and how the standard of weights and measures should be fixed? or for the purpose of "establishing post offices and post roads," "defining and punishing piracies and offences against the law of nations," "declaring war," and "exercising exclusive legislation over the District?" Sir, upon what principle is it that any man can sustain the constitutionality of this proposed amendment, under which the President was authorized to raise an army or provide a navy, so far as three millions would effect it, if he cannot also sustain a grant of power over three millions to be expended by the President in "declaring war," without saying when or against what nation it shall be declared? If one of these trust powers can be thus delegated, all that are given by the same clause may be delegated; and the boundary between executive and legislative authority hereafter may be broken down, and will be broken down, whenever, in the future progress of our Government, an ambitious usurper shall appear, claiming and exacting, on the mere score of his popular character, the confidence of Congress.

Sir, I say, therefore, to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, that I envy him not the enjoyment of that pride which he professed to feel when he declared that he viewed the period of his midnight vote for this abominable proposition as the proudest moment of his life. The honorable gentleman does not profess to have examined the constitutional question. I feel too much respect for him as a jurist to believe for a moment that he has deliberately, and on full investigation, determined this question to suit the vote he gave. And be it now understood, in sheer justice to him and others who did in this and the other House vote for that proposition, under the impulse of sudden feeling, on the very last day of the session, in the midst of the bustle and distraction of a scene of which men who have not at some period of their lives represented their fellow-citizens in one or the other House of Congress can have no adequate conception, that this proposition was sprung upon the members of the other House, and passed not only, as the gentleman says, without time to discuss it, but without time for any man to weigh it and consider it in its most remote and most alarming consequences. The feeling which impelled gentlemen to this sudden and dangerous vote was, in general, doubtless patriotic. Yet, even amidst the distracting hurry of the scene of a last day's session, all men of the party most devoted to the Executive in the other House did not obey the impulse of feeling and concur in that vote; and in this no less than twenty-nine members, among whom were some of all parties, rose, after but a few moments of reflection, against it. Nothing could have been more unexpected. In confirmation of the remark made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the President himself had not prepared any member for it by asking him to move any such proposition, and of his further observation that there was no time to discuss it, let me remind the members of the last Senate of the manner in which, as I observed at the time, we were routed at night out of a secret session by a message from the House to announce it. Sir, if a bomb-shell had suddenly exploded on the floor of the Senate, it could scarcely have produced greater surprise and consternation among those who were not in the confidence of the Executive, nor acquainted with the midnight movements and secret wishes of his partisans.

It is in vain, sir, that the honorable gentlemen who commenced this war on us for that vote now seek to find shelter from the storm of the attack upon themselves, for their unconstitutional proposition, by case-hunting through the whole mass of congressional precedents for a single one to sustain them. The statute book does not present a parallel to it. An appropriation of two millions "for pay and subsistence" of troops under an act of 1806, authorizing the President to call out the militia, and two large appropriations "for foreign intercourse," made in the years 1806 and 1808, the instances relied on by honorable gentlemen as furnishing precedents for their votes, are examples not of general but of specific appropriations, the objects being designated in the grant of the money.

[Mr. C. here read these and other acts, to show that the appropriations contained in them were all of a specific character.]

We every year pass appropriations in the same words, and the language thus applied is understood to designate the object for which our money shall be expended, so that it cannot be applied to any other purpose. When Mr. Jefferson came into office, he carried the doctrine for which I contend so far as to recommend in his message of the 8th of December, 1801, the "appropriation of specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition," and it was this principle upon which his disciples most plumed themselves as exhibiting their scrupulous regard for the constitution, however those who now claim to be his exclusive followers have abandoned this great land mark of his party. The whole range of legislative precedents established by successive Congresses which supported his administration, and the subsequent administrations of this Government, acquired a character in consequence of the earnestness with which the democratic party insisted on the principle of specific appropriations, which accounts at once for the failure of honorable gentlemen, who now advocate the contrary doctrine, to find a single authority to support them. Sir, another reason for their failure may also be assigned. President Jackson, when he came into office, professed to act on the principle of specific appropriations, as well as the other doctrines of Jefferson. In his inaugural address, delivered on the 4th March, 1829, after pledging himself to an economical administration, and the counteraction of that profligacy caused by a profuse expenditure of public money, he says: "Powerful auxiliaries to the attainment of this desirable end are to be found in the regulations provided by the wisdom of Congress for the specific appropriation of public money." And even in his message of the 7th of December last he says: "No one can be more deeply impressed than I am with the soundness of the doctrine which restrains and limits, by specific provisions, executive discretion, as far as it can be done consistently with the preservation of its constitutional character." He adds: "The duty of the Legislature to define, by clear and positive enactment, the nature and extent of the action which it belongs to the Executive to superintend, springs out of a policy analogous to that which enjoins upon all the branches of the federal Government an abstinence from the exercise of powers not clearly granted." He afterwards again reiterates: "The same rule of action should make the President ever anxious to avoid the exercise of any discretionary authority which can be regulated by Congress!" Again, in the next paragraph, he says: "In my former messages to Congress, I have repeatedly urged the propriety of lessening the discretionary authority lodged in the various departments."

Sir, all these messages were looked to by his partisans as the texts from which they were to preach, and the creed on which their political salvation depended. If they, having always had the power to prevent, in the other House, the passage of any law making an appropriation without specification of object, could have produced another example in which they had "Kept the word of promise to the ear, But broke it to the hope,"

it would have been, indeed, but another melancholy commentary on the instability of all human professions, and the utter worthlessness of that sounding patriotism which explodes in party pledges.

Indulge me in another question to the honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House. Had this proposition been couched in such language as would have authorized the President to take our places in this chamber, and decide, while we withdrew to give him the undisturbed use of the room, how three millions of the public treasure should be disbursed "for the naval and military service," would a man among them have acceded to it? Why not? Had such a proposition been adopted, it would have been quite as good an appropriation; quite as definite a specification of the purposes for which the money should be expended; and, in one most essential particular, such a proposition would have been greatly preferable to that for which they voted: for, although it would have exhibited less confidence in the President than the vote they gave, which allowed him to decide at any time within nine months what should be done with the money, it would have required of him to come here and tell us at once to what uses the money should be appropriated. We might have gone into the gallery, as quiet spectators of his exercise of the legislative power; but we should have enjoyed the satisfaction of hearing his decision at the time; and, while we yet lingered in the Capitol, we could have congratulated one another on the mode and manner in which his wisdom had disposed of the money. When we wended our way back to the people, we could then have told them what was to be done with their three millions: as, what forts were to be built, and where they were to be erected; what ships and what arms were wanted; or what number of troops should be raised for their army. This would have given the workmen and contractors for public jobs amongst us an opportunity of entering into competition with the executive favorites; for then, having some chance to know what was to be done, they could have put in their bids for the public works to be erected. I could have gone home rejoicing in my ability to answer the earnest interrogations of my constituents, whether Fort Delaware was to be rebuilt; whether the breakwater was to be defended; and whether frigates or gunboats were to be used in the Delaware, in the event of a war. But honorable gentlemen will now perceive that the vote they gave was a much more alarming surrender of their legislative power. They yielded up their trust, and gave the President, with it, the privilege of keeping his intentions secret until the moment of expenditure; their only restriction upon the period allowed for his exercise of it being that he should spend it at some time "prior to the next meeting of Congress;" when, indeed, upon their principle of confidence, they ought again to have assembled, voted twenty millions at once for the public service, to be expended by the President "prior to the next meeting of Congress," and adjourned without further expense to the people. Sir, I do solemnly denounce this proposition, which the Senate alone resisted on the last night of last session, as a measure in principle no better than the regulations of Caligula, who suspended his laws on pillars so high that men might not read them in the public ways. Even his laws might have been read by the aid of ladders. But by what possible means could that portion of the people who have no access to the private ear of the President have climbed to the information of his plans of defence, during the period for which he was to have been permitted to keep his purpose secret?

Viewing this proposed appropriation of three millions of dollars without restriction, specification, or limitation as to objects other than the naval and military service, as not only unconstitutional, but as destructive of the first principles of representative government; having considered and expressed his solemn conviction, after a year's deliberation, that it laid the foundation for the introduction of dictatorial power in this Government, and contained the very language in which a dictator might be appointed under a pretence of some future pressing emergency, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] in the midst of a strain of fervid eloquence and indignant remonstrance against this attempted outrage, which has not been equalled in the debate, and cannot be excelled, had declared that "if the proposition were now before us, and the guns of the enemy were battering against the walls of the Capitol, he would not agree to it; that the people of this country have an interest, a property, an inheritance, in the constitution, against the value of which forty Capitoles do not weigh the twentieth part of one poor scruple." Taking authority for so doing from another part of the Capitol, I read the following remark, as published in the National Intelligencer, in reference to this sentiment: "Sir, for a man uttering such sentiments, there would be but one step more, (a natural and easy one to take,) and that would be, with the enemy at the walls of the Capitol, to join him in battering them down."

And he who published this, has also published that, when he uttered it, he "was interrupted by a spontaneous burst of feeling and applause." But, he adds, "the indiscretion was momentary, and the most respectful silence followed."

Sir, I pass over without notice the account given of "applause," and "a spontaneous burst of feeling," and "indiscretion," and then "the most respectful silence." Indeed, I know nothing of these allegations, except as I find them here stated. But, in regard to that denunciation of the sentiment of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who is this day elsewhere necessarily detained, and in reference to the particular individual who was the author of that denunciation, I have something to say.

The opinion expressed in this denunciation is, that it would be a natural and easy step for the Senator from Massachusetts to take, to join the enemies of his country in war—in other words, to turn traitor, and merit by his treason the most ignominious of all deaths, with an immortality of infamy beyond the grave!

And for what? The Senator from Massachusetts had expressed a preference for the constitution to the Capitol of his country. He had dared to declare that, he prized the magna charta of American liberty, the sacred bond of our union, the tie which binds together twelve millions of freemen, above the stones and mortar which compose the crumbling mass within whose walls we are assembled. "The very head and front of his offending hath this extent—no more." No man here has questioned, in the most violent moments of party excitement, not amidst the fiercest of all political strife, his purity of purpose in debate. Grant to him, what all others who have any title to the character of gentlemen demand for themselves, that he believed what he said; grant that, in his judgment, as well as that of many here, the very existence of our liberties is involved in the surrender of the principle he contended for; grant that the concentration of legislative and executive power in the hands of a single man is the death-blow to the constitution, and that the Senator was right in considering the proposed appropriation as establishing the very principle which gave that fatal blow; and who is he that, thus believing, would support that proposition, because the guns of the enemy were battering at the walls of the Capitol? Where is the coward, where is the traitor, who would not rather see the Capitol than the constitution of his country in ruins; or who would lend himself to the establishment of a despotism among us, with a view to save this building for the despot to revel in? Sir, in the days when Themistocles led the Athenians to victory at Salamis, he advised them to surrender their capitol for the preservation of the constitution of their country. That gallant people rose under the impulse of patriotism as one man, and with a stern resolution to yield life itself rather than abandon their liberties, and surrender the proud privilege of legislating for themselves to the delegate of a Persian despot, who offered them "all their own dominions, together with an accession of territory ample as their wishes, upon the single condition that they should receive law and suffer him to preside in Greece." At that eventful period of their history, Crysilus alone proposed the surrender of their constitution to save the capitol; and they stoned him to death. The public indignation was not yet satisfied; for the Athenian matrons then rose and inflicted the same punishment on his wife. Leaving their capitol, and their noble city, rich as it was with the productions of every art, and glittering all over with the proudest trophies and the most splendid temples in the world; deserting, in the cause of free government, the very land that gave them birth, they embarked on board their ships, and fought that battle, the name of which has made the bosoms of freemen to thrill with sympathy in all the ages that have followed it, and shall cause the patriot's heart to beat higher with emotion through countless ages to come.

I repeat, sir, what no man who knows the Senator from Massachusetts has ever doubted, and what no man who has a proper respect for himself will ever question, that he was sincere in declaring that he viewed the proposition under debate as involving the surrender of the most valuable trust reposed in us by the constitution to a single man; and as one which, while it delegates the legislative power to the Executive, establishes a precedent to prostrate the constitution for ever. Then tell me, what should be the fate of that man, (if such a man can be found,) who, having owed his elevation to the highest office in the world to that gentleman and his friends, and having been sustained in the administration of it by the exertion of all the powers of that giant intellect which is now the pride of the Senate and the boast of the country, could, without other provocation, have published that such a friend, after giving utterance to such a sentiment as he did in debate here, would find it a very natural and easy step to turn traitor to his country by joining with her enemies in war? Sir, all good men will say that the convincing argument which could have induced from such a quarter such a remark, the author of that comment will find, not in the observation he has condemned, but in his own heart; and those who are acquainted with past events will add, that it has proceeded from one who has habitually found it a very "natural and an easy step" to turn traitor to his friends. Such a man should never be suffered by honorable men to stand in any party again; for this unprovoked denunciation proves that its author will be false to all parties, and true to no friend. I will do those in power the justice to say that I do not believe they have ever invited his embraces, or proffered him any office, however that may be the true object for which he has thus shamefully denounced his friend and abandoned his party. No, sir; if he be a political traitor, they

"Gave him no instance why he should do treason, Unless to dub him with the name of traitor."

[Mr. CLAYTON was here called to order by the Chair, (Mr. KING,) on the ground that it was not allowable by the rules to reply to what had been said in the other House at this session.]

Mr. C. said that he had not named any man in the other House as the author of the remarks which had just been the subject of his comment; and that, by making observations on what had appeared in a newspaper, he had only followed an example which had been lately set by a member of that House.

Mr. C. continued. Sir, I will not follow that example, after the Chair has reminded me that it would be improper to pursue it further; and I willingly dismiss the disgusting specimen of human ingratitude which gave occasion for my remarks, without further consideration.

Having now, sir, disposed of so much of the subject as relates to the constitutional question involved in the "three million amendment," I take issue with the gentlemen who have sought to prove that the Senate caused the loss of the fortification bill, on two remaining points.

First, then, I say that the loss of this amendment, in the form in which it was presented, does by no means prove that even an extra grant of three millions would have been refused, had it been offered for specific purposes of defence, involving no constitutional question, and accompanied with a request from the President, who was bound, by his oath under the constitution, to ask it if it was necessary. On the contrary, sir, I have not the slightest doubt that, had the President asked for the three millions for defence, alleging that it was necessary in his opinion, and requesting the passage of a law in the usual form of specific appropriations, of the propriety of which the Senate could have judged, it would have had the vote of a majority of the Senate. If, however, the President had asked the three millions for the purpose of adopting any measures which must necessarily have produced a war with France, I have as little doubt that the Senate would have refused it.

Sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, (as one speaking by authority,) that the President never asked any member of Congress to move this proposition. We learn from a debate in another place that the Executive did desire it to be made at the time, but also desired that the fact should not be made known.* Information of the President's wishes, or of the views of any Department, ought not to be communicated in midnight whispers to a chosen few; all are equally entitled to know the executive recommendation.

In the second place, I deny that it by any means follows, although gentlemen have alleged it, that the loss of the whole bill, providing for fortifications and defence, was necessarily caused by the failure of the proposed amendment. The agreed facts are, that, after we had rejected it, a committee of conference was appointed by both Houses; that this committee met and readily agreed to a substitute for the lost amendment, consisting of two specific appropriations for defence, together amounting to $800,000; that they parted with a perfect understanding that this was all that was necessary; that the Senate's committee reported accordingly; and that the Senate was perfectly prepared to adopt the recommendation of the committee, and anxious thus to secure the passage of the bill; that, after waiting here a long time for the action of the House, which had the bill in its possession, the Senate sent a message "respectfully to remind" the House of this bill, which had not been acted on, and continued to wait here until it was perfectly certain that the other House had utterly refused to take up the bill again, or transact any other business. Sir, the bill fell (and I say it was notorious at the time that it fell) because the committee of conference on the part of the House refused to report the amendments which they themselves had agreed upon in committee, until the lateness of the hour furnished them with that miserable excuse for their conduct which the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] and a very few others, still venture to maintain as sufficient. I refer to the pretext that it was midnight; at which witching hour, as these gentlemen now contend, Congress was dissolved, and the session had expired.

But the fact is conclusively established by the statement of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] himself, who was one of the conferees on the part of the House, and one of the friends of the administration, that, when the conferees separated, it was not twelve o'clock, and there was time to pass the bill before that hour, had the House been so disposed. Sir, he says he knows this fact; for, at the time, he looked at his watch. Our conferees returned here a considerable time before midnight. The recollection of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LEIGH,] who also looked at his watch, is, that when they returned it was not eleven o'clock. Sir, this pretext, set up as an excuse for the conduct of the other House, is thus proved, by men of all parties, to be untrue in point of fact, and the result of an entire misrecollection. But suppose it was twelve o'clock at night when the conferees agreed: was it ever before in the history of this Government pretended, by either House, that a bill could not be passed after midnight of the last day? Sir, you know well that, since we have served together in the Senate, the President has signed many bills after midnight which were passed after midnight. At the end of the very first Congress after he came into power he was up until long after that hour, and the Senate and House both closed their labors about the rising of the sun on the ensuing day, being constantly engaged through the whole night in the passage of bills, which were signed without objection that we have heard of. Such, all agree, has been the practice of the Government from the earliest period. You and I remember, sir, that, on one occasion, the Senate met after sunrise on the 4th of March, transacted executive business, and communicated with the President in regard to it. This practice is said to be founded on the belief that the congressional day commences and terminates at noon, instead of midnight; that Congress never has convened on the first day of any session before twelve at noon; that, until that hour, no member takes his oath, nor is either House organized; and that the pay of every member must commence only with his qualification and his labors. Sir, I presume there was not a member of either House who refused to accept his full compensation for the last day of last session, on the ground that he did not serve after midnight, or was functus officio when the clock told that hour. If the doctrine of the gentleman from Tennessee be correct, how did it happen that he took full pay, as for the whole of that last day, although he could act only for the half of it? The gentleman from Pennsylvania repudiates this whole doctrine, and says he has never had, and never shall have, any difficulty in doing his duty after midnight. The party generally appears to be ashamed of this pretext. And how has the conscience of the gentleman from Tennessee himself rested under fifty votes which he has probably given after midnight, within my knowledge? He now contends that he was functus officio on all those occasions, and had no right to vote. If, says he, the congressional day does not terminate at twelve at night, why is it so common to set the clock back? I answer, because we have always had two or three tender consciences like his own to deal with; and, so long as these gentlemen could see the clock stood still, they said they were not bound to look at their watches. They went by "Capitol time," and having examined the constitutional question, how long they were bound to stay at work for a whole day's pay, some of them would leave us on a scruple of conscience when our clock struck twelve; but I never heard that one of them gave up any part of the pay.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, with a view to make up the issue in such shape as would put the Senate on trial with the best advantage to himself, announced that the true question for discussion was—who is blameable for the present defenceless condition of the seaboard? Sir, I shall not avoid the examination of that question. It presents no difficulty. As to the fact, upon which he dwelt so earnestly, that it is defenceless, he has already seen that I concur with him and others who have proclaimed its defenceless condition. He may add as much more coloring to that picture of the danger arising from this neglect as his imagination can supply him with, and I shall not seek to deface or obscure it. He may ring it again and again in the ears of the people, that, in the event of a rupture with a foreign country, our cities would be sacked, our coast pillaged, and our people butchered. The more he magnifies the danger, the greater will be the condemnation of those who, for seven years past, have held the power to prevent this state of things, and have neglected their duty. Sir, his political friends have held the reins for a longer period; for they had their majority in Congress before the termination of the last administration. In the other House, they have ever since held an overwhelming influence; and in this, with the exception of the last three years only, they have also been in a constant majority. The other House never proposed a measure for defence, before last session, in which the Senate refused to concur; and, what is more worthy of note, they never proposed a bill for defence to which the Senate did not add largely by amendment. For seven years, during which time I have held a seat here, the action of the Senate was always quite as prompt as that of the other House on these subjects, and, indeed, if my memory be correct, we were generally in advance of them. Sir, it is in vain that the gentleman seeks to cast that fearful responsibility arising out of more than seven years' neglect of our Atlantic seaboard, upon the minority in Congress. In vain does he invoke the judgment of the public for our naked and exposed condition against that Senate which, during the two or three years when the administration has not been able to control its vote, has been made the scapegoat to bear nearly all the other neglects and transgressions of those in power. The fact is, and every man now within sound of my voice knows it, or ought to know it, that, not only has our whole system of improvement been checked, but the defences of our country have been shamefully neglected, since the present party came into power, on the miserable pretext of paying off the national debt—a debt which was never pressing, and which would have been easily extinguished by the operation of the old sinking-fund act, long before it could possibly have been felt as an injury, if internal improvements had been still properly encouraged, and our seacoast had been properly fortified. Witness now that wonderful exhibition of financial skill and statesmanship by which, when all the other debts had been disposed of, the old thirteen millions, drawing an interest of only three per cent., and nearly all in the hands of foreigners, was paid off, in despite of all remonstrances, for the sake of making the vainglorious boast that, during this administration, the whole national debt was extinguished. At the time we were paying these three per cents. the army, the navy, the fortifications, the roads and canals, the improvement of our rivers, and even the ordinary facilities for commerce, were neglected. Lighthouse bills, improvement bills, and bills to distribute a portion of the avails of the public domain among the States, for the purposes of improvement and education, were either voted down or vetoed down, and all for glory—ay, for the glory of paying off the national debt, by withdrawing from the people the use of their money, which was surely worth to them, not only for defence, but for improvement, the legal rate of interest, and extinguishing a debt in the hands of foreign creditors drawing three per cent. only. Why, sir, the fact is notorious, that such has been this miserable and morbid excitement, industriously kept up to gratify party pride and folly, that scarce a week has elapsed within the last seven years in which some newspaper editor has not reminded us of the glory of this administration in paying off the national debt; yet, during all this time, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, our whole seaboard has been left naked and exposed to any invader, our cities have been constantly in danger of being sacked, our coast pillaged, and our people butchered, without the means of resistance in the event of a war. This glory has left us all the while at the mercy of any foreign Power which could have chosen at any moment to assail us.

The only salvo now relied upon to sustain those in power from their own charge against the Senate of leaving, the whole seaboard defenceless, is, that a majority (not all) of their party friends in Congress did, at the last moment of the last session, propose and vote for this "three million amendment." But what could have been effected with that money if we had granted it? Would that have built up fortifications, and put the navy and army on a war establishment, within the nine months allowed for its expenditure? Sir, if it had been applied to no mischievous purpose calculated to induce a war with France, which some think was its real design, its effects upon the seacoast in erecting forts would not have increased the permanent security of the country to a perceptible extent before the meeting of Congress. If, through the whole period during which this administration has been in power, we had been regularly progressing with a system of national defence, properly adapted to the wants and means of the republic, we should hardly yet have been in a state of preparation for war becoming such a country and such glorious institutions as ours. Labor itself cannot always be commanded by money, and time is indispensable in the proper construction of all great works; and an error not uncommon in regard to our public works of every description has been, to do in months what should be the work of years. But in order to show the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his friends how utterly indefensible they are when arraigned on their own charges, let us now concede, for the mere purpose of argument, that this "three million amendment," upon which they relied, would have been sufficient for putting the army and navy on a war establishment; that it could have effected all this in nine months, and that it was necessary to expend it. I ask them, how comes it about that they have suffered two whole months of the present session to pass away without renewing this or some similar proposition? and how do they excuse themselves for not having proposed so salutary a measure at an earlier day during the last session? The moment of the vote on that amendment, the gentleman says, he shall always look upon as the proudest moment of his life. Doubtless, in his estimation, it was a most happy vote for him. Then, why not renew it? Why does that patriotism whose midnight vigils receive so much applause slumber during the broad daylight, and why has it slept so long? He has known that the only objection of many among us to the proposition was a constitutional objection, which, by altering the proposition from a general to a specific one, he could obviate. Then, why has he not proposed it, or something like it, for the last two months, during all which time, according to his own language, we have incurred the danger of having our cities sacked, our coast pillaged, and our people butchered, for the want of it? Since last session all intercourse with France has been suspended; a powerful fleet, we are told, has been hovering near our coast and acting as a fleet of observation, and, with the vigilance of a hawk, ready to stoop on our unprotected commerce from its commanding position, or to attack our naked seaboard at the slightest notice.

To the question, why this measure was proposed only at the last moment of the last session, the honorable member from Pennsylvania has already attempted an answer. He took especial pains to bring us to the point of time at which this amendment was rejected. His object seemed to be to demonstrate that then the patriot should have spoken out, by the surrender of his constitutional scruples, and the delegation of his representative power over the public treasure to the President. He reviewed the state of our relations with France for the very purpose of showing that, at that period, our affairs were at a peculiarly dangerous crisis, and labored to excuse himself and his friends who brought forward this proposition at that time, by making the impression upon his hearers that there was just then a new impulse given by recent intelligence from France to the adoption of measures preparatory to a war. But, sir, most unfortunately for this excuse, the intelligence to which he has referred was decidedly of a pacific character, and was precisely that very information by which any reasonable man, however apprehensive of danger before its arrival, would have been convinced that then there was not the slightest apparent necessity for a resort to any measures of a hostile character. Sir, the honorable gentleman (doubtless by mistake) repeated only a part of a sentence in the letter of Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State of the 15th of January, 1835, which was communicated to the other House by the President's message of 26th February last. But, however favorable to his position the sentence may have been as he repeated it in the hurry of debate, yet when the part which he omitted is supplied, the whole is absolutely fatal to it. The passage in Mr. Livingston's letter to which he referred is in these words: "If the law should be rejected, I should not be surprised if France anticipated our reprisals by the seizure of our vessels in port, or the attack of our ships in the Mediterranean with a superior force." Mr. Livingston then expressly predicates his apprehension of danger upon the contingency of the rejection of the law to which the gentleman did not advert; and I have already shown that Mr. Livingston had carefully informed us in his previous letter of the 14th January, sent here by the same hand, and communicated to Congress with the letter of the 15th, that his decided conviction was that the law would pass; that the ministry were re-enforced by a powerful portion of the opposition in the Chambers determined to avoid hostilities, and sufficient to carry the vote; and that the very measures which had before alarmed us,

SENATE.]

National Defence.

(the recall of Serurier and the notice to our minister,) were measures which were resorted to merely to save the pride of the French Government and the French nation. Sir, this, the only evidence referred to by the honorable gentleman, to inculcate me and my friends for not joining with him in his midnight vote, proves conclusively that if those who acted with him were justified by their apprehensions of a foreign war, in proposing such a measure as they did at that time, they were grossly derelict of duty, and faithless to their trust, in not having proposed any proper measure of defence at any period of the session before the arrival of this pacific intelligence, and when, by their present reasonings, it is made apparent that there must have been in their minds reasons for alarm seriously and affectively oppressive to their patriotic hearts. But that sensibility to danger, which is now avowed to have been felt only at the very point of time when this vote was given, caused by a new and sudden impulse of patriotic feeling, on reading Mr. Livingston's despatch, slept for a week after the despatch was in their hands, and slumbered through the whole session of Congress, before that witching time of night when, contrary to all reasonable analogy, it was first roused to action. Months had passed away, yet not a whisper had been heard from it. The war message of the President, the recall of ministers, and the known refusal of France to pay the money, with all calculations of the effect of the message on her national pride, had not affected its slumbers. All the while it slept, and even snored. For those who profess to have felt it stirring on the night of the 3d of March, had joined with us in the vote of the 14th of January, 1835, declaring that then (when there was certainly much greater excuse for feigning apprehension) no legislative measures whatever ought to be adopted in reference to the state of our affairs with France. France heard the note across the Atlantic, and felt assured that a sensibility which gave such evidence of its slumbers would not suddenly awaken to prepare for war; and its effect was to lull her too into a state of tranquillity. Sir, what a pity for us was it, if all this apprehension was justifiable at that period, that it was not awakened until the conscience of the honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] and his friends in the other House, awoke to stifle all the exertions of those who felt it—that twelve o'clock conscience, which was roused by the first blast of the party bugle, to start scruples destructive to the fortification bill, but which took a nap before the next crowing of the cock, lest it should interrupt the passage of the bill to repair the Cumberland road.

Then, sir, as to the peculiar excitement which has been alleged to have existed in the public mind on the 3d of March last, and which has been assigned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as another excuse for proposing this grant of three millions at that particular moment. What excitement does he refer to? We know there was no alarm among the people at that period; no apprehension either felt or expressed on account of any threatened hostilities. I have recurred to some files of papers of that day, and find their general tone was just what we should have expected after the publication of Mr. Livingston's letters, giving assurances that the act of indemnity would pass. I know that a great effort was made in the other House, for a few days, to get up an excitement; there was much debate there about our relations with France, and the result of it all was, that the precious hours which remained of the session, and which ought to have been devoted to the real business of the people then pressing that House, were consumed in a tedious discussion which resulted in a vote that the treaty ought to be maintained, and its execution insisted on—the mere echo of the sentiment in the unanimous report of our Committee on Foreign Relations, made six weeks before. Most of the highly important bills which had passed the Senate were thus utterly neglected by that House; and, in addition to the bill to regulate the public deposits, and the others mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts, was one of far more importance to the peace of the country—I mean, sir, the bill to settle and establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio. That bill had twice passed the Senate, and on both occasions, under some pretext, or for some reason, no test vote could ever be obtained to ascertain the sense of the other House upon it. Last year it was talked down by the discussion about the French treaty; and the result was, that we have been nearly involved in a civil war, on account of the unsettled claims of Michigan and Ohio. That single bill was worth more to the peace and happiness of the country than all the discussions and resolutions of the other House in regard to France. Sir, it would be no difficult matter to run up a catalogue of similar injuries to the public business; but I forbear. My only object in noting these things at all is to show the honorable gentlemen who have unjustly assailed the Senate for the loss of a single bill, how easy it would be for any one who felt an appetency for such an undertaking, to carry the war into their own ranks with success, on account of their neglect of bills vastly more important to the public interest. Sir, I take no pleasure in such attacks, and I leave them to others.

What may have been the motive for this ill-timed and unprovoked assault upon the last Senate, by certain members of the present, the world will judge. When the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, who occupies the seat nearest to the chair, [Mr. WHITE,] addressed you in vindication of his own vote, given against the amendment for three millions, some thoughts, I do confess, occurred, which led me to form my own conclusions as to the real object of this war upon that vote. That honorable gentleman said that he craved a severance on the trial under the indictment preferred against the majority of the Senate, and pleaded his acquittal by the Legislature of Tennessee, which had unanimously re-elected him since he gave that vote. Sir, it may be that if he were not joined in the bill of indictment, others here would hardly have been put on their trial. It may be considered necessary to make the most of this, the only offence which he has committed against the administration; but I can hardly yet believe that, even among his old political friends, he need apprehend a condemnation for that vote, should he go to trial with the rest of us before the country under the general issue. The difference in the votes of the honorable Senators from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE and Mr. GRUNDY,] on the amendment to the fortification bill, has called up some reminiscences of by-gone events, exhibiting some other differences between them. When I first came into Congress, they were both considered so true to the administration, and so effective in its aid, that, out of sheer compliment among their friends here, they were called "Jackson's Tennessee rifles." They both proved true for a time, and told, with unerring certainty, in every conflict with those who opposed the Executive. But, although both were called good rifles, there was an allowed difference between them. One missed the mark altogether, during that famous contest which was carried on here about the time of Mr. Foot's resolution. It was believed to have been near bursting in consequence of being overcharged with nullification powder. There was also another failure. This same rifle was assigned to the defence of the Post Office, and was charged to the muzzle for keeping and maintaining that position; but the post was carried by its assailants, and the defence was censured by those who directed it, because the enemy entered in despite of the garrison, and exposed most piratical depredation which had been committed on the people. For my own part, I have always inclined to attribute this failure to the indefensible condition of that post. But, said Mr. C., (pointing to the seat of Mr. WHITE,) the old Tennessee rifle which has stood against that desk ever since I first knew it, was a rare piece, and always has attracted my especial admiration; although fighting on the other side, I never liked to see it come into action. For six years, although it was almost every day engaged, it never snapped, missed, or hung fire; nor was it ever said to have failed to hit the mark, until about midnight of the 3d of March last. The people of Tennessee, who are said to be excellent judges of a good shot or a gallant blow, have since decided that this was a most "palpable hit," and that however others, who are ignorant of the qualities of a first-rate weapon, may have foolishly desired to break the old rifle of the West, they still hold it entitled to the first rank when employed for their defence; and will never consent that it shall either be injured by abuse, or left out of service. Even those who have condemned it, because, as they think, it has once missed the mark, may relent, when they reflect that it has been clearly shown in this debate that, on the occasion alluded to, the President himself did neither charge it nor pull the trigger.

Sir, jesting apart, I ask, why was it that the Senator from Tennessee who is farthest from the chair, [Mr. GRUNDY,] with others here, who now portray in such vivid colors the dangers arising out the loss of their favorite amendment, did not exhibit some signs of life at the time the extra appropriation for specific purposes of defence, amounting to five hundred thousand dollars, was lost here on the 24th of February last? That amendment was, as I have on a former occasion stated, first moved by me in the Committee on Military Affairs, in the shape of a proposition to instruct the chairman of that committee, [Mr. BENTON.] It was made, as I have stated, in advance of any similar suggestion from any other quarter. After it was made, the chairman called on the Department of War for an opinion in regard to it, and it was approved by the proper officer, as appears by the report of the committee. It was reported, as I have once before stated, in connexion with another amendment to the bill providing for fortifications, which was also first moved by me in committee, to double the appropriation proposed by the other House for rebuilding Fort Delaware. The latter amendment was first taken up by the Senate in Committee of the Whole on the 24th of February, 1835, and debated until the day was nearly spent. No man raised his voice with mine for this except the chairman, to whom, for his assistance in the debate, I tender, not only for myself, but for the people whose interests I represent, my respectful thanks. After a protracted discussion we carried this amendment, and then the chairman made the motion for the large extra appropriation for defence which I had proposed. He waived the motion at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. WEBSTER,] on whose suggestion the Senate took up another amendment, appropriating an additional one hundred thousand dollars for arming the fortifications which had been moved by the Military Committee. This last amendment was adopted; and then the chairman of "the Military Affairs" [Mr. BENTON] renewed the motion for the half million appropriation. It had my vote, but it fell without a whisper from any man in its favor, except the chairman and myself; and I repeat my conviction, that it was lost in a thin Senate, at a late hour of the day, in consequence of another suggestion from the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that a similar proposition was pending before that committee, and would probably be substituted for it. Sir, I find, by examination of the minutes, that the Committee on Finance never did actually propose any substitute for it. But it is true that the Senate's committee of conference on the fortification bill, two-thirds of whose members were also members of the Committee on Finance, and having the same chairman, [Mr. WEBSTER,] reported a substitute for it in the extra eight hundred thousand dollars for defence, which was lost, as has been seen, by the neglect of the committee of the other House to report it, after it had been fully agreed upon in the conference. And now, sir, having been an eyewitness to all that occurred in this chamber in reference to these matters during the last session, permit me to bear my testimony to the strict fidelity, the untiring vigilance, and patriotic course, of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts who presided at that session over our Committee on Finance. There was not a man within these walls who was more devoted to the defence of his country, or whose efforts exceeded his, when they could be exerted in that cause consistently with his other constitutional obligations. I do not feel, however, that his conduct needs vindication from me or any other; for, although the transient spirit of party may have sought to obscure his exalted character in the eyes of those who are easily led by misrepresentation into error, honorable fame has already encircled his temples with a wreath of unfading verdure, and impartial history shall hereafter emphatically designate him, amidst all the compatriots of his day, as the able, the eloquent, the fearless champion and defender of his country's constitution.

Sir, I have done. Permit me only to make the motion which I have advocated, to strike the word "surplus" out of the resolution, so as to pledge the whole revenue of the country for its defence, if rendered necessary by any exigency; and to express the earnest hope that the resolution, when thus amended, may receive the unanimous vote of the Senate.

When Mr. CLAYTON had concluded,

Mr. WHITE rose and referred to the precedents cited by two of the gentlemen who had preceded him in the debate, and which he said had been erroneously relied on to support the three millions amendment of the last session. The circumstances under which these appropriations were made had not, in his opinion, received that attention necessary to enable them to form a correct opinion of the motives influencing the votes then given. In order to show to the Senate what little reliance could be placed on these appropriations as precedents for the attempted appropriation of three millions, and what little similarity there was in the cases, he would briefly refer to them, as well as to the journals of Congress of the period, explaining the circumstances under which they were made.

The first precedent relied on was found in the administration of President Washington. It was an act passed in 1794, providing "that a sum of one million dollars, in addition to the provision heretofore made, be appropriated to defray any expenses which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, to be paid out of any moneys which may be in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to borrow the whole or any part of said sum of one million of dollars; an account of expenditures whereof, as soon as may be, shall be laid before Congress."

Now, he apprehended, if there was nothing more than what appeared from this law, it would not warrant the inferences that had been drawn from it; for the appropriation was for but one object, (foreign intercourse,) which must necessarily have been left to the discretion of the Executive, and an account for every dollar expended was to be rendered to Congress. The money was to be applied to foreign intercourse, and to no other purpose; and when they came to settle the accounts of expenditures under this appropriation, they were not obliged to look under a great many different heads of expenditures, to find all the items. They had to look only at foreign intercourse to see if the money was applied to foreign intercourse, and to no other purpose. But how was it with regard to this three million appropriation? To ascertain how this money was expended, they would have had to look under a great many different heads of expenditure in order to see what had been expended for this fortification and for that; how much for arms, how much for munitions for war, &c.; and the same examination must be made for expenditures for the navy. It was obvious that Mr. Jefferson had it in view to avoid difficulties such as these when he recommended specific appropriations. This three million appropriation was brought forward under circumstances wholly dissimilar to those in which the one million appropriation was made under General Washington's administration. Was it recommended by any committee of Congress, after having passed through an examination by it? Had it been called for by any communication from the President, or had any estimates been made by any department of the Government on which it was based? No. It was applied for simply as an amendment to an amendment of the Senate, on the mere motion of a member of the House of Representatives, without any recommendation whatever, at his own will and pleasure, and on his own responsibility. But was it possible that Congress did not know what was to be done with this one million of dollars appropriated in General Washington's time? The journals of Congress of the period would show the purpose for which it was to be applied, and were so full and so plain as to leave no doubt on the subject. General Washington applied for this money, and told Congress what he wanted to do with it. He made a confidential communication to Congress in secret session, although it was to become the subject of legislative action. The object was to redeem from captivity American citizens who were prisoners in Algiers; and the law making the appropriation for it was not more specific, because it was deemed necessary to keep that object secret, not from the American people, but to prevent foreigners from speculating on us, and perhaps defeating it altogether. The reason why this appropriation was not more specific was not for the purpose of giving a broader discretion to the Executive, but for the purpose of concealing the object from foreign nations. There would be no difficulty in finding out what this appropriation was wanted for, if gentlemen would only take the trouble to look over the journals of Congress of the period.

[Here Mr. WURR read from the journal of Congress of 1794, page 96, the passages referred to by him.]

By tracing the journals, it would be found that this matter went through all the stages of the most formal legislation, before the bill finally passed into a law. In addition to this, the President made another communication to Congress in confidence, and on March 3, of the same year, an act was passed authorizing a loan of one million of dollars to raise the money before appropriated. Now, he would ask, what similarity there was in this case and the three million appropriation of the last year? In the one case there was a communication from the President, saying that, in his opinion, the appropriation was necessary, and defining the object for which it was to be applied. Then the appropriation went through all the forms of legislation before it became a law. But this three million appropriation was introduced on a mere motion of a single member of the House, as an amendment to an amendment, without any executive recommendation, or any estimate from any department of the Government. And yet the first was relied on as a precedent to sanction the latter. Now, if they were to be governed by precedents, instead of the constitution, as some gentlemen argued, and precedents were to be stretched some ten years hence as much as they had been in this instance, they would find the President nothing to do but to spend the money they appropriated, at his own discretion, and at his own will and pleasure.

How was it as to the other precedent that had been relied on, made in the time of Mr. Jefferson, the great apostle of liberty, and head of the republican party? In the 4th volume of the laws of the United States, page 3, would be found an act as follows: "that the sum of two millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards defraying any extraordinary expenses which may be incurred in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who shall cause an account to be laid before Congress as soon as may be." The next act was found at page 41, authorizing the raising of 100,000 militia or volunteers, at the discretion of the President, who was to call such a portion of them into actual service as he might deem necessary; and the sixth section of the act provided an appropriation for the pay and subsistence of these men. Now, the gentleman thought that they had another precedent in this act for the three million appropriation. But what were the circumstances under which it was passed? The act grew out of a communication made by Mr. Jefferson to Congress, which was of such a delicate nature that he did not choose to make it public, and therefore sent it to Congress in secret session. This was in 1805. In 1802, as it was well known, we made a treaty with Spain, who, so far from carrying it into effect, was suspected of exciting the savages on our frontiers to acts of aggression on our border inhabitants. In this state of things, President Jefferson came forward and disclosed to Congress the whole state of our relations with Spain, and recommended the raising this force of 100,000 men, and the appropriation of this two millions for their support. The object was to defend the frontiers from the attacks of savages, whether instigated by Spain or any other nation. Congress examined all the matters connected with this executive communication rigidly, and after the act had passed through all the forms of legislation in the House of Representatives, with a perfect understanding of what the appropriation was wanted for, it passed that body, who sent it by a committee of their own to the Senate for concurrence. Whoever would take the trouble of looking into the journals of Congress would find that he was correct in every thing he had stated. The first two millions of dollars was to be applied by the President for the purchase of that very country (Florida) we always desired to purchase, and which we could never purchase until the administration of Mr. Monroe. They passed an act to raise a hundred thousand men, and then appropriated funds to support them; and they appropriated money, to be at the disposal of the President, for foreign intercourse, which they supposed would induce Spain to enter into the contract for the sale of Florida. The bill went through all the necessary forms of legislation; and so important was it considered that its object should be kept secret, that it was not sent to the Senate for concurrence in the ordinary manner, but was sent by a committee of three members of the House. What was the reason for making the objects of this appropriation secret? If the object of the appropriation had been expressed in the law itself, it would have been telling Spain that we suspected her of exciting the Indians on our borders to acts of hostility against us, and she would also have obtained information enabling her to take undue advantage of our desire to purchase Florida. Take the journals, (said Mr. W.,) read every thing throughout in regard to this appropriation in Mr. Jefferson's time, and so far from its being found to be a precedent sanctioning this three million appropriation, it will be considered one of the strongest precedents for those who voted on the other side of the question. This three million appropriation was not founded upon any executive recommendation or estimate whatever, but was introduced on the mere guess and conjecture of an honorable member of the House. Sir, (said Mr. W.,) it was an entire departure from all precedents. If this was a proper mode of disposing of the public money, he must confess he had been taught in a school where the principles of our Government were not rightly understood. He had been taught to believe that the President should, from time to time, give information to Congress of the state of the country; to give them not only facts, but to recommend measures for them to adopt. This done, he had performed his duty; and it was for Congress then, on its responsibility, to mould into shape and fashion the measures he recommended. He confessed he should justly be deemed the tool of the administration, if he voted to give money to the Executive, to be expended at his will and discretion, without defining the object for which it was appropriated. The principle for which I go (said Mr. W.) is to give money for specific objects, and to say it shall be applied to them and to no other. When he voted against this appropriation at the last session, he had no doubts, as he had none now, that the President would apply the money faithfully, according to the best of his judgment; but if he had said this much of those subordinate to him, through whose hands the money must have gone, he would have told a great untruth. If we set precedents, (said Mr. W.,) what is to become of us when we have a President in whom we have no confidence? Had they passed this three million appropriation, it would be cited, perhaps, as a precedent some fifty years hence, when it shall be attempted to raise money to be expended at the executive discretion: and then they will be able to say that they had precedents set by General Washington; by the great apostle of liberty, Mr. Jefferson; and, lastly, by the republican administration of General Jackson. The greatest danger was in setting precedents during a popular administration. It was too easy a matter in such a case to set them; while, on the other hand, under an unpopular administration, it would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to induce Congress to grant any improper discretionary powers. There is (said Mr. W.) but one plain course for us to pursue. Let us (said he) take the constitution for our guide; and let us establish no precedents which, in time to come, may be used to our danger. I will vote against such (said he) so long as I can have the power to say no. And although the President now said that this three million appropriation was in accordance with his views, yet, as he did not say so at the time it was before Congress, he thought it was his duty to vote as he then did. He had merely risen to set gentlemen right with regard to the precedents they had cited with so much confidence, and he would therefore no longer take up the time of the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY remarked that he had but a very few words to say, for he did not intend again to go into a discussion of the questions involved in the debate. As he had, however, introduced the precedents in the times of Washington and Jefferson, which had been commented upon by his colleague this morning, it was proper that he should say something in reply. In the early part of the debate, and before he (Mr. G.) had addressed the Senate, it had been urged by several Senators who had voted against the three million appropriation at the last session, that it would have been a violation of the constitution. He (Mr. G.) had introduced the precedents referred to, for the purpose of showing that appropriations conferring more ample discretionary powers on the Chief Magistrate had been made while they (General Washington and Mr. Jefferson) filled the chief executive office, than was proposed by the three million appropriation; and Mr. G. said he had argued that, unless the acts passed in 1794 and 1806 were unconstitutional, neither was the appropriation proposed at the last session any violation of that instrument. The force of this argument is now met, by showing that each of the acts referred to were passed in pursuance of executive recommendations. This is, in my humble opinion, no sufficient answer to the precedents cited, or the argument founded upon them. An executive recommendation cannot change the constitution, or make that measure or act constitutional which, without it, would be unconstitutional. An exposition or argument contained in a President's message may show the policy or expediency of a measure, but it never can render that constitutional which, without it, would be unconstitutional. Mr. G. therefore insisted that the argument he had used had not been weakened by any thing that had been said in reference to the acts he had cited having been founded on executive recommendations. Mr. G. said he wished to say one word to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] before he resumed his seat. That Senator had been pleased to say that there have been two occasions since his (Mr. C's) appearance in the Senate, in which it was thought by some that he (Mr. G.) had flinched or flashed. The first was a speech made by Mr. G., which partook too much of nullification. Upon this point he would only remark that, upon a former occasion, he had given in his experience to the Senate, and his conduct met with no censure; and, what was of more importance, he had been tried before his constituents, and persecuted with great zeal, and they had pronounced that he stood justified, or at least excused. The second instance named by the gentleman from Delaware was in relation to the Post Office Department. About five years since, the Senator from Delaware had made an assault upon that Department; it fell to the lot of the individual now addressing the Senate to defend that Department; that defence he (Mr. G.) made as well as he could, in all cases where he considered it defensible.

The Senator from Delaware denounced it, and renewed his assaults from time to time; and he (Mr. G.) was always ready to give the Senator from Delaware, according to his (Mr. G's) feeble abilities, as sociable a reception as he could.

And how far the Senator from Delaware obtained a triumph, had as well be left to others to decide. Had the Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] boasted a little on this subject, instead of the Senator from Delaware, there might have been more appearance in his favor. He, the Senator from Ohio, had commenced the war upon the Post Office Department at the same time with the Senator from Delaware; and he had continued in the service down to the present day. And still Mr. G. could not see that achievements worth boasting of had been performed by any one. As to the Senator from Delaware, after he had commenced the war upon that Department, and had prosecuted it for three years, he became tired, threw up his commission, and retired from the service. Mr. G. admitted that, to him, the contest was very severe and unequal; that, with the assistance alone of his able and efficient friend from Illinois, [Mr. ROBINSON,] he had contended against the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON,] Mr. EWING, of Ohio, and Mr. KNIGHT, of Rhode Island; that, after the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] had quit the service, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] was put in his place; and he, although not in the habit of yielding to the pressure of circumstances, had his place now supplied by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS.] Now, he (Mr. G.) would say that, although he was willing to admit the great superiority of those with whom he had contended for the last five years, yet he could not see nor feel that they had much to boast of in this long and protracted controversy in relation to the Post Office Department.

Mr. BENTON, after some conciliatory remarks on Mr. CLAYTON's proposed amendment, said that a good consequence had resulted from an unpleasant debate. All parties had disclaimed the merit of sinking the fortification bill of the last session, and a majority had evinced a determination to repair the evil by voting adequate appropriations now. This was good. It bespoke better results in time to come, and would dispel that illusion of divided counsels on which the French Government had so largely calculated. The rejection of the three millions, and the loss of the fortification bill, had deceived France; it had led her into the mistake of supposing that we viewed every question in a mercantile point of view; that the question of profit and loss was the only rule we had to go by; that national honor was no object; and that, to obtain these miserable twenty-five millions of francs, we should be ready to submit to any quantity of indignity, and to wade through any depth of national humiliation. The debate which has taken place will dispel that illusion; and the first despatch which the young Admiral Mackau will have to send to his Government will be to inform them that there has been a mistake in this business—that these Americans wrangle among themselves, but unite against foreigners, and that many opposition Senators are ready to vote double the amount of the twenty-five millions to put the country in a condition to sustain that noble sentiment of President Jackson, that the honor of his country shall never be stained by his making an apology for speaking truth in the performance of duty.

It was in March last that the three millions and the fortification bill were lost; since then the whole aspect of the French question is changed. The money is withheld, an explanation is demanded, an apology is prescribed, and a French fleet approaches. Our Government, charged with insulting France, when no insult was intended by us, and none can be detected in our words by her, is itself openly and vehemently insulted. The apology is to degrade us; the fleet to intimidate us; and the two together constitute an insult of the gravest character. There is no parallel to it, except in the history of France herself; but not France of the 19th century, nor even of the 18th, but in the remote and ill-regulated times of the 17th century, and in the days of the proudest of the French Kings, and towards one of the smallest Italian republics. I allude, sir, to what happened between Louis XIV and the Doge of Genoa, and will read the account of it from the pen of Voltaire, in his Age of Louis XIV.

"The Genoese had built four galleys for the service of Spain; the King (of France) forbade them, by his envoy, St. Olon, one of his gentlemen in ordinary, to launch those galleys. The Genoese, incensed at this violation of their liberties, and depending too much on the support of Spain, refused to obey the order. Immediately fourteen men of war, twenty galleys, ten bomb-ketches, with several frigates, set sail from the port of Toulon. They arrived before Genoa, and the ten bomb-ketches discharged 14,000 shells into the town, which reduced to ashes a principal part of those marble edifices which had entitled this city to the name of Genoa the Proud. Four thousand men were then landed, who marched up to the gates, and burnt the suburb of St. Peter, of Arena. It was now thought prudent to submit, in order to prevent the total destruction of the city.

"The King exacted that the Doge of Genoa, with four of the principal Senators, should come and implore his clemency in the palace of Versailles; and, lest the Genoese should elude the making this satisfaction, and lessen in any manner the pomp of it, he insisted further that the Doge, who was to perform this embassy, should be continued in his magistracy, notwithstanding the perpetual law of Genoa, which deprives the Doge of his dignity who is absent but a moment from the city.

"Imperiale Lercaro, Doge of Genoa, attended by the Senators Lomellino, Garibaldi, Durazzo, and Salvago, repaired to Versailles, to submit to what was required of him. The Doge appeared in his robes of state, his head covered with a bonnet of red velvet, which he often took off during his speech; made his apology, the very words and demeanor of which were dictated and prescribed to him by Seignelai," (the French Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.*)"

Thus, said Mr. B., was the city of Genoa, and its Doge, treated by Louis XIV. But it was not the Doge who was degraded by this indignity, but the republic of which he was Chief Magistrate, and all the republics of Italy besides, which felt themselves all humbled by the outrage which a King had inflicted upon one of their number. So of the apology demanded, and of the fleet sent upon us, and in presence of which President Jackson, according to the Constitutionnel, is to make his decision, and to remit it to the Tuilleries. It is not President Jackson that is outraged, but the republic of which he is President; and all existing republics, wheresoever situated. Our whole country is insulted, and that is the feeling of the whole country; and this feeling pours in upon us every day, in every manner in which public sentiment can be manifested, and especially in the noble resolves of the States whose Legislatures are in session, and who hasten to declare their adherence to the policy of the special message. True, President Jackson is not required to repair to the Tuilleries, with four of his most obnoxious Senators, and there recite, in person, to the King of the French, the apology which he had first rehearsed to the Duke de Broglie; true, the bomb-ketches of Admiral Mackau have not yet fired 14,000 shells on one of our cities; but the mere demand for an apology, the mere dictation of its terms, and the mere advance of a fleet, in the present state of the world, and in the difference of parties, is a greater outrage to us than the actual perpetration of the enormities were to the Genoese. This is not the 17th century. President Jackson is not the Doge of a trading city. We are not Italians, to be trampled upon by European Kings; but Americans, the descendants of that Anglo-Saxon race which, for a thousand years, has known how to command respect, and to preserve its place at the head of nations. We are young, but old enough to prove that the theory of the Frenchman, the Abbe Raynal, is as false in its application to the people of this hemisphere as it is to the other productions of nature; and that the belittling tendencies of the new world are no more exemplified in the human race than they are in the exhibition of her rivers and her mountains, and in the indigenous races of the mammoth and the mastodon. The Duke de Broglie has made a mistake, the less excusable, because he might find in his own country, and perhaps in his own family, examples of the extreme criticalness of attempting to overawe a community of freemen. There was a Marshal Broglio, who was Minister at War at the commencement of the French Revolution, and who advised the formation of a camp of 20,000 men to overawe Paris. The camp was formed. Paris revolted, captured the Bastille, marched to Versailles, stormed the Tuilleries, overthrew the monarchy, and established the Revolution. So much for attempting to intimidate a city. And yet here is a nation of freemen to be intimidated, a republic of fourteen millions of people, and descendants of that Anglo-Saxon race which, from the days of Agincourt and Cressy, of Blenheim and Ramillies, down to the days of Salamanca and Waterloo, have always known perfectly well how to deal with the impetuous and fiery courage of the French.

In the course of the remarks (continued Mr. B.) which I had the honor to submit when I first introduced my resolution, I took occasion to refer to what I thought was matter of history, namely, that the opposition of the Senate to the three million contingent appropriation had lost that appropriation, and, also, had lost the fortification annual appropriation bill to which it was attached; and that these two losses had left us defenceless, and, what was more serious, had left us with the appearance of not being willing to defend ourselves; and that this sad exhibition of divided counsels, and naked frontiers, had drawn upon us the impending visit of that imposing fleet which seems to be the only negotiator which French susceptibility now condescends to employ in the existing controversy with her ancient ally. I thought, Mr. President, that, in speaking of these things, I was doing nothing more nor less than making reference to historical facts; and had no expectation of exciting a feeling, or eliciting a warm remark, much less of provoking a discussion which has continued so many days, and enlisted so many orators. Many speakers have, indeed, taken the field against me, but with an effect the reverse of what usually results from numbers. The more the stronger, is the law of numbers; but the more the weaker has been the effect here. For every speaker has a different reason to account for the same thing; while truth, which is single, admits of but one reason; and thus each confutes the other. One gentleman lays the blame upon the House of Representatives; another absolves the House and censures the President; a third throws it upon the representative branch of the committee of conference; others, again, lavish the whole blame upon individuals of that committee; and, to complete the circle of inconsistent solutions, and to attack one that is never spared, there are others who charge it upon the presiding officer of this body—upon him who had no concern in the affair in any shape whatsoever. So many inconsistent answers are, each and every, a refutation of the other, and might absolve me from further trouble than to confront this series of contradictions, and to leave the whole to die of each other's condemnation; but I will not limit myself entirely to this brief task. I will expand a little; and touching, at a few points, this circle of inconsistencies, I will show what I first said to be strictly true, namely, that the Senate is the responsible party, first, for the loss of the three millions; secondly, for the loss of the fortification bill; and, thirdly, for the impending visit of the French fleet, and for the demand for explanation and apology.

In presenting the Senate as the responsible party for these losses, and their consequence, as I had the honor to do in my introductory remarks, gentlemen have assumed that I had indicted the Senate! and thereupon, incontinently, great indignation has been prepared and exploded. Certainly I never intended to indict the Senate for this matter, but simply to state an historical fact; but, since gentlemen will have me to prefer an indictment, there is something, at least, they must allow me: they must allow me an elementary conception of the constitutional mode of trying people in our country! For I have not proceeded ex parte; I have not indicted the Senate behind their backs, nor tried them when absent; nor condemned them unheard; nor denied them the privilege of self-defence; nor considered their defence as a breach of my privileges, or an insult to my dignity! All this they must allow me; and then there is something else which must be allowed me; and that is, that I have shown myself so far capable to conduct an indictment as not to be turned out of court for an error in the venue: for, as at common law, when a mortal wound is given in one country, and the wounded man dies in another, the slayer may be tried and hanged in either country; so, in this case, where the fortification bill received its death wound in this chamber, and died of that wound in the House of Representatives, the killers of the bill may lawfully be brought to justice here.

The question before the Senate has two branches, each very distinct from the other, and not to be confounded in debate, nor involved in one confused decision. The first branch of the question is as to the loss of the three million appropriation; the second branch of it refers to the loss of the bill to which it was attached. It is my purpose to treat these branches separately, and to show that the three million appropriation was the main loss, and the bill the subordinate and incidental loss; and that the Senate was the cause of both losses, avowedly in the principal case, and proveably in the incidental one.

I say the three millions was the main loss, and establish that assertion, first, from its amount, for it was three times the amount of the other; and, next, from its character, for it was an avowed preparation against contingent danger. It was in these words, "The sum of three millions of dollars, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy; provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress." These were the words. The Senate rejected the appropriation so worded; and the rejection stood in France as the solemn declaration of the Senate that they would not provide for the defence of the country, although necessary, before they met again. It is in vain that Senators search their own bosoms and find reasons for their vote of rejection; the record bears the fact as I have stated it—as a contingent appropriation for the necessary defence of the country, and its rejection! and to the French it could appear as nothing more nor less than as a refusal to sustain the policy of the President, and as the final act which put the seal upon all those speeches which had justified France, and condemned the chief of our own Government.

In this light it appeared to the French, and the effect was instantaneous and decisive with them. It induced them to change their tone, and emboldened them to take higher ground. And the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] has well shown, by a clear narration of facts, and by a close collation of circumstances, that to this most lamentable vote of the Senate we are indebted for all the French measures so offensive to our feelings the legislative demand for explanations—the dictated apology—and the fleet that is sent to observe us. Thus, the loss of the three millions was the main loss, both for its amount and its character, and for the moral effect which a refusal to vote money for the defence of the country, even though necessary for that defence before Congress met again! and for this loss the Senate is incontestably and avowedly responsible. There is no dispute on this point. The House of Representatives passed it; the Senate rejected it; and there was an end of it.

Whatever room there may be for contesting the responsibility of losing the fortification bill, there is none for contesting the loss of the three millions, which has done all the mischief. Conscious of this, the gentlemen of the opposition lay out all their strength in laborious arguments, and minute details, in vindicating themselves from the loss of the fortification bill, while the infinitely more important loss of the three millions is slightly run over with an admission and a justification. The Senate admits it made that loss, and justifies it; but what a justification! First, because it was not recommended by the President; next, because it was not specific, and was, therefore, unconstitutional; and, thirdly, because it put dangerous power in the hands of the President. These are the three points of defence, and let us briefly examine them.

1. As to the want of the President's recommendation. That is true in fact, but futile in import. The President did not recommend the three millions to the Senate, but the House of Representatives did; and it was a case in which their recommendation should be more potential than his. It was a money bill, and the House of Representatives, as the immediate representatives of the people, are the especial guardians of the purse. All tax bills must originate there; and, by consequence, all large appropriations, the expenditure of revenue being so nearly akin to the imposition of a tax, and often involving it, come with peculiar propriety from that branch of Congress. It is in vain to say that this appropriation was suddenly adopted in the House of Representatives upon the motion of a member. Granted. But when it was adopted, it was no longer the proposition of the member, but the act of the House, and came to the Senate with all the claim to respectful consideration which is due to the act of the whole body. But it is supposed that the President gave private information of his wishes to some of his friends, and withheld it from others, and that the effect was to entrap the uninformed. He (Mr. B.) presumed that this was all a mistake. It was not in unison with the President's character, which was that of extreme frankness, and it was not consonant with the fact in his own case; for he had never heard a word of the President's wishes—he, who, as chairman of the Senate's Committee on Military Affairs, and as a friend to the administration, would have had a right to the very first information where there was a designed discrimination between friends, had never heard of the matter, one way or another. His first knowledge of the three millions was from the reading at the Secretary's table. He had never heard of the President's wishes, never heard of Mr. Cambreleng's notice in the House of Representatives, never heard of his motion, never seen the passage in the Globe, never heard that the three millions were coming until announced in the Senate; and if he had known of the President's wishes, he should not have communicated them to the Senate, it being unparliamentary and a breach of the privileges of the body, to do so. The President communicates to the Senate, responsibly, through a message, and not irresponsibly, through a member; and to report his opinion upon bills, to influence the action of the Congress, is irregular and unparliamentary, and a reprehensible breach of the privileges of the body; and such is the law of Parliament. He should suppose, then, that whatever might have happened in communicating his wishes to some, and not to others, was purely accidental. Certainly, if any one had a right to think himself slighted, he had; for, in his double character of chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and friend to the administration, he should have stood first on the Senatorial list for the insidious communication.

2. As to the unconstitutionality of the appropriation, because not specific, Mr. B. would not travel over ground which had been so well occupied and so fully explored by others. He would not repeat what had been so often and so well said, that the constitution had but two provisions on the subject of appropriations: first, that the money should be drawn from the treasury by law, and next that it should be accounted for. He would not repeat what had been already so fully established, that the doctrine of specific appropriations, so desirable in itself, is matter of practice only, a reform of Jefferson's time, slowly introduced, often departed from, and in some branches of the expenditure only established within a few years past. He would leave all this where his political friends had placed it, and take up the question in another way, in a more practical point of view, like a plain man engaged in an affair of business, and would demand how it happened, if want of specification was the real objection, how it happened that no attempt was made to cure so slight a defect by the natural and easy process of amendment? Why did not some one move to amend by dividing the gross sum into parcels, and assigning so much to each object? This is no figure of speech, no rhetorical interrogation to enforce an argument, but a real question, which he should be glad to hear some gentleman answer, and for which purpose he would cheerfully give the floor.

[Here Mr. WEBSTER rose, and stated, that by the rules of the House no motion could be made to amend the amendment, under the circumstances of the case; and Mr. LEIGH also arose and said that it was his opinion at the time that no motion to amend the amendment could be made.]

Mr. B. resumed, and was free to admit that there was a difficulty in the rule; that a direct motion to amend might have been unsustainable, and therefore excusably omitted. But he returned to his question, and changed its form, from direct to indirect amendment, from a motion to amend on the floor to a motion to disagree, to confer, and to make the amendment in conference, and bring it back to the Senate, all of which might have been done in a few minutes, and was actually done at last, but too late to save the bill! Upon this point, (said Mr. B.) I take a position. I stand upon it. I intrench myself behind it. I ask again, again, and again, if want of specification was the real objection, why not obviate that objection by the easy, natural, and parliamentary mode of disagreeing, conferring, and amending? This is a plain and direct inquiry to develop facts and to elucidate truth. We all know how the three million appropriation was received in this chamber; it was received in one burst of indignation—in one tempest of wrath—in one cataract of denunciation. The whole opposition rose up, one after the other, to declaim against it, to reject it, and to adhere to the rejection, which, on the part of the Senate, was an end of the whole question. Instead of all this, if want of specification was the real objection, why did not some one of the majority, like a man friendly to the object, but dissatisfied with the form, get up like a man of business, in a quiet and placid state of mind, and move to disagree, to ask a conference, and to settle the form of the appropriation by conferees? All this could have been done in a moiety of the time in which any one of those ten or a dozen violent speeches were made against it. This was the real question for gentlemen to answer, and, until they answered it, all other answers and excuses for the loss of this essential and important appropriation must stand for nothing.

3. The danger of such a large and indefinite appropriation. This head (Mr. B. said) was much dwelt upon. It was said the President might lay out the whole three millions in ships alone, or the whole in raising troops, and what kind of troops he pleased. This is all fanciful and far-fetched. It is imagination, and not argument. Five objects of appropriation were specifically named, to wit: 1, the military service; 2, the naval service; 3, fortifications; 4, ordnance; 5, increase of the navy; with a proviso that it was not to be expended unless necessary for the defence of the country before the next meeting of Congress. Here the objects of expenditure are specified, and nothing was wanting to come up to the most rigorous definition of a perfect specification but a division of the money, and setting apart so much to one object, and so much to another. And where is the danger in the omission of that apportionment? None! Even if the whole had been expended on the army, or the whole upon the navy, or the whole on fortifications, still there was no danger in it to the country. It might have been unwise and improvident, but not dangerous; and here he would conclude this head with insisting that the reasons assigned are not sufficient. The appropriation was not unconstitutional; it was not unprecedented; it was not dangerous. On the contrary, it was clearly sanctioned by the constitution, more than justified by numerous precedents, called for by the exigency of our affairs, and came to the Senate with the highest possible recommendation, that of the vote of the House of Representatives, the exclusive organ of the people in the imposition of taxes, and therefore the appropriate organ to originate the heavy expenditures which are so nearly akin to the imposition of taxes. The Senate rejected, violently and contumeliously rejected, the appropriation, under these circumstances, and, in doing so, they put the seal of confirmation upon all the speeches they had made against the President, and in favor of the French, and announced to the world, by a solemn vote, that they would not appropriate money to defend the country, even if necessary before the next meeting of Congress!

The second branch of this inquiry (Mr. B. said) related to the loss of the fortification bill. It was the inferior branch of the inquiry, both because the amount contained in it was comparatively small, something less than one million of dollars, and because it was a general appropriation for permanent objects, and had no view to particular defence against France. The opposition Senators had laid out all their strength in defending themselves on this incidental, subordinate, and inferior point, the loss of which, occurring as it did in the shades of a midnight session, afforded room for contrariety of statement; while the main loss, which was avowedly the work of the Senate, and the moral effect of which, on the minds of the French, was so electric, was skipped over with rhetorical flourishes upon the constitution, dictators, despotism, and the dangers of blind confidence in popular chiefs. The main loss being given up as the act of the Senate, the subordinate one was scarcely worth the trouble of investigation; but he would show that that loss also was the work of the Senate.

The bill died under lapse of time. It died because not acted upon before midnight of the last day of the session. Right or wrong, the session was over before the report of the conferees could be acted on. The House of Representatives was without a quorum, and the Senate was about in the same condition. Two attempts in the Senate to get a vote on some printing moved by his colleague, [Mr. LINN,] were both lost for want of a quorum. The session then was at an end, for want of quorums, whether the legal right to sit had ceased or not. The bill was not rejected either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate, but it died for want of action upon it, and that action was prevented by want of time. Now, whose fault was it that there was no time left for acting on the report of the conferees? That was the true question, and the answer to it would show where the fault lay. This answer is as clear as midday, though the transaction took place in the darkness of midnight. It was the Senate! The bill came to the Senate in full time to have been acted upon, if it had been treated as all bills must be treated that are intended to be passed in the last hours of the session. It is no time for speaking. All speaking is then fatal to bills, and equally fatal, whether for or against them. Yet, what was the conduct of the Senate with respect to this bill? Members commenced speaking upon it with vehemence and perseverance, and continued at it, one after another. These speeches were fatal to the bill. They were numerous, and consumed much time to deliver them. They were criminative, and provoked replies. They denounced the President without measure, and, by implication, the House of Representatives, which sustained him. They were intemperate, and destroyed the temper of others. In this way the precious time was consumed in which the bill might have been acted upon; and, for want of which time, it is lost. Every one that made a speech helped to destroy it, and nearly the whole body of the opposition spoke, and most of them at much length, and with unusual warmth and animation. So certain was he of the ruinous effect of this speaking, that he himself never opened his mouth nor uttered one word upon it. Then came the fatal motion to adhere, the effect of which was to make bad worse, and to destroy the last chance, unless the House of Representatives had humbled itself to ask a conference from the Senate. The fatal effect of this motion to adhere, Mr. B. would show from Jefferson's Manual; and read as follows: "The regular progression in this case is, that the Commons disagree to the amendment; the Lords insist on it; the Commons insist on their disagreement; the Lords adhere to their amendment; the Commons adhere to their disagreement; the term of insisting may be repeated as often as they choose to keep the question open; but the first adherence by either renders it necessary for the other to recede or to adhere also; when the matter is usually suffered to fall. (10 Grey, 148.) Latterly, however, there are instances of their having gone to a second adherence. There must be an absolute conclusion of the subject somewhere, or otherwise transactions between the Houses would become endless. (3 Hatsell, 268, 270.) The term of insisting, we are told by Sir John Trevor, was then (1678) newly introduced into parliamentary usage by the Lords. (7 Grey, 94.) It was certainly a happy innovation, as it multiplies the opportunities of trying modifications, which may bring the Houses to a concurrence. Either House, however, is free to pass over the term of insisting, and to adhere in the first instance. (10 Grey, 146.) But it is not respectful [to the other. In the ordinary parliamentary course, there are two free conferences at least before an adherence. (10 Grey, 147.)"]

This is the regular progression in the case of amendments, and there are five steps in it. 1. To agree. 2. To disagree. 3. To recede. 4. To insist. 5. To adhere. Of these five steps adherence is the last, and yet it was the first adopted by the Senate. The effect of its adoption was, in parliamentary usage, to put an end to the matter. It was, by the law of Parliament, a disrespect to the House. No conference was even asked by the Senate after the adherence, although, by the parliamentary law, there ought to have been two free conferences at least before the adherence was voted. All this was fully stated to the Senate that night, and before the question to adhere was put. It was fully stated by you, sir, (said Mr. B., addressing himself to Mr. KING, of Alabama, who was then in the Vice President's chair.) This vote to adhere, coupled with the violent speeches, denouncing the President, and, by implication, censuring the House of Representatives, and coupled with the total omission of the Senate to ask for a conference, seemed to indicate a fatal purpose to destroy the bill; and lost it would have been upon the spot, if the House of Representatives, forgetting the disrespect with which it had been treated, and passing over the censure impliedly cast upon it, had not humbled itself to come and ask for a conference. The House humbled itself, but it was a patriotic and noble humiliation; it was to serve their country. The conference was granted, and an amendment was agreed upon by the conferees, by which the amount was reduced, and the sum divided, and $300,000 allowed to the military, and $500,000 to the naval service. This was done at last, and after all the irritating speeches and irritating conduct of the Senate; but the precious time was gone. The hour of midnight was not only come, but members were dispersed; quorums were unattainable; and the bill died for want of action. And now (said Mr. B.) I return to my question. I resume, and maintain my position upon it. I ask how it came to pass, if want of specification was really the objection—how it came to pass that the Senate did not do at first what it did at last? Why did it not amend, by the easy, natural, obvious, and parliamentary process of disagreeing, insisting, and asking for a committee of conference?

Mr. B. would say but a word on the new calendar, which would make the day begin in the middle. It was sufficient to state such a conception to expose it to ridicule. A farmer would be sadly put out if his laborers should refuse to come until midday. The thing was rather too fanciful for grave deliberation. Suffice it to say there are no fractions of days in any calendar. There is no $3\frac{1}{4}$, $3\frac{1}{2}$, and $3\frac{3}{4}$ of March, or any other month. When one day ends, another begins, and midnight is the turning point both in law and in practice. All our laws of the last day are dated the 3d of March; and, in point of fact, Congress, for every beneficial purpose, is dissolved at midnight. Many members will not act, and go away; and such was the practice of the venerable Mr. Macon, of North Carolina, who always acted precisely as President Jackson did. He put on his hat and went away at midnight; he went away when his own watch told him it was midnight; after which he believed he had no authority to act as a legislator, nor the Senate to make him act as such. This was President Jackson's course. He stayed in the Capitol until a quarter after one, to sign all the bills which Congress should pass before midnight. He stayed until a majority of Congress was gone, and quorums unattainable. He stayed in the Capitol, in a room convenient to the Senate, to act upon every thing that was sent to him, and did not have to be waked up, as Washington was, to sign after midnight; a most unfortunate reference to Washington, who, by going to bed at midnight, showed that he considered the business of the day ended; and by getting up and putting on his night gown, and signing a bill at two o'clock in the morning of the 4th, showed that he would sign at that hour what had passed before midnight; and does not that act bear date the 3d of March?

Mr. B. said that, when he first spoke on this subject, he had adverted to some collateral proceedings of the Senate, as subsidiary arguments in favor of his main proposition. He had shown other proceedings adverse to the defence of the country, and hence drew an inference in support of his proposition, that the Senate was the responsible party for the loss of the three millions, and of the fortification bill. These collateral proceedings were: 1. The rejection of the $500,000 recommended by the Military Committee. 2. The refusal to adopt the motion which he had made for information on the subject of national defence. 3. The impending motions to divide the surplus revenues among the States. He would briefly touch these points again, which seemed to have been misunderstood by some gentlemen, and show that they were entitled to the deepest attention, as showing the indisposition of the Senate to take measures for the defence of the country.

1. The $500,000. This had been agreed upon in the Military Committee of the Senate, with three other items, and direction given to him, as chairman of the committee, to move them as amendments to the fortification bill, then in the hands of the Finance Committee. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] had moved the item of half a million, and the committee was unanimous in it. It was on the 23d of February that he (Mr. B.) moved these items in the Senate. The minutes of the Senate show the proceedings more fully than the journal, and from these minutes the proceedings are shown to be these: First, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who had the custody of the bill under a reference to his committee, moved three additional appropriations, which were adopted by the Senate. These amendments were made in quasi Committee of the Whole. Mr. B. rose to offer his amendments, but it was suggested that he should wait until the amendments made in quasi Committee of the Whole should be reported to the Senate and concurred in. He (Mr. B.) then withdrew all his amendments for that purpose, and the instant the amendments of the Finance Committee were concurred in, he offered, seriatim, the four amendments reported from the Military Committee. Upon these amendments the minutes show the following proceedings:

"Mr. BENTON: for Fort Mifflin, $75,000; agreed.

"Increase Pea Patch fortification, $150,000; agreed.

"For armament of fortifications, additional, $100,000; agreed.

"For $500,000; rejected."

Thus the motion for the $500,000, for the increase and armament of fortifications, was made and rejected. It was not withdrawn, but rejected; and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] had correctly stated the circumstances of the rejection. It was not pressed upon the Senate; and why not pressed? For the two precise reasons mentioned by that gentleman. Because the debate on the $150,000 appropriation for the Pea Patch, (Fort Delaware,) which was carried with difficulty, and, after protracted discussion, brought out the sense of the Senate against the $500,000 item, which it was then seen would stand no chance at all. Secondly, because the chairman of the Committee on Finance informed the Senate that the Finance Committee would produce a substitute for it, which substitute never came, unless, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] suggests, the amendment from the conference committee, on the last night of the session, could be considered as that substitute. The Senator does not intimate that it can be so considered; and certainly nobody can so consider it. The $500,000 was then rejected by the Senate; and this rejection is a pregnant illustration of the conduct of the Senate in the proceedings on the three millions and the fortification bill; for here is a rejection of a sum, on the 23d of February, which was moderate in amount, specific in its application, reported by the Senate's own committee, and expressly sanctioned by the Secretary of War—an appropriation free from every objection taken to the three millions, and yet rejected the very week before the three millions.

Mr. B.'s second collateral argument was the refusal of the Senate to adopt his resolution for information preparatory to the defence of the country, and which was laid upon the table, on the motion of an opposition Senator. A Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] seems to be at a loss to find and to understand this proceeding; but it is easily found. The resolution will be found at pages 167 and 168 of the Senate Journal of the last session, and under the proceedings of February 16th, and with this history of its fate: "On motion of Mr. Poindexter ordered, that it be laid on the table." So that the Senate, fifteen days before the rejection of the three millions contingent appropriation for the defence of the country, refused to adopt a resolution, calling upon the President to cause information relative to the defence to be laid before the Senate.

National Defence.

[SENATE.]

The third collateral argument on which Mr. B. relied, to show the indisposition of the Senate to vote money for the national defence, was the existence of the propositions to take the public money for distribution among the States. This was matter of history, he said; and he would not further remark upon it, than to remind the Senate that so strong has become this disposition to hoard money for distribution, that not only the defence of the country, but the adequate prosecution even of the oldest and most meritorious work of internal improvement, the accelerated continuation of the Cumberland road itself, is likely to be endangered by it. The bill for continuing the road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was actually arrested on its passage through the Senate last Friday, and now hangs suspended, on an objection to the amounts to be expended, and because these amounts will diminish the fund for distribution.

Having disposed of these points, and shown the Senate, as Mr. B. believed, to be the responsible party for the loss of three millions and of the fortification bill, he would proceed to notice some matters which had grown up in the course of the debate, and which went to charge the administration, and its friends in Congress, with gross neglect, and great dereliction of duty, in asking for appropriations for the defence of the country, or applying them beneficially after they were granted. The stress of the charge was, that the President, occupied with pursuing the Bank of the United States, had neglected the country; that every appropriation asked for by the administration for the national defence had been granted; that there was little to show for the appropriations actually made; and that the opponents of the administration were the true originators of the defensive measures adopted. Mr. B. believed that four Senators, at least, had made these charges: one from Ohio, [Mr. EWING:] one from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD:] another from Kentucky, [Mr. CHITTENDEN:] and the fourth from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON:] Not content with making these charges, the Senators had exulted in their truth; had proclaimed them unanswerable; and had called for answers with a confidence and pertinacity which seemed to announce the perfect reliance of absolute knowledge, but which he would show to be the blind reliance of absolute ignorance. He would take up the charges in their order, one after the other, and despatch each in its turn with that logic of facts which economizes phrases and dispenses with declamation. The first fact that he would have recourse to would be the first report of the first Secretary of War, at the first session of the first Congress that sat in the first year of President Jackson's administration. It was from Mr. Eaton, and would be found in the extract which he should read, viz:

"A reference to the report of the chief of the ordnance will show the particular details of operation in that branch of the service; it merits attention. It has been frequently observed that the best way to avoid war is to be prepared for it. In this point of view it is desirable that the appropriations to be made for clothing our fortifications should correspond with the probable periods of their completion. It would indeed be a mortifying result if, after the labor and cost which has been encountered for their completion, it should rest in the power of an enemy, at the onset of war, to seize or destroy them because the means had not been placed in readiness for their defence. From the report it will be seen that, at the present annual rate of appropriation, to wit, $100,000, sixteen or twenty years will have passed before a proper supply of arms for those fortifications now in progress can be obtained for their defence. If, in the slow and gradual preparation for a necessary and adequate armament, at present pursued, sixteen or twenty years should be found requisite, and war within that period took place, a consequence would be that some of our forts, built up at great expense, would be destroyed, because incapable of self-defence, or be retained and armed by the enemy, and used against ourselves." (November, 1829.)

The second fact that I shall show will be a memorandum, in answer to a note of my own, from the colonel of ordnance, Colonel Bomford, stating that the additional sum of $150,000 was asked for the armament of fortifications for the year 1830, which, added to the standing appropriation of $100,000, would have made $250,000 for that year, and which was not granted by Congress.

The third fact which he would show was a memorandum from the same officer, made at his (Mr. B.'s) request, and headed, "Memorandum of items of the estimates of the Secretary of War, which were rejected from the bills of appropriation from 1829 to 1835, inclusive," which showed a list of twelve items, one of them an additional appropriation of $100,000 for arming forts, and which would have been asked for annually if granted—the twelve items amounting to $902,000.

The fourth fact that he would show would be a memorandum from the Engineer department, showing that, from the year 1830 to 1835, inclusively, the sum of $4,911,479 94 had been asked for fortifications, six of them new ones, and that the sum of $3,957,515 94 only had been granted by Congress, making a deficiency of $943,964 on that head.

The fifth fact that he should offer was a memorandum from the Navy Department, headed "A statement of estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Navy, from the commencement of the present administration to the close of the last session of Congress, which have not been acted on, or for which no appropriations have been made," and which contains four items, one of them for deepening the bar at Pensacola harbor, for $106,690, and contained in the Secretary of the Navy's report, (Mr. Woodbury,) in November, 1833, and another from the present Secretary, (Mr. Dickerson,) for $200,000, for steam batteries, to be expended during 1835; the whole near $500,000.

The sixth fact that Mr. B. would mention was, the bill of General Smith, of Maryland, for one million of dollars for arming fortifications, a quarter of a million annually, and which was indefinitely postponed by the Senate.

The seventh fact that he would mention was, that he himself (Mr. B.) had moved the resolution at the last session, under which the Senate's Committee on Military Affairs had inquired into the expediency of increasing the military defences. He made his motion to that effect on the 29th day of January, and the committee, upon communications with the Secretary of War, (Governor Cass,) reported near a million of dollars, to wit: $75,000 for Fort Mifflin; $150,000 for Fort Delaware, $100,000 additional for armament of fortifications, and $500,000 for repair, increase, and arming forts. It was under this very resolution, submitted by himself, under which the committee acted when they made these important recommendations, and the unfortunate fate of which is so well known to the Senate, the first three items having been lost in the fortification bill, after being agreed to by both Houses; the fourth large item being rejected by the Senate under the circumstances which have been so fully stated both by himself and by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON.]

Here Mr. B. would pause, and ask gentlemen if they were satisfied. So far from neglecting the defences of the country in persecuting that innocent bank, which, though cut down, has grown up like Jonah's gourd, in one night, far higher than ever it was before; instead of this neglect, four or five millions are counted up in a few minutes, of sums applied for by the administration or its friends, and not granted. The amounts would have been greater, if repeated refusals had not checked applications; but it is enough, as it is enough to vindicate the administration, enough to show gentlemen their profound error, and enough to show the truth of Mr. Eaton's remark in 1829, that, unless we accelerated the arming of forts, we might be building them to be blown up by the enemy, or to be occupied by them, and turned against ourselves.

But a specific demand is made upon the friends of the administration to tell why it was that no application for extraordinary appropriations were made for forts and armaments in 1835. To this demand, especially as far as relates to armaments, the following memorandum from the Ordnance department must be accepted as the answer: "They had been so often repeated without success, that it was thought useless to renew them."

Another attack upon the administration is upon the mismanagement or waste of the moneys voted for the public defence, and for which, it is said, no adequate returns are forthcoming. It is said that $40,000,000 have been voted since the last war, for the increase of the naval and coast defences; and it is triumphantly demanded, what is to be shown for all this money? I will answer, and tell what is to be shown for it. In the naval arm, there are twelve ships of the line, either built or building; there are ten frigates of the first class, either built or building; and there are twenty-one sloops and schooners, either built or building; then there are a number of old vessels repaired, with dock and navy yards constructed, ship timber prepared, and munitions collected. But only a few of these ships are ready for sea! Granted; and for what reason? Because the appropriations required to fit them out, and especially of the three millions of the last session, have been refused. Next, as to the coast defences. We have eighteen new forts built, many old ones repaired, and some munitions of war collected. But, gentlemen say, these forts are not defensible. They have no guns, no carriages, no shot, no shells. Granted again, not to the letter, but granted. And why are the forts not defensible? Because the recommendation of Mr. Secretary Eaton, in 1829, had not been followed; because the repeated applications for accelerated armaments had not been listened to; because the $500,000 asked for by the Military Committee had been rejected—the three millions lost—and the whole fortification bill lost, which contained items to the amount of eight or nine hundred thousand dollars. This is the reason why the ships and forts built or building are not ready for service.

Another attack upon the administration is as to the condition of the navy, its paucity, the small number of ships in commission, and their dispersed situation. This attack comes from the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] and certainly comes with authority from him. He has been six years Secretary of the Navy, and four years chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate, and certainly should know, better than any other member of the Senate, the actual condition of that arm of defence which he has had so long in his own care. If found to be in a very miserable condition, he will certainly come in for a share of that kind of merit which attaches to this condition. But it may be best for the French not to rely too implicitly upon the helpless, impotent, miserable picture which he has drawn. We have fifty ships of war, old and new, either built or building. Our naval arm is many times stronger than it was when it encountered the thousand ships of war of Great Britain, and augmented itself with captures from her noble flag. The Macedonian and Java are still in our hands to do service, if necessary, upon the French. More than that, we have French names upon our list, La Guerriere and La Cyane, which we took from those who took them from the French. It was a saying in England, that France builds ships for the British; that saying may be transplanted to our America, if war falls out between America and France. Those who can take the prize from the conqueror, with more ease could take it from the loser.

And now, after defending the administration from the attacks of the opposition, Mr. B. would be glad to know what they themselves have done for their country? What has the Senate done? It is very ready to arraign and condemn others, and surely can have no objection to a little arraignment itself. The opposition have the majority here, and all the committees strongly organized; some of them four to one in their favor, and could carry any measure for the public good which they pleased. Now, what has this majority done? What has it been about? Has it passed the appropriations for defence which have been asked by the Heads of Departments? The memorandums which I have read answer that question. Has it passed the sums recommended by its own Military Committee? The fate of the $500,000 answers that. Has it passed the sums which had passed the House of Representatives? The history of the three millions will reply to that. Has it originated anything itself? No. Then, what has the Senate done? The barren condition of the defences will answer that. What has it been about? What are the fruits of the four years' majority which the opposition have held here? The fruits are nothing; and the works, if I should give the answer which the whole country gives, would be comprised in four words: President-making, and President-unmaking! That, and that alone, has been the work of the opposition.

Mr. B. said he had followed the lead of a former chairman of the Naval Committee of the Senate, in attempting to establish the rank of admiral in the navy. He spoke of one of South Carolina's most distinguished sons—General Hayne; and he should be glad now to follow the lead of another naval chairman in the same attempt. The honors of the rank were due to the brave old officers who had carried our naval renown to the highest pitch of glory; it was an incentive to be placed before the eyes of the younger officers, to fire their emulation, and to reward their exploits.

The resolution which I have had the honor to submit (continued Mr. B.) proposes a very intelligible, and, I flatter myself, a patriotic object. It is antagonistical to all the plans presented here for the distribution of the surplus revenues. It is not altered, in my view of it, by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GUNDRY.] The qualification of the amount to be applied is a qualification in words, not in effect. It will take all the surplus to accomplish the object. Fortifications alone will require twenty-eight millions for construction, and two or three millions for armament. Gentlemen deceive themselves about this surplus. They all speak of thirty millions, when the amount reported by the Secretary of the Treasury is only ten millions and a half, and that before the Florida war and the New York fire. These two events will abstract some millions. The surplus will be barely sufficient for the necessary appropriations this year, and cannot be counted on for many years. We should not forget our own history. When Mr. Jefferson retired from office, he taxed the ingenuity of Congress to devise means of applying the surpluses; in a few years the treasury was empty. In 1816 the revenue was thirty-six millions, and the surplus eleven millions; in 1820 the navy appropriations had to be diminished one half, the army reduced from ten thousand to six thousand men, and retrenchments made at all points, to avoid borrowing money for current expenses. So of this surplus; it will go soon, and nobody can tell where. Let us fix it, then, while in our power. Let us consecrate it to a sacred object. Some gentlemen say they will lay taxes, if necessary, to defend the country; that, sir, is precisely what I wish to avoid. I wish to apply the surpluses in the treasury for that object, and to avoid the odious resort to taxes, which will not be necessary if we act right now. This is my object; and, by moving an express resolution here, it has been my intention to carry the question to the people, and let every citizen decide for himself, whether he will defend his country, or leave it at the mercy of the enemy. Whether we shall put it in a state of defence while we can, or defer it till we cannot? Whether we will use the money in hand, or divide that money, and then raise more by taxes to defend our coast? This is my object. Peace or war makes no difference with me. England, with an exalted magnanimity, worthy of the high place which she holds among the liberal Powers, has offered her mediation; President Jackson accepts it, and the prospect of peace brightens. But all that is nothing to delay our defences. If I held the bonds of fate for peace, I should still say, prepare for war.

Mr. LEIGH spoke to a question of order that had arisen in the discussion, in relation to the three million appropriation. The question occurred to him, that they (the Senate) could not make an amendment to the amendment of the House of Representatives. A gentleman had told him it could not be opened, and he understood at the time that it could not be done. But, on looking at the rules, he now found that he had entertained a wrong impression. He did not profess to be very intimately acquainted with the rules.

[Mr. KING, of Alabama, requested Mr. LEIGH to yield him the floor for a few moments; on his doing so, Mr. K. said he felt himself called on by the observations of the gentleman from Virginia to make a short explanation of the course pursued by him at the last session. When the fortification bill was returned to the Senate, with the amendment appropriating $3,000,000 for the defences of the country, he was not, as might be supposed from the gentleman's observations, occupying the chair. The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. TYLER] was then presiding as President pro tem. He (Mr. K.) was not in the chamber when the discussion commenced on the motion to disagree to the amendment. He took no part in that discussion; and not until the bill came back, the House insisting on its amendment, on a motion made to adhere, did he say one word on the subject; and then merely to warn the Senate against the consequences of adopting such a proceeding, as harsh, unusual, and well calculated to defeat the bill altogether. He gave no opinion as to the power of amendment; no such question was made. He would, however, frankly state, and this was his principal object in asking the floor, that had his opinion been asked, he should, without hesitation, have said that an amendment in that stage of the business could not be made. He had so stated to several of his friends at this session. He was now, however, convinced that he was in error, and that the amendment of the House could have been amended. Yet in fairness he must state that he had no doubt that many, perhaps all those who opposed the appropriation, were equally in error with himself, as to the power of amendment.]

Mr. LEIGH continued. He said the gentleman from Alabama had not understood him, if he supposed he referred to him, either at the last session or at this. He well remembered that he was under a strong impression at the time, that the amendment of the House was not susceptible of amendment in the Senate. He did not know how he got his opinions, but he supposed he might possibly have got them from the gentleman himself. He was going to say, when he rose, that he desired very much to say a few words on the general question; but he was reluctant to do so, after the remarks made by the gentleman from Missouri at the commencement of his speech. He would not say any thing further on the general question, if it would be considered discourteous in him to do so. He wished at all times to act with perfect courtesy to every gentleman.

Mr. BENTON said that there would be no discourtesy to him in the gentleman's making any additional remarks he thought proper. He would hear the gentleman with pleasure; and, if he pleased, would move that the Senate adjourn.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,
The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

DAUPHIN COUNTY (PA.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of Ovid F. Johnson and six others, who had been appointed a committee, by a large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Dauphin county, convened in the borough of Harrisburg on the 28th day of August last, "to prepare a memorial to each House of Congress, praying the appropriation by the general Government of a sum sufficient to remove to Africa free negroes willing to remove, and manumitted slaves, equal in amount to the whole annual increase of the colored population of this country; and, also, such additional number as, in the wisdom of Congress, the finances of the nation and other considerations may justify, if, in their opinion, the constitution of the United States will justify such appropriations; and if not, then to adopt measures to effect such an alteration of it as will authorize the measure."

Mr. B. said the committee, in their memorial, had gone at length into the subject, and had treated it with much ability. A proper degree of respect for them, and those whom they represented, required that this memorial should be printed for the use of the Senate. He would therefore move for its printing; and, for the present, that the memorial be laid upon the table.

These motions were adopted.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the resolutions offered by Mr. BENTON.

The question being on the motion of Mr. CLAYTON to strike out the word "surplus," before the word "revenue,"

Mr. LEIGH observed that he had not intended by any further remarks of his to protract this debate, and should not have again arisen, but for the exposition which the Senator from Missouri had given of his principal policy in offering his resolution to the Senate, and the assumption on his part, which assumption, so far as he (Mr. L.) was concerned, was erroneous. He knew that frequent occasions might hereafter occur, on which he would have an opportunity of explaining fully his opinions on the subject of our relations with France, but he was unwilling that for a single moment his opinions should not be known. The gentlemen told the Senate that his purpose in offering his resolutions was to present an antagonist proposition to those already before the Senate, for the distribution of the surplus revenue, introduced by the Senators from South Carolina and Kentucky; and, as he understood the gentleman, he intended to use this possible result of a war with France as an argument in support of his principal policy. Though he was as much disposed, Mr. L. said, as any gentleman to vote for every necessary, liberal, and reasonable appropriation of money suited to a state of war, if war is to come, and suited to a state of peace, or to exactly the state in which we were, a state of peace, with war expected to come, he desired to be distinctly understood that he was not willing to give one single dollar for any object introduced to defeat these two propositions of the gentlemen from Kentucky and South Carolina. What he might think of these two propositions, he declined then to state; but this he would say, that, in selecting objects for the distribution of this surplus revenue, now become so burdensome, he was not willing to look at any other than that for which the appropriation was to be made. Let them, said he, stand upon their own merits, and be determined by them alone; and let the proposition to appropriate the surplus revenue for national defence be determined by the necessity of national defence alone. If we are to have war with France, said Mr. L., or if there is danger of that war, it becomes us seriously to consider what is the nature of that danger, and to determine how far we ought now to provide against the possible occurrence of it. It did so happen that he found himself less sanguine, as to the happy termination of the mediation offered by Great Britain and accepted by our Government, than any gentleman with whom he had conversed, or who had entered into this debate; at the same time he was as much convinced as he ever was that there was no just or reasonable cause of a war with France.

Here are two letters, said Mr. L., of Mr. Livingston, received, from their dates, after the message of the President was sent to the House of Representatives, on the 6th February, and must have reached France in March, 1835. He did not condemn Mr. Livingston for communicating to his Government his honest opinions. But for what purpose, he asked, was the letter published? Was it for any other conceivable purpose than to justify the language used in the President's message? He would ask, if the French ministry would not look into those letters and documents, and compare them together? France was at that time, if it was not now, torn with party dissensions at home. Mr. L. mentioned the Bonapartists, and other divisions of parties that existed in France, and the embarrassing situation of the ministry. A simple law, proposing the payment of our claim, said he, is before the Chamber of Deputies. A member rises in his place and proposes, as an amendment to it, that an explanation shall be required of the President: and what could they do? If they opposed it, the ministry would be charged with a want of a due sense of patriotism and national honor. The King knows that the decision of our Government sought for the payment of it, and yet he cannot make the payment without the consent of the Deputies. Mr. Livingston expects there was a motive for delay, while he himself desired a message of the kind. He (Mr. Livingston) advised that the President of the United States should, by a strong message, aid them (the ministry) in obtaining the necessary vote of the deputies. What would be the effect upon the Chamber of Deputies of such a traitorous effort to force them into a compliance? The course pursued by France in this matter was to preserve her own standing at home, and not with a view to embarrass the relations between that Government and ours.

Mr. L. alluded to another letter of Mr. Livingston, and also to the letter of the Duc de Broglie to Mr.

Pageot, treating of the temper of the French people, and of the necessity of prudence and caution on the part of the Government. The first notice of the requirement of an explanation on the part of the French Government he (Mr. L.) saw in a New York newspaper. The next was in the Government paper of this city. This paper had published it as asking an apology. He (Mr. L.) had some little distrust as to the translations given us, and pointed out the variety of significations of French words to show that translations of the French language required great skill. He, for one, was at once satisfied, if the views taken of the explanation which he saw in the Government organ (the Globe) was relied on as characterizing the proviso as an apology to be given, there were little hopes of an amicable adjustment—he knew there would be none. The Count de Rigny had said that the President would have to take the initiative. When he (Mr. L.) saw the letter, he gave up all hopes of an adjustment. The French Government, however, had thought better of the matter, and had, in fact, taken it upon itself to make the initiative step in a letter from the French prime minister to Mr. Pageot, and had given an opportunity to our Government, through our chargé d'affaires in France, or to their chargé d'affaires here, to make the necessary explanation. This letter had shown a pacific disposition on the part of France, and no one would doubt that it sought to eschew war.

He (Mr. L.) had had several conversations with several gentlemen of both parties, and although he differed in political questions with those who were friendly to this administration, yet he believed he enjoyed their personal friendship. He had heard the views of a number of them, as to the terms of an explanation—as to how far the President should go. In reply, he (Mr. L.) had said to them that he could not see how it could impair the honor or dignity of any Government to ask the precise thing wanted. We now, in a letter of the Duc de Broglie to Mr. Barton, had what was wanted—an official written communication, unaccompanied with the polemical matter with which it was associated in Mr. Livingston's letter.

The construction the President had put upon that letter was that France demanded an apology, and had dictated the terms in which it should be made. No, sir, (said Mr. L.,) it does not dictate the terms. No precise terms were prescribed. This construction had embroiled us in further difficulties. He believed the French minister designed by it (the explanation) to promote peace. Does not the President now, said he, come forward and virtually say he is willing to make the explanation? It was, therefore, a question as to a mere matter of form in which the explanation was to be made.

Mr. L. spoke of the frivolous pretexts upon which war had been waged by different nations; and that Charles XII had waged a war because there was said to be a picture of an offensive character hung up in a particular place in Germany. The President was willing to make the communication in a particular way—in a message to Congress. But he (Mr. L.) thought it better, so far as dignity was concerned, to let the Secretary of State of this Government make the explanation in a communication directly to the French minister, than that it should enter a solemn message of the President to Congress. He looked upon the whole controversy as being mere matter of form. He remembered no instance in which the truth of the expression was more clearly evinced, (which he had met with in some author, whose name he did not now recollect,) that "words were things."

Mr. L. controverted Mr. Livingston's position that the communications between the President and Congress were like the family councils of the official authorities in France. Their family councils were secret; the President's communications with Congress were public. He said it was admitted that, if the President had come out in a proclamation affecting France, we would be responsible to that Power. In his opinion, we were not less so on a message to Congress. There was no reason, founded in good sense or in good manners, to prohibit the explanation, except the manner of putting a few words in form. We were quarrelling about matters of form with France, our national ally, whose commerce was worth to us, and ours to her, more than the commerce of all the world beside, with the exception of one nation. If Solomon lived at this day, he would surely say there is something new under the sun.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had read from French papers extracts from speeches in the Chamber of Deputies of an exciting character, and had taken a course calculated to reflect censure upon the conduct of the French King and ministry. These petty jars being kept up, were illy calculated to accomplish the object of peace. It was said that wars did not originate so much from intercourse between belligerent nations themselves as from the domestic belligerent parties in those nations at home. He did not believe we ought to persist in this measure of hostilities merely for the sake of having the particular direction of the surplus revenue. If we had no such surplus revenue, which had unfortunately accumulated on our hands to a large amount, there would be no such strife or indications of war. He alluded to publications in the Globe in regard to the acceptance of the mediation of England. The President had stated with precision the terms on which it was accepted. He (Mr. L.) believed that when that acceptance, with its reservations, is seen in France, it would be considered as an additional cause of offence. If there was any freedom in the French press, though the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] thought there was not, we might expect to see the publication of this message of yesterday, on its arrival in France, accompanied with a paragraph, stating that it was an additional insult. He thought it increased the difficulties, and that the prospect of a war was greater than was imagined. The issue now made up between the two Governments seemed to be leading directly to a war! In this view of the matter, he was prepared to vote for appropriations for the national defence. But he was, nevertheless, not going to vote in the dark, nor was he going to make out a statement for himself of the amount necessary for each object—that was a matter for the proper department to do. Mr. L. went into a statement to show the limits of the amount that could be judiciously expended on certain objects in one season.

Mr. L. went into an argument at some length in support of the vote he gave against the three million appropriation of last session, which he said he had given under a belief entertained then and now, that it was unconstitutional, and not from any distrust in the President, and concluded by wishing to God that He (the Supreme Being) would put it into the hearts of them all to avoid these unpleasant controversies. He (Mr. L.) aimed only at a faithful discharge of his duty, and only wished to have an acknowledgment of it.

The surplus revenue burned in our pockets—it was like money in the pockets of a schoolboy, who was never satisfied till he got rid of it. The loss to the United States, in the event of a war, would extend to the benefit of our trade with France, and the loss of the carrying trade, which would go to England. It was not money alone, it was the blood of both nations, that would be expended. The people of the United States ought not to shape matters entirely with a view to peace. He could not, situated as he was, be indifferent to a war. He was less sanguine that there would be no war than some gentlemen, and more convinced than others that there was just cause for the apprehension of it, and his vote would be predicated upon the supposition of a war. Mr. L. adverted to the Berlin and Milan decrees to show that the President must have been under a mistaken impression when he supposed that all spoiliations committed by the French upon American vessels were not allowed. He, nevertheless, thought the acceptance of the five millions, by our Government, a judicious act, under the circumstances, and that it was wise in the Government to negotiate this treaty. There were some doubts at the time whether the treaty would be ratified. What had been the condition of France at that time? She had been paying indemnities to the conquerors of her Government to a great amount, and was laboring under other embarrassments. The French Executive had notified to ours that it was doubtful whether the Chamber of Deputies would vote this money. The American Government knew, or ought to have known, that the French Government could not constitutionally have paid it at the time our draft was dishonored. But our Government looked upon this claim as of long standing and a just claim, and could not see the reason of its detention. It did not, however, properly estimate the probable result of the vote of the Chamber of Deputies. The Duke de Broglie and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] differed as to the fact of the claim having been presented by the King to the Chamber of Deputies. The Duke de Broglie had said it was repeatedly presented to the Chambers; nothing was done, or, as he believed, could be done.

[Mr. BUCHANAN said that he had asserted, and he did so again with the most perfect confidence, that the French ministry had never presented a bill to the Chambers to carry into effect the treaty until more than two months after the first instalment under it had become due; and there was nothing in the letter of the Duke de Broglie to Mr. Pageot which, in the slightest degree, contradicted this assertion. Such was undoubtedly the truth.]

Mr. L. continued. All he knew was, that the Duke de Broglie said it had been presented to the Chamber of Deputies at as early a date as possible, but that to urge it hastily might endanger the safety of its passage through that body. The constitutional duty of the King was to present these claims to the Chamber of Deputies, and he was charged with an omission of that duty.

Did the King of France think it detracted from the honor and dignity of the French nation to offer an apology to the American Government for the delay? No, sir. The Secretary of State of this Government was extremely importunate, and an apology was expected from France for this omission, and it was given. He referred to the letter of Mr. Serurier, which set forth the difficulty in obtaining an appropriation in the French Chambers, and the regret the failure had occasioned the King's Government. At the next succeeding session the bill was long before the Chamber of Deputies, and was defeated by a majority of eight votes. Mr. L. referred to the letter of the Duke de Broglie as an evidence of the sense of justice of that great statesman, and of his anxiety for the fulfilment of the treaty. A neglect of duty by omission, or a neglect of it by commission, was virtually the same. An apology for the omission by the French Government in regard to this claim had been here given by the minister of that Government; he was going to say, in its terms more humble than that required by the King's Government from the President.

It had been charged that the King had not brought the matter before his Government at as early a period as he ought to have done.

Mr. L. adverted to the time of meeting of the Chambers, the proroguing of them, the proposition of the King to call them together again at an early day, and of the despatch by a vessel to communicate his intentions to our Government. He then read a letter from Count de Rigny to our Government, in which was stated the impossibility of convening the Chambers before the winter. That the claim had to be treated of by the public as well as before the Chambers; and of the necessary procrastination in paying the way for its favorable reception by the Deputies. Here is another instance, said Mr. L., in which the French Government explains, yes, apologizes, to our Government.

Mr. L. adverted to the opinion entertained by France in regard to the message of the President, which contained, as she supposed, a menace, and to the succeeding message disavowing it. Said he, upon the honor of a man, I never could believe the President was serious in his intention of making reprisals. Was there ever an instance in which notice was given to the adverse party of such intention, as had been done in this case? In the administration of the elder Adams, letters of reprisal were ordered against the armed vessels of France, but exempted her merchant vessels; no spoliation was to be committed upon her commerce. When notice of reprisal was given, it put the party, against whom the reprisals were to be made, upon their guard, and enabled them to defeat the object.

Mr. Livingston had written a very able letter, of his own accord, and without the authority of this Government, stating that there was no intention of menace on the part of the President towards the Government of France. What effect that letter might have had it was difficult to determine, for the action of our Government had done away the force of it. The ministry of France were still in favor of fulfilling the treaty. Mr. Livingston's letter comes, and, as it were, dispels the gloom. He read from Mr. Livingston's letters, in which he had said they (the French ministry) would not take the responsibility of a rupture between the two nations.

Also, that he, Mr. Livingston, did not hope for an adjustment before the — day of January.

Mr. BROWN afterwards obtained the floor, speaking in reply to what had fallen from the Senators from Virginia and Kentucky, and in defence of extensive appropriations for fortifications, &c.

Before he had concluded, he yielded the floor to

Mr. GRUNDY, who moved that the Senate adjourn. The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10. NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. BENTON's resolutions proposing to appropriate the surplus revenue to fortifications, &c.

Mr. BROWN resumed, and concluded his observations, which are given in full as follows:

Mr. BROWN observed that he had not intended to take any part in the debate which had grown out of the resolutions submitted by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] until a few days since, when some remarks had been made in the course of the debate, which he considered it his duty to notice. Strong and imperative, however, as he felt this duty to be, he had been willing, on yesterday, to forego the discharge of it, in the hope that the discussion had approximated its close, and that the question would then have been taken. Disappointed as they had been in that hope, and renewed as the debate was on to-day, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LEIGH,] the considerations which had then induced him to abstain from asking the indulgence of the Senate no longer operated; and he would proceed briefly to fulfil what had then been his intention, which, under the hope that a vote would have been taken on yesterday, had been temporarily abandoned.

From the observations of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEIGH,] and the gloomy forebodings he had expressed, (which he trusted were not well grounded,) that, in the progress of the difficulties between the Government of the United States and France, we might be finally involved in a war, we are, said he, admonished, by every consideration of prudence, of interest, and of national pride, to make the most effectual preparations for any contingency that may happen. That gentleman had deprecated a war with France, more than with any of the other nations of the old world. He confessed that he entertained something like the same feelings.

Mr. B. confessed that he had been taught from his youth to cherish the most lively sympathies for the gallant people who aided us in our glorious struggle for freedom; that France was endeared to us by every remembrance of that contest; he confessed, too, that war was greatly to be deprecated between two nations bound to each other like France and the United States by such a reciprocity of powerful interests; but when France forgot what was due alike to justice and to our national honor, he, for one, was prepared to consider her people, if the crisis should demand it, as "enemies in war, in peace friends." The gentleman from Virginia deprecated war because of the baneful influence it would have on free Governments, and its tendency to arrest their progress. Had it not suggested itself to the mind of the gentleman, that the same effect would be produced in a much higher degree, if we should succumb to the dictates of a foreign Power? Would it not have the effect to destroy the moral power which our free institutions possess at this period, if we were to suffer our national honor to be tarnished, and our rights to be violated? Most assuredly it would, and he who was most anxious to benefit the world by the examples of our free institutions should be the most careful to show their influence in preserving us both from injury and indignity.

The gentleman, in referring to the President's recommendation, at a former session, for the issuing of letters of marque and reprisal against France, said that he never did believe that the President was serious in the recommendation of such a measure, and until that time no Government, in ancient or modern times, had ever given previous warning to its antagonist when it thought proper to resort to it. He would ask the gentleman if the distinction between the constitution of this Government and those to whom he referred had not occurred to him? How was it possible for the President of the United States to act in a measure of the kind without the co-operation of Congress? and how was it possible for him to have obtained that co-operation without addressing himself to them in a message? The gentleman could see no impropriety in the President's giving to France explanations as to the message sent by him in the performance of his constitutional duty to a co-ordinate branch of this Government. Now, almost every gentleman who had addressed the Senate on this question had repudiated the idea that the Chief Magistrate of this country should make explanations to a foreign Government touching the communications made by him to Congress; and he confessed he was astonished at hearing such sentiments uttered by the gentleman from Virginia. He could not believe that such concessions could be made without an utter sacrifice of every principle of honor—without a violation of that independence which we of all others should hold the most precious.

In Mr. B's opinion, the ground on this point so ably and successfully maintained by Mr. Livingston, in addressing the French minister, was the only true and tenable one. When any thing calculated to impeach the honor of a nation is used in the diplomatic communications of another, it then had a right to demand an explanation; but where the matter taken exception to is found in a communication from the Chief Magistrate of a nation to a co-ordinate branch of his own Government, expressly intended to give information of its own affairs, the Chief Magistrate cannot enter into any explanations with a foreign Government, without a surrender of every principle of honor and independence. No Chief Magistrate of this country had ever done so.

Mr. B. said he would now proceed to notice some remarks made by gentlemen at an early stage of this debate. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] a few days ago, remarked that we had not entered into extensive warlike preparations previous to our late contest with Great Britain; and he argued from it that, as we came out of that contest with honor, we were now able to meet a less powerful enemy, with our increased population and resources, without placing the nation in a strong defensive attitude. If ever a nation had been taught by severe experience the fallacy of that doctrine, he thought this nation had. To what cause were we to attribute the disasters that marked the commencement of that contest, but the want of adequate preparation; but to the fact that we had not made the preparations which wisdom, prudence, and a sense of honor and interest, demanded? Did not the gentleman recollect how the patriotic citizens of his own State were called on to defend our northwestern frontier from the incursions of the enemy, and did he not recollect the disasters of the river Raisin and other places on the frontiers, occasioned mainly by the want of necessary preparations? It did appear to him that, if ever a nation had been admonished by experience, the best of all instructors, that in peace they should prepare for war, it was the people of the United States. The Senator from Delaware had endeavored to justify his vote, as well as that of his friends, on the rejection of the three million appropriation, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the amendment of the House, and challenged the friends of the measure to produce any warrant for it in the constitution; but the gentleman, unfortunately for his cause, had failed to prove the truth of his position. Unconstitutional, did the gentleman say! By what authority (said Mr. B.) do we appropriate money for the public service? Under the constitution, which provides that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. Then, if the Senate of the United States had passed this amendment of the House, would the money not have been drawn from the treasury in virtue of an appropriation made by law? Undoubtedly it would have been drawn in pursuance of the very words of the constitution. The constitution had not pointed out whether general or specific appropriations should be made, but very properly left that matter to the wisdom of Congress, to be judged of by the peculiar circumstances of the case. While the gentleman was endeavoring to extricate himself and those who voted with him from the difficulties in which they had involved themselves, it appeared to him that he was plunging himself and them still deeper than they were, into insurmountable difficulties. By a comparison of the report agreed on by the committee of conference of the last session in reference to this amendment of the House with the amendment itself, it would be found that the constitutional objections of the gentleman applied much stronger to that than to the amendment proposed by the House. Permit me (said Mr. B.) to call the attention of the Senate to the striking difference between the amendment of the House of Representatives and the report of the committee of conference, the latter of which met the concurrence of the gentleman and his friends. The amendment made the appropriation contingent in the first instance, and did not call for the expenditure of the money unless such expenditure became necessary to place the country in a posture of defence. It was limited to the next session of Congress; and permit me (said Mr. B.) to observe, that it was actually more specific in its language than the substitute proposed by the committee of conference. In defining the objects of the expenditure, it went on to say that it was for fortifications, for ordnance, and for the naval service; while the substitute proposed to appropriate the money for fortifications and for the naval service only, leaving out the word "ordnance." The one was limited, and the other was unlimited, possessing no qualification whatever, by which the Executive was to be bound. Therefore, whilst honorable gentlemen were endeavoring to shield themselves from the consequences of having rejected the amendment of the House of Representatives, under the wide panoply of the constitution, it appeared to him that they themselves had been inflicting a severer blow on that instrument than that which they had professed so much anxiety to avert.

Gentlemen (said Mr. B.) had very suddenly discovered that appropriations, to be properly made by Congress, should first be recommended by the Executive. Many had said that the three million appropriation was unconstitutional, because the Executive did not step forward and say to Congress that this sum of money was wanted for the exigencies of the country. He should like to know in what part of the constitution gentlemen found the clause denying to Congress the power to appropriate money without that recommendation. The practice of making specific appropriations had often been departed from; if there was one right clearly belonging to Congress, it was the right to appropriate money of their own free will and discretion, and to tell the Executive how he should apply it for the public service, without waiting for his application or recommendation. The Executive could control this discretion in no way but by withholding his signature to bills making such appropriations. It appeared that honorable gentlemen had fallen into this error by looking at the monarchical institutions of the old world. In the British Parliament, the King's minister produces the annual budget, and asks the appropriations it calls for; and when these are granted, the King returns thanks to his faithful Commons for their liberal supply. There was a wide difference between this practice and that of our republican Government. The Congress of the United States appropriates money for the public service, to be expended under the direction of the President; but they did not grant it to him, as the British Commons did to their King. Suppose, however, that the President at the last session of Congress had complied with the wishes of gentlemen, as now expressed, and had stated that the public service required additional appropriations, and had asked Congress to make them. Is it not probable, said Mr. B., if the President had made such a recommendation to Congress, that we should have heard rung in our ears the cry of dictation; that he wanted this money, not for the public service, but for electioneering purposes; or that the appropriation would result in war, into which the Executive was anxious to plunge the country? If those in opposition had not done so, they would have departed from their usual course in reference to the measures of this administration. Gentlemen would probably have escaped from such executive dictation, and refused to vote the money, by resorting to the dexterous logic of a celebrated knight, who, when pressed for reasons, refused to give them "on compulsion."

The gentleman from Delaware had said that the friends of Mr. Jefferson here had abandoned all the lessons inculcated by that statesman with regard to the expenditure of the public money. He thanked him for "that word," and rejoiced that he had identified the friends of the administration with that great man. But in what respect, said Mr. B., have we departed from the policy of Mr. Jefferson? It was a favorite principle of his, which had been followed up by his party ever since, that specific appropriations should be made in all cases where it was possible to do so; but it was a practice of his administration to relax that republican rule when the public service required it. In the case adverted to by the Senators from Tennessee and Pennsylvania, in the administration of Mr. Jefferson, when an appropriation of two millions was made, having in view the purchase of Louisiana, that appropriation was made in terms as general as it was possible to imagine; and the discretion granted to the Executive was far beyond that contemplated in the amendment of the House of Representatives of the last session. In the latter case, the money was appropriated in a season of great emergency, for the defences of the country, under the most reasonable apprehensions of greater difficulties with France, and the expenditure was limited to the next session of Congress, when an account was to be exhibited for every dollar expended.

Mr. B. said he would not pursue the remarks of the gentleman from Delaware further; with the controversy between an honorable member of the other House and another gentleman of this body, to whose assistance the Senator from Delaware had so gallantly come, neither him nor his political friends had any thing to do. One of the heroes renowned in Grecian story was esteemed fortunate in having the devoted and faithful Patroclus as his friend; equally so was the gentleman whose cause had been so well defended here; but he trusted that the gentleman from Delaware would not, like the friend of the Grecian hero, become the victim of his own generous fidelity.

Here Mr. Brown yielded the floor, at the instance of Mr. GRUNDY, who moved an adjournment; but before the question was taken, at the request of Mr. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky, it was for a moment withdrawn, when he entered into an explanation of some of his views which had been remarked on by Mr. B.; after which, on motion of Mr. GRUNDY,

The Senate adjourned.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the subject on the following day,

Mr. BROWN, in continuation, said he had to express the obligations he felt under to the Senate, for the indulgence that had been granted him, by an adjournment on the last evening. He would endeavor to requite it by disposing of the remaining topics yet to be noticed as speedily as he could with justice to himself. The charge had been repeatedly made on that floor, and echoed elsewhere, that a great effort was making to prostrate that branch of the Government, (the Senate); that a war was waging against it, and that war was made by the President of the United States and the party who supported him. If war had been made against the Senate, it had not been made by the Chief Magistrate, or by the party who supported him; but, in his opinion, it had been made upon the Senate by itself. The course of measures pursued by that body had produced more injurious consequences, so far as itself is concerned, than could possibly result from any action of the Executive, however hostile to it. Who commenced that course of hostility said to be existing between the President and his constitutional advisers? Let the journals of that body answer. Let the ever to be remembered session of 1834 explain who were the first aggressors.

The Chief Magistrate had been arraigned, tried, and condemned, without a hearing, for having done that which he believed to be his duty, by a resolution passed by a decided majority; and this, in his opinion, and in the opinion of a vast majority of the people of the United States, was done directly in violation of the constitution, which gives to the House of Representatives only the power of impeachment. This was a manifest usurpation of power, and a war waged by the Senate against the President. If the Senate had lost moral power in the nation, if it had lost that salutary influence in the councils of the country it ought rightfully to possess, such loss had resulted from another circumstance than the one supposed by gentlemen who had adverted to it. It had resulted from the fact that it had arrayed itself against public opinion, and had not yielded to it that respect which it was entitled to under our form of Government. He admitted that this body was constituted to check those ebullitions of popular feeling which must at times arise in all Governments, but it never was constituted to stand up against settled public opinion, when it had been repeatedly spoken.

We all remember, (said Mr. B.,) in 1834, the great effort to break down the popularity of the present administration, and to achieve success for the bank and its partisans, by making unceasing appeals to the fears of a free, a high-minded, and enlightened people. I contend, (said Mr. B.,) if the Senate has lost power, it is from its own actions, and not from any other branch of the Government. It had been said, if the Senate was not popular now, a brighter day was coming, and that the virtue and intelligence of the people would yet preserve it from destruction. Yes, sir, (said Mr. B.,) the people will preserve it, but it will be by infusing into it gradually a stronger portion of popular feeling, and one more congenial to their own.

His honorable colleague (said Mr. B.) had inquired a few days ago in what manner the appropriation bill, containing the amendment of three millions by the House of Representatives at the last session, came here endorsed; and had said it came to this body endorsed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and a prominent member of the "spoils party." Sir, (said Mr. B.,) that bill came here endorsed in a manner which ought to have entitled it to the highest respect; it was sanctioned by the popular branch of our national Legislature—that branch whose province it is to originate appropriations for the public service, through the hands of one of its most important committees; which he thought was an endorsement sufficient to secure for it a proper degree of respect in this branch of the Legislature. His colleague had also adverted to the great influence possessed by the Executive, which, brought to bear, in the shape of patronage, on the Legislatures of the different States, was producing the most dangerous effects. He was well aware that those who constituted the dominant party in this country were often taunted by those in opposition with the appellation of the "spoils party." The charge had been so often made that, although it had as often been successfully refuted, yet he could not pass over it without giving it some notice. As far as his own State was concerned, it was his duty to meet it. He would be faithless to them, as a portion of the democratic party, if he did not vindicate them, at least, from an imputation which, so far as it might be intended to apply to them, did great injustice. He did not hesitate to say that he had no doubt, from information in which he placed the most implicit confidence, derived from gentlemen of the highest respectability, and whose opportunities of acquiring a correct knowledge of the subject were the greatest, that a vast majority of the federal offices in North Carolina were filled by men in opposition to the administration.

He had been informed, Mr. B. said, and believed it to be the fact, that all the officers connected with the Judiciary of the United States, in North Carolina, were known as belonging to the opposition. As regarded those who held offices in the revenue service of the United States, an equal number, if not a majority, are said to be of the same class as to their politics. He had obtained sufficient information as regarded the political sentiments of those who are in office, as postmasters in North Carolina, to warrant the belief that a very large majority are of the opposition party. From statements which he then had in his possession, vouched for as they were by the signatures of those who furnished them, with the liberty of inspection to any gentleman there who might desire to examine them—made, too, by those who had the best opportunities of correct personal knowledge, it appeared that, in three of the congressional districts, represented by members friendly to the administration, there was a majority of the postmasters in each opposed to the administration. In two others, friendly to the administration, they were nearly equally divided, and from one other of the same political complexion, he had received no information. With respect to the political opinions of postmasters in districts in his State, represented by members who differ in their politics from the friends of the administration, he had no authentic information, except that which is usually in North Carolina denominated the “Mountain district,” and that information, vouched for as it was by the respectable gentleman who had furnished it, represented the number of postmasters in opposition to the administration as being more than two to one in number greater than those who were in favor of it. Mr. B. said that these statements exhibited a result which he himself had scarcely expected: it was, that, in five of the congressional districts represented by friends of the administration, a decided aggregate majority of the postmasters holding office under the present proscriptive administration were in opposition to it. To which of the political divisions the term “spoils party” properly applied, he thought there could be but little difficulty in determining. It was by no means a pleasant task for him to perform, to go into an inquiry as to who were the real office-holders under the present administration in his own State; but it was a duty which he had delayed longer than he should have done, in justice to the political party whose generous support, at a crisis of great public importance, had given him renewed evidence of its confidence. He claimed for the democratic party of his State the distinguished honor of having achieved their successes in the last two years, not only in opposition to the combination of parties which had been arrayed against them there, but to a great extent in opposition to the patronage of the federal and State Governments, with which had been united a majority of the newspaper presses. The patronage of the federal Government was against them, because it had so happened that the greater number of those holding official stations under it in that State were in opposition to the present administration. The patronage of the State Government had been against them, because a majority of the officers who had been elected to State offices for the last two years were, as he had been informed on the best authority, likewise in opposition.

Notwithstanding these facts, said Mr. B., the political party friendly to the present administration had been unceasingly denounced as office-holders and office-seekers, influenced by no patriotic motives, and governed only by the most mercenary considerations. Which of the parties in his own State had sought office with most avidity, let facts speak; which had succeeded most in obtaining the “spoils” of office, was a question not difficult of solution. Mr. B. said that, although the friends of the present administration were decidedly in the ascendancy at the two last sessions of the Legislature of North Carolina, yet they had, with a liberality not often imitated by the opposition elsewhere when in power, elected to office a majority who were adverse to them in politics. He believed this was an instance of disinterestedness and magnanimity which had been rarely, if at all, practised in those States where political power had been in the hands of those in opposition.

[Mr. CLAYTON, having asked permission to explain, stated that the opposition party in Delaware, though in power, had not turned any persons out of office for a difference of political opinions.]

Mr. PORTER, having also requested permission to explain, made a similar statement with respect to the State of Louisiana.]

Mr. B. continued. When he gave way for an explanation from one gentleman, he did not expect that gentlemen would consider themselves called on severally to make their disclaimers. They certainly would have other opportunities of explaining the course of parties in the States they represented. He believed the democratic party had seldom met with the mildness and forbearance mentioned by the gentlemen who had just taken their seats, in those States where they had unfortunately been in a minority. On the contrary, in some of the States they had been proscribed and swept from office, almost without a solitary exception.

Much had been said by gentlemen against the dangerous encroachments of executive power, and the alarming consequences threatened by it; but permit me to say to them that they have greatly magnified the extent of the danger. From what cause did the executive branch of our Government possess power? Was it because of the great authority inherent in it? He believed that the executive office of this Government had heretofore possessed power that it would never possess again. The chief magistracy under this Government had hitherto been filled by men, with but one exception, whose revolutionary services gave them a weight and consideration which their successors would never hereafter obtain. The eminent services of these great men had brought with them into office what, in truth, is the great source of power in popular Government—the public confidence. When the race of revolutionary patriots is run out—when we have no longer the remembrance of the thrilling incidents of that eventful period of our national history to associate with the office of our Chief Magistrate—it will be one of weakness, rather than of exorbitant power, compared with the other branches of the Government. The number of candidates for the office would create great divisions in public sentiment, and all the disappointed would probably unite and array themselves against the successful candidate, which would weaken and embarrass his administration. Gentlemen, therefore, were greatly mistaken in supposing that the executive branch of the Government was that which threatened the greatest danger to our constitution. His colleague had referred to the land bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky. He would say, in a few words, that he had always believed this measure to be impolitic, and on that ground had voted against it. If, however, he should be instructed to support it, by the Legislature of his State, he would readily obey such instructions; but, in their absence, he should, in the exercise of his best judgment, vote against the bill.

With respect to the principal object of the resolution before the Senate, he was not for making appropriations to the extent of the surplus revenue. He was, said Mr. B., in favor of such judicious, liberal, and necessary appropriations as would be sufficient to place the defences of the nation, both naval and military, on a respectable footing. He believed that that Government was cruel as well as unjust to its people, if it failed to adopt such measures as were necessary to protect them against foreign aggression. Failing to do so, it betrayed one of the highest trusts confided to Government by its constituency. He was anxious that that body should concur in some measure which would show the foreign Governments that the American people were united to a man when a question concerning the national honor or the national safety was involved. The Senate having unfortunately failed, at the last session, to exhibit on its part that unanimity of feeling on so important a subject, it was calculated to have an injurious effect on our foreign relations. He did not mean to impeach the patriotism of the Senate; but it could not be concealed that the vote of the last session had, in some measure, produced the belief that there would not be that co-operation of the legislative with the executive branch of our Government necessary to secure for us the respect of foreign Powers. It was, said Mr. B., to aid the moral power of our Government, as well in Europe as elsewhere, that he was particularly anxious that the greatest unanimity should prevail in our councils on the present occasion. But, above all, it was to take such a ground before the American people as would redeem the Senate from every suspicion of apathy in defending the country—a failure, he would again say, he did not impute to improper motives—that he so earnestly desired to see the resolutions adopted. Those who believed that passive obedience, and an imploring tone to foreign Governments, was calculated to conciliate them and protect our national character, deeply erred.

All history showed that the nation which had endeavored to purchase peace by such a course had failed to do so. What was our history preceding the last war? One submission only led to another, and one injury unresisted only served to provoke other wrongs. But when the American people sternly and resolutely determined to take a manly stand in defence of their honor and interests, what was the consequence? Our flag is respected in every sea; our country occupies a high station among the nations of the earth; and we have acquired a national character, in consequence of our energy and decision, stronger even than that which could be maintained by the largest naval and military force. Let me, then, said Mr. B., entreat gentlemen, by all the remembrances associated with the deeds of imperishable renown achieved in the last war, to maintain on this occasion that high national character which the valor of our navy and army had so honorably won.

Mr. MANGUM made an explanation, in order to place in a correct view what had fallen from him in reference to North Carolina.

Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. PRESTON also spoke a few words in explanation.

Mr. EWING now rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: The other day, when, by common consent, the Senate seemed disposed to terminate this discussion, I acquiesced, being unwilling further to prolong it, in opposition to what seemed to be the general will; but the debate has been renewed, and I can now, without being thought obtrusive, consider a few topics which I have wished briefly to touch before I give my vote on these resolutions.

And, first, I take leave to say that all or nearly all that I found objectionable in them will be removed by the adoption of the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, and by the further amendment proposed by my friend from Delaware. It will then stand as a resolution pledging the Senate to appropriate out of the revenues, not the surplus revenue merely, but such sums annually as may be necessary for the general defence and permanent security of the country. Such a resolution shall have my hearty support, and I trust and hope it will receive the unanimous concurrence of the Senate.

But here let me be distinctly understood. I do not consider this resolution the same in form or substance with that presented by the mover. If it were, I could not vote for it. I do not look upon it as a measure at all antagonist to that presented by my honorable friend from Kentucky for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, which I look upon as a measure of immense importance to the State which I in part represent, and to the whole West also. I vote for the resolutions, therefore, with views entirely different from those suggested by the Senator from Missouri when he last addressed the Senate, and I now take occasion to say so, lest any one should think that his gloss was received here as a part of the text, or explanatory of the text, to which we give our assent. We do not say, in voting for these resolutions, that the whole revenue, or the whole surplus revenue, or any such vague and indefinite sum, is necessary for the increase of the navy or for fortifications, or that it can be applied to that purpose. We do not yet know what will be necessary for those objects, nor exactly what could be applied to them, even if appropriated by Congress; nor do we know what will be the surplus for a series of years to come; so that there would be no less than three uncertainties brought to act with and upon each other by the resolution first proposed. But the amendments relieve the proposition of its objectionable features, and in so doing they necessarily make it a different measure from that expounded by the Senator from Missouri. One thing further I am willing to say, by resolution or otherwise; and that is, that the money appropriated by Congress for our military and naval defences ought to be applied to and expended upon those objects from year to year, if it be in the power of the executive branch of our Government to expend it advantageously. I would not have them waste it, but I would have them use every effort to apply it to its designated object. I am not disposed to cast censure upon them because they fail to do so, for they show strong reasons in excuse for their failure or delay; but of this more hereafter.

It seems to be of the essence of modern policy, that every thing is to be carried, and executed, too, by means of excitement. We are to be moved on in our career, in all things, by the force of a high-pressure engine. This machine, with all its power, is now to be brought to bear upon our fortifications and navy, and, by the appropriation of millions and tens of millions, we are to see rising up at once, without hands, ships, and forts, and guns, and equipments, as suddenly as the palace of Aladdin rose under the wand of the Genii of the Lamp. I am disposed to pause and look a little into the matter, and see whether this can be effected thus suddenly. But one thing I must in all candor admit: our surplus revenue may be made to vanish in the attempt, almost as suddenly as that same palace did in obedience to the command of the magician after he had purloined the talisman.

I know we may make appropriations for fortifications and the navy to any extent we please; but I am perfectly certain that, if they be very large, they cannot be expended advantageously to the country. Skilful and experienced engineers are wanting; naval architects, superintendents, master-workmen, mechanics, and laborers, are all wanting, and cannot be procured for some years to come, to apply advantageously a much larger expenditure than that which we usually make for these objects. For the purpose of setting this matter in its true light before the Senate and the public, I propose to offer, by way of amendment, an additional resolution of inquiry to this effect:

“Also, that the President be requested to inform the Senate what sums can be advantageously expended on each of those several objects within the current year, and thereafter annually, on each of those several objects, taking into view the practicability of procuring skilful and experienced engineers, naval architects, superintendents, and master-workmen, and also mechanics and laborers; taking into view, also, our means of procuring and preparing materials fit to be used in works of a substantial and durable character; also, that he be requested to inform the Senate what are the causes which have prevented and delayed the expenditure of former appropriations for those several objects."

To this, I presume, there will be no objection. It is information very necessary to enable us to act with knowledge on the subject. When we have an answer to this, and the several calls contained in the other resolutions, we can form an opinion not only of what is necessary, but what can be used; and we may avoid, what every Senator would doubtless wish to avoid, the placing of a very large sum of money in the hands of a host of executive officers, which they could not expend for the benefit of the country, but which they might misapply. In the mean time, until we get the information which I propose to call for, let us make use of such as is already furnished, and see to what conclusion the facts and reasoning which we find in the executive communications on file will lead us.

The appropriations for fortifications have, for the last seven years, averaged about $800,000, more or less. That of 1834 was about $950,000; and that of 1835, it is well known, entirely failed. Now, let us see from the departments themselves how they succeeded in applying and expending to advantage the ordinary appropriations, such as we have found them; from which we can infer their ability to expend to advantage ten or twelve millions a year of an excess over the ordinary appropriations.

The first difficulty which I propose to suggest, in my inquiry as to these very large appropriations, is the want of competent engineers to project and prepare the plans for our works, and superintend them. This requires men of science and men of experience: have we got them? Can we procure them ready to our hand, furnished to order, whenever we may be disposed to vote money for fortifications? Let us hearken to the President on this subject. I refer to the documents accompanying his message to the two Houses of Congress of the 2d December, 1834, (document No. 2, pages 112, 113.) It is from the report of the chief engineer, General Gratiot, and refers as well to appropriations for roads, rivers, and harbors, as for fortifications. Listen to his plain, explicit, and intelligent exposition of this subject:

"Ninety-one different appropriations, amounting to more than two millions of dollars, have been referred to this department for application within one fiscal year; and to accomplish this, and to meet all the responsibility which it involves, the department is provided with only twenty-seven officers whose services can with certainty be commanded, and of these about one third have had no experience. The consequence is, that works of the utmost importance, with large sums of money, are committed to the hands of agents unknown to the department, with no certainty whatever that the one will be properly managed or the other faithfully applied and accounted for. Besides, these agents are very numerous; their compensation is drawn from the appropriations under which they are employed. Citizens acting in the responsible capacity of constructing engineers and disbursing agents must be well paid; and hence large amounts of many of the appropriations are diverted from their proper objects, and applied to the payment of salaries. But, if this were the extent of the evil, it would be comparatively unimportant. Large sums are lost for want of sufficient agents qualified to project and execute plans for the improvements ordered by Congress. A reference to the numerous reports on the failure of works, particularly to my last annual report, will abundantly show that this remark is not induced by any hypothetical case; it is, unfortunately, the suggestion of experience; so that, besides being executed badly as to durability, and as regards neatness and appearance, in a manner little calculated to do us any credit, many of our public works cost on an average at least fifty per cent. more than they would under a different arrangement. There is certainly no economy in this; enough money has been wasted within the last few years to have supported a corps of professional engineers sufficient for the proper management of all the national improvements in the country."

So much with regard to engineers. We have but twenty-seven; and of these General Gratiot tells us one third part is without experience, and, as a matter of course, cannot be intrusted with a work which requires—and that no one can doubt is the case with all our fortresses—science and experience. Both are essential to their success. No one can found, and plan, and erect, strong and durable fortresses, without both these qualities. How, then, are we to expend, in the present year, ten or twelve millions upon fortifications, when we could not, in 1833-'34, expend one tenth part of that sum for the same objects? Our engineer corps has not since been increased or rendered more efficacious. It is true, there is a bill pending before Congress to increase it; but, though we may pass a law very quickly and very easily to that effect, yet we do not so quickly make for ourselves a more numerous and effective engineer corps. It requires time, the study and experience of years, to make an engineer that can be relied on. So, do what we will, years must elapse before we can have a corps of engineers much more effective than we have at present. And, if we appropriate ten millions this year for fortifications, it must either be wasted and misapplied, or eight out of ten must remain on hand an unexpended balance.

But this is not all. Mechanics and laborers, it seems, cannot be procured in sufficient numbers to enable us to apply all the money that we now appropriate, much less such sums as we are called upon to appropriate to these objects. On this subject I have looked to the executive message at the commencement of the present session, and, considering all the circumstances, I confess I was surprised to find the state of facts to be as it really is.

By the act of June, 1834, there was appropriated to certain fortifications near New York, $150,000; that is to say: to Fort Columbus and Castle William, on Governor's Island, $50,000; and to Fort Schuyler, on Throg's neck, $100,000. It appears by the same report of the chief engineer, (Doc. No. 2, p. 100,) that good progress was made in these works in 1834, especially the preparatory part of it. He says: "The most ample preparations have been made; a permanent wharf will be in readiness by the time it is required; the necessary boats and machinery have been provided, an ample quarry of good stone prepared, and, indeed, every thing that may tend to expedite the work when commenced, will be found in waiting." Now, we all know that there was no appropriation to any of these objects in 1835, so that nothing remained to be done that year but to apply the unexpended balance of 1834 to those and other like works, all in a state of forwardness. And was this done? Could it be done? Let the chief engineer answer. I read from the documents accompanying the President's message of the 8th December, 1835. (Doc. No. 1, p. 101.)

"Fort Schuyler, Throg's neck, East river, New York. It was hoped, from the ample preparations made last year, and the funds available for their application, that the construction of this fort would have been prosecuted the present year with much vigor. But though materials and facilities of every description have been in waiting, it has been impossible to procure a sufficient force to carry on the work with the progress that was desired. No exertion has been spared to facilitate the operation, either by letting parts on contract or by hired labor, and unavailing efforts have been made to collect the necessary force in Boston, Newport, Connecticut, and the western part of New York." So that the balance of the appropriation of about $950,000, made for fortifications in 1834, could not be expended in 1835, for want of mechanics and laborers. I would ask gentlemen here what they would have done with the regular appropriations of last year for those objects, if the bill had passed? Could they have applied it; or would it rather have added another large item to the account of unexpended balances? And, more particularly, what would have been done with the item of three millions, if it had been accepted by the Senate, and the bill had become a law? I know of no satisfactory answer to these inquiries, therefore I expect none. Of one thing, however, I am perfectly satisfied now, and it was a matter of very difficult solution to me heretofore. This state of things in the Department's accounts fully for the unwillingness of the friends of the administration to appropriate the sums to these objects which we of the opposition have heretofore thought necessary. There was danger of causing animadversions upon the executive departments, for failing to apply to the defence of the country funds which the two Houses had appropriated to that object.

But let us, in passing, take a single glance at the navy appropriations, and see whether they have been as large as could be advantageously applied to their particular specified objects. We have it in a report of the Secretary of the Navy of February 3, 1836, (Doc. No. 96.) By this it appears that the whole amount applicable to the naval service for the year 1835 was - - - - - $7,314,277

The amount expended was - - - - - 3,600,243

Leaving a balance on Dec. 31, 1835, of $3,714,034 Which the Executive did not cause to be expended in the year 1835, for the reason, doubtless that it could not be expended with advantage to the service. What, then, would be done with the prodigious appropriations which it is now proposed to make for these objects? Why, surely, remain on hand year after year as unexpended balances.

In the view that I take of this subject I go distinctly upon the hypothesis that there is no danger whatever of a war with France. Indeed, the supposition that there ever was the slightest reason to apprehend it, unless, indeed, it were brought on by some secret order, on one side or the other, of which the country could know nothing until too deeply involved to recede; that there ever has been any probability of war, in the usual legitimate course of things, has always seemed to me an idle supposition. The only thing that ever looked like it was the proposition in the President's message to order letters of marque and reprisal. This, however, met with no response in either branch of Congress; it therefore fell to the ground. Now, then, stood the question? France was offended with the message of the President; but she asks no explanation, except as a condition to the payment of the money. France says the American President has insulted her King in his message to the American Congress; and, although we owe you a sum of money, we will not pay it until the offensive language is explained. Ridiculous enough, in all conscience; much more of the ridiculous than of the arrogant. There is no threat on their part to attack us; this fleet of observation is like the storm ship of the Tappan Zee—it appears only in a hurricane; indeed, the ground on which they have rested the matter forbids them at once from ever assuming a belligerent attitude for this, until we make the first advances. Then, as to ourselves: it is too late for us to make war for the original injury, the taking and condemning our ships and cargoes in violation of the law of nations. This thing might once have been done, had we been able to make them feel our resentment when the injury was recent. But that time has gone by; and he who inflicted the wrong, that mighty man who for the first fifteen years of the present century was himself France, is long since beyond the reach of our resentment, be we now ever so mighty.

"After life's fitful fever he sleeps well."

And we cannot declare war for the original injury, because our own spirit has slumbered too long to be provoked at this day by the voice of honor speaking from the tombs of by-gone years; and, still more, we have treated on this subject. The present King of France has confessed the wrong, agreed with us as to the extent of the injury, and promised reparation. It has, therefore, become a liquidated debt; by mutual consent it is so, and the original trespass is merged in the subsequent accord.

But Louis Philippe now refuses payment because there were doubts entertained here by some of our public functionaries whether he really intended to pay or not. Now, this refusal does not, I confess, appear to me the wisest mode that could possibly be adopted for removing those doubts; and even if expressions were made use of by our President, which gave just offence to the honest pride of France, it is not, I incline to think, the most efficacious mode of vindicating national honor to refuse to pay a national debt. But still there is nothing to occasion war, unless we wish it for its own sake. Now, as to the apology. Not being one of the President's confidential advisers, or at least not being called upon by him for counsel in this matter, in the only way in which I am one of his advisers, I have not heretofore thought it necessary to say any thing on the subject, for I have never supposed that the opinions of gentlemen on this side of the House would have much weight in his councils, even if they were offered. But as the Senator from Tennessee has come out openly and candidly, and told us, with his usual precision, "what he is for," I have no objection to give him my opinion also.

Then I say that I most heartily disapproved of the message which involved the country in this unprofitable contest. I thought, and still think, that the President was not warranted, by the state of the facts, to intimate suspicions against the honor of the French King; nor did I think that the negotiation would be forwarded by a threat of resorting to reprisals. I thought it all ill-timed and ill-judged; but this is not yet to the point—the question of apology.

The authorities of France seemed to have mistaken the nature of their own Government as well as ours. It never struck me that it was consistent with the true dignity of that nation that the Executive head should, in his diplomacy with a foreign Power, speak of the popular branch of their Government, and make the difficulty of passing a measure through the Chambers a diplomatic reason for delay in the execution of a treaty. These are facts which we might very well understand—facts which our Government ought to take into consideration and appreciate, but I do not think they ought ever to have been urged by France, in any form, in her diplomatic correspondence. To this, however, we, as a matter of course, have no right to except; it merely shows an over-anxiety on the part of their King to stand well with us, and to excuse his own inability to perform to the letter his engagements. But this very mistake of France, as to what was due to themselves, has led them into another and still greater error as to what is due from us. The French Chambers refuse to pay the money due to us by treaty, unless the demand is accompanied with an explanation or apology of the message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress. Now, to this apology I, for one, can never consent, and these are my reasons:

The President, when he addresses the two Houses of Congress, is but one of the three great departments of the Government; and though his address be public, and though it be published to the world, and though it ought, therefore, to be circumspect and cautious in its mention of foreign Powers, yet he is but one of the three great departments of the federal Government, communicating to, and communing with, the other co-ordinate branches. Thus, though the Executive may express unkind feeling toward foreign Powers, and such expressions may tend to exasperate them, yet such Powers cannot call upon us to explain or apologize as a nation; for it is not the nation that has spoken in the executive message. But France seems to think, because the President has attacked the honor of their King, that the President must set it right. That he may do, and it is proper he should, (though not upon compulsion,) in the very way in which he committed the wrong—by his message to the two Houses of Congress; and that, indeed, it seems to me, he has substantially done. But he cannot, in my judgment, without degradation, address a direct diplomatic apology to the French King; for, as respects our intercourse with foreign Powers, and our communications with them, the President is the nation; he represents the whole republic, and it would present the case of the whole nation, through their appropriate organ, apologizing to a foreign Power for what one branch of their Government had said of that Power in communicating with its co-ordinate branches. It would be admitting a foreign Power to come into our castle, and witness the workings of the machinery of our Government, not as a whole, but in its several parts. It might thus put it in the power and make it the interest of foreign Governments to look to the parts rather than the whole, in their communication and intercourse with the nation, and endeavor to make those parts so act upon each other as to produce a result favorable to the wishes of the foreign Power. Every thing that looks to this, however remotely, I condemn, and I am proud to see that there is a true American spirit abroad upon this subject.

I, for one, could not, without the grossest inconsistency, entertain any other opinion. One of the first, I believe the very first, subjects on which I raised my voice in this hall was to condemn what I then thought, and what I still think, a compromising of the national honor similar to that which is now demanded, and which is so properly refused. You cannot have forgotten, sir, for you were present in this hall, and took part in the debate on that memorable occasion—you cannot have forgotten the subject to which I refer—the letter of the 20th July, 1829, from the then Secretary of State to our minister near the court of St. James. In that letter, it seemed to me, and to those who acted with me, that there was an injunction on the American minister to say to the British Government that our country was divided into parties; that one party had triumphed, and another had fallen; and that a change of policy and a change of feeling toward England had arisen out of the success of the prevailing party; and that our minister should urge this state of things as a reason why England should grant us a "boon," as it is called, in a commercial treaty. And this was, as we thought, at once introducing that foreign Power into our domestic household, and inviting them to look with interest upon our dissensions, if not take part in them. The book is open before me at the clause of those instructions from which that opinion was drawn. Perhaps I ought not to detain the Senate while I read it. [Several voices: "read it, read it."] I will do so; it is as follows:

"The opportunities which you have derived from a participation in our public councils, as well as other sources of information, will enable you to speak (so far as you may deem it proper and useful so to do) of the respective parts taken by those to whom the administration of this Government is now committed, in relation to the course heretofore pursued upon the subject of the colonial trade. Their views upon this point have been submitted to the people of the United States; and the counsels by which your conduct is now directed are the result of the judgment expressed by the only earthly tribunal to which the late administration was amenable for its acts. It should be sufficient that the claims set up by them, and which caused the interruption of the trade in question, have been explicitly abandoned by those who first asserted them, and are now revived by their successors. If Great Britain deems it adverse to her interests to allow us to participate in the trade with her colonies, and finds nothing in the extension of it to others to induce her to apply the same rule to us, she will, we hope, be sensible of the propriety of placing her refusal on those grounds. To set up the acts of the late administration as the cause of forfeiture of privileges which would otherwise be extended to the people of the United States would be unjust in itself, and could not fail to excite the deepest sensibility. The tone of feeling which a course so unwise and untenable is calculated to produce, would, doubtless, be greatly aggravated by the consciousness that Great Britain has, by order in council, opened her colonial ports to Russia and France, notwithstanding a similar omission on their part to accept the terms offered by the act of July, 1825. You cannot press this view of the subject too earnestly upon the consideration of the British ministry. It has bearings and relations which reach beyond the immediate question under discussion."

Does it not bear me out fully in what I said of its analogy to the question of apology before us? It differs only in this: that in the case which I have read there was no real or supposed wrong to be redressed, no wounded feelings to be healed, nothing but a wish to obtain a treaty, which was worse than worthless when thus obtained. That blot upon our escutcheon is there, and can never be expunged; but as it must remain, let it remain a solitary instance of our national humiliation. I wish no President of my country, whatever be his party, to repeat or imitate it. However divided we may be at home, when we present ourselves abroad and to foreign nations, whether in diplomacy or in the field, let us be seen as a nation, one and indivisible. I am, therefore, opposed to any thing like apology addressed to France by the American President. Let the five millions sink, or five times its sum, if it can only be saved by a stain upon our national honor. But I am not for war. There is nothing in this controversy, as I have already said, out of which war can arise, consistently with the laws and usage of civilized nations. Therefore, whatever appropriations we make for the objects named in these resolutions should be made without reference to this controversy, neither more nor less than if it had never arisen; and I for one am not disposed to direct all the energies of the country to preparations for military or naval defences, when there is no danger of attack, and thus to gratify a mere freak of fancy, or something less innocuous; draw all the money of the country from the interior, and expend it upon the seaboard. But if we were in actual danger of a rupture with a foreign Power, and wished to prepare for the contest, or if we wish to strengthen our hands as much as possible for any future emergency, it is not ships or forts alone that would stand us in stead. Easy and expeditious means of transferring our military strength from the interior to the seacoast, and with them munitions of war, so as to bring such force as may be necessary speedily to bear upon any one point, would be worth to us more than all the forts that all our funds would erect on the coast. Yes, sir, the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and other works of a similar character, are worth, as military defences, three times told as much as their cost in fortifications. Both, to a reasonable extent, are necessary. But if either should be dispensed with, as a defence merely, it should be the fort, and not the canal or railroad. And the city of New Orleans now (though not when menaced in 1815) is defended by a fleet of steamboats which can bear to its defence, at any time that it is menaced, a hundred thousand fighting men in time to repel any attack, though as sudden as the nature of the lakes and seas will permit to be made upon it.

There is but one subject more that I wish to touch, and of that I have but a few words to say. The Senator from Missouri has called upon us to state how we make up the thirty millions of surplus money which gentlemen on this side the House have said is in, or ought to be in, the treasury. I will tell him how.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to Congress at this session, (Doc. 2, page 2,) states the amount in the treasury on the 1st of January, by computation, at

In a paper laid on our table a short time since, he admits that the receipts for the last quarter have exceeded the estimates	$18,047,598
And the bank stock, which can be commanded in cash at any time, is worth	6,200,000

Making, in the aggregate, - - $32,797,598

This is the amount on hand, and the sum which the resolution proposed at once to appropriate to fortifications and the navy. If there were real danger of war, I would do it. I would expend this, or even a much larger sum; and I would build forts, though they might not outlast the summer; but in the true and actual state of our country, it is not necessary to lavish or waste our resources, or impoverish the interior and drain it of all its wealth, for the purpose of sinking the money in ill-devised and ill-executed fortifications, or permit that money to remain in the city banks as unexpended balances for years to come. These are my views, and I shall be guided by them in my votes on these resolutions, and such bills as may be hereafter presented to us in pursuance of their principles.

Mr. WEBSTER said: I attach some importance to the amendment moved by the member from Delaware. That amendment being adopted, the resolution will not speak of contingent surpluses, but will affirm the direct and positive proposition that it is the duty of Congress to make adequate provision for the defence of the country. That is my opinion, and I wish to express it fully and decidedly. We have no higher duty than to defend the country; there is no charge on the revenue that can demand preference over this object.

That some important points of the seacoast are absolutely without all defence, is certainly true. Publicity has already been given to the state of things existing at one interesting point; a point highly important, not only in regard to commerce and private property, but in regard also to public interests of the highest moment. Year after year, I have called the attention of the Senate and of the Departments to this very subject. It has been shown and repeated, and repeated again, that, at this moment, this interesting point, to which I have alluded, rich as we are, and prosperous as our condition is, is more completely defenceless, so far as depends on this Government, than it has been at any time since the first half century of the country. Year after year, I have presented votes and memorials, beseeching Congress to make provision for these undefended points. In the same spirit, at the last session, I proposed to the committee and to the Senate to increase, as they did increase, the amounts proposed by the House. In the same spirit, I now desire to vote for adequate appropriations.

On the one hand, I do not say that all the surplus revenue ought to be thus expended; and, on the other hand, I do not think that proper appropriations ought to be thrown merely upon the surplus revenue. What is surplus? What are the amounts which are to be deducted before we are to call the residue surplus? Different men might differ about these amounts. They might not agree as to what is surplus.

Our true course is, as I think, to appropriate directly; to appropriate liberally; to appropriate intelligently; to appropriate as fast as the moneys appropriated can be usefully expended.

All such appropriations I shall zealously and anxiously support; and the sooner we get the bills, and pass them into laws, the better. If these and other necessary appropriations leave us a balance, as I presume they will, I shall vote, as I have cheerfully voted heretofore, for the land bill of the member from Kentucky. But let us, in the first place, perform the high duty of defending the country.

Mr. PRESTON, after some remarks by way of introduction, moved to amend the first resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows:

"That such appropriations as may be necessary for the purpose ought to be made, to carry on the system of general defence and permanent protection of the country."

Mr. WRIGHT expressed a desire to be heard on the subject, but was not prepared to speak to-day.

Mr. PRESTON moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Monday: Ayes 19, noes 20.

The subject was then postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY then said the Committee on Foreign Relations were desirous to ascertain the genuineness of the letter of the Duc de Broglie to M. Pageot; and he had addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, which, with the reply, he desired to lay on the table, and moved the printing; which was ordered.

Several bills from the House were now taken up, considered, ordered to a third reading, and finally passed.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11.
MASSACHUSETTS CLAIMS.

Mr. DAVIS rose to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, pursuant to the notice given by him yesterday. He said it might be proper for him to explain the object of the resolution, as otherwise it might not be understood by the Senate. In 1830, Congress passed a law directing the Secretary of War to examine and allow the claim of Massachusetts for services, &c., during the late war. In obedience to this law, the claim had been partially examined, and the amount in part paid. He would, however, observe that, in making that examination, many of the vouchers were found informal and defective, and the Department, being tied to very strict rules of evidence, which did not admit of any discretion, or of the admission of other evidence varying from that prescribed, to supply its place, was constrained, against the manifest principles of equity and justice, to suspend such items, though probably fully convinced that many of them were as much entitled to allowance as any which have been paid.

Things being thus situated, the House of Representatives, by a resolution passed in February, 1832, directed the Secretary to proceed and examine such portions of the claim as remained unpaid, and to report to that body such sums, if any, as ought to be allowed, according to the principles of that law. The Secretary has been engaged in this examination, for the purpose of making his report, but meets with the embarrassments he had described; and it was difficult for the State to supply the defects, after a lapse of more than twenty years, as many of the witnesses were dead, and others in parts unknown. It was not only impossible, in many instances, to supply the defects, but it would be attended with great delay and expense, while other evidence, equally satisfactory, can be easily reached.

It is, he would observe, to enable the Secretary to receive such evidence in preparing his report, that he had moved the resolution. The object of it met the approbation of the Secretary, and, as there could be no reasonable objection to it, he hoped it would meet with the speedy action of the Senate. That it might, however, be fully understood, he would move to refer it to the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs, with the hope that it would command their early attention.

The resolution, which is as follows, then had two readings, and was referred agreeably to the motion:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of War, in preparing his report, pursuant to a resolve of the House of Representatives, agreed to on the twenty-fourth of February, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, be, and he hereby is, authorized, without regard to existing rules and requirements, to receive such evidence as is on file, and any further proofs which may be offered, tending to establish the validity of the claims of Massachusetts upon the United States, or any part thereof, for services, disbursements, and expenditures, during the late war with Great Britain; and, in all cases where such evidence shall, in his judgment, prove the truth of the items of claim, or any part thereof, to act on the same in like manner as if the proof consisted of such vouchers and evidence as is required by existing rules and regulations touching the allowance of such claims.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS, &c.

The resolutions submitted some days since by Mr. TITTON, the first directing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire how far the army of the United States, as at present constituted, was sufficient for the protection of the frontiers and to garrison the forts of the United States; and the second directing an inquiry, whether the pay and emoluments of the officers of the army was a sufficient remuneration for the duties performed by them, were taken up for consideration.

Mr. LINN said that the first resolution was the same, almost word for word, with one on the same subject offered by him some days since, and adopted by the Senate. It had been sent to the War Department, from which no answer had yet been received.

The CHAIR read the resolution which was adopted on the motion of Mr. LINN, and remarked that there was a slight difference between that and the one just offered. The inquiry in the first was directed to the War Department, while that of the second was directed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PRESTON observed that the two resolutions were in substance the same, the mode of inquiry only being different. That introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] was directed to the Secretary of War, who, in pursuance of it, would give the necessary information to the Senate; while, under the present resolution, the committee would necessarily have to obtain the same information from the War Department. It seemed to him, therefore, that the second resolution was unnecessary.

Mr. TIPTON then withdrew his first resolution, and the one calling for information relative to the pay of the officers of the army was adopted.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On motion of Mr. TYLER, the special order was postponed until Monday, and the Senate took up the following bill for the relief of the several corporations of the District of Columbia:

A BILL for the relief of the several corporate cities of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to enter into and make such contract or arrangements as to him may appear proper, with the holders of the evidences of debt contracted and entered into between the cities of Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown, and certain individuals in Holland, negotiated by Richard Rush, Esq., on behalf of said corporate bodies, for the purpose of fully assuming upon the United States the entire obligation of paying said debts, with the accruing interest thereon, according to the terms of said contract; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed and authorized to pay, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums as have been paid, or from time to time may become and fall due in the shape of interest, exchanges, costs, or expenses, incurred by the terms of said contract of loan, or in and about the negotiation therefor.

Mr. TYLER said that the pecuniary affairs of the District were seriously embarrassed, and that Congress was looked to for immediate and efficient relief. The sum due by the corporate bodies of the three cities was so large in amount that it could not be paid without the sacrifice of their greatest and best interests. It is impossible that these difficulties should be surmounted, or that they should enjoy any thing like prosperity in future, without the speedy, prompt, and efficient action of Congress. A process of levy and execution has already been issued, which places the people of this District in a state of hopeless despondency; and without the active, liberal, and immediate interposition of Government, the picture which will be presented by these corporations will be lamentable, and one which it is not in my power to overcharge. Their indebtedness amounts to one and a half million, and if we were not immediately connected with the loan which was negotiated, we at least involved these cities in the consequences which have grown out of it, and ought to go to the extent of this sum in their favor. Government had always made this work an object of peculiar attention, and one from the completion of which they expected to reap a golden harvest. Mr. Madison recommended it in his message, dwelling upon the benefit to be derived from its prosecution, and believing it would prove a benefit and a blessing. His successor, if he did not recommend it in totidem verbis, was present when the first earth was removed, and Congress, stimulated by him, subscribed to the undertaking.

According to the old charter of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, it was to be only thirty feet wide, and to contain three feet of water. It might easily have been executed according to the original plan, therefore, by Virginia, Maryland, and the people of this District. But

District of Columbia.

Congress interposed, fatally interposed, to have it changed into a great national work, and to induce the original holders of stock to contemplate its prosecution to the Alleghanies, and even the union of the waters of the Potomac with those of the Ohio. They encouraged the scheme in every way, enlarged the dimensions of the work, and extended its route, and thus offered the greatest inducement to the people to devote their whole energies and resources to an object, the completion of which was to pour treasure into their laps.

The contraction of the debt was in fact countenanced by Government. A letter was written by the then Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Rush,) directed to the Messrs. Baring, urging upon them to negotiate the loan, pledging, in so many words, to them the faith and honor of his Government for its future payment.

All, then, goes on smoothly; the citizens are filled with hope and confidence in consequence of the stimuli you have offered; and if, by your own action, you have involved your citizens, and then changed your course, are you not bound by the strongest and most honorable obligation, by every consideration of probity and fair dealing, to assist and relieve them from their embarrassments?

I plant myself upon this principle. I have said you are the actual endorsers; and so you are. If the property of these people had been destroyed by an earthquake or a conflagration, should we not, considering the letter of recommendation which has been given, be bound in honor to pay it? This, at least, is equity, and should induce the interposition of the law. The ground upon which I plant this report is tenable in a court of law, and much more ought it to be so here. Government has a lien upon these effects, and the question is, whether we shall not execute it. Will you cause levy and sale to be made? The process is already out, execution is awaiting, and it is therefore that I ask for a speedy action. Various expedients were mentioned in the committee room for relieving them. One was, (but it was readily abandoned,) to take a transfer of the stock, but it was thought we had too much to do with the canal already. The only way is to act liberally; take the debt; it will produce no pressure on our treasury; it is to be paid in instalments, only $300,000 annually. Take, then, the debt at once; the people of this District are now borne to the ground; bid them stand erect.

Mr. CLAY said that he certainly felt inclined to do something for these petitioners, but he really saw no reason why they should retain the stock, and we assume the debt. He might vote for the bill in its present shape, but, unless some provision for a transfer of the stock was introduced with it, he was sure, from the temper and disposition manifested by the Senate, that it would never become a law. It was not dealing out equal and impartial justice. There were some constitutional objections also. We cannot constitutionally subscribe to a work like this, and yet we can assume the debt of others arising out of such subscription. So gentlemen argued. The only proper course was to take the stock.

Mr. TYLER replied that he had no desire to go any further into this canal; it was his opinion, if you got hold of any more stock, you would catch a Tartar. As to any constitutional scruples, he would merely observe that, if Government had induced these people to contract a debt, he could see no reason why Government should not pay it. If a man is put in jail against the constitution, can you not release him? Must he remain there all his life? He should prefer the bill in its present shape.

Mr. SOUTHIARD moved to amend the bill by adding a new section providing that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, before he shall carry into effect the provisions of this law, to receive from the corporate authorities a transfer of the stock standing in the name of the different corporations, &c.

Mr. BENTON said that he voted against the law, and that he had always anticipated a kind of moral duress by which they should be compelled to pay this debt. He had voted to pay the interest, and made up his mind when he did so to pay the principal also. He was not prepared, however, to hear the parties ask, and the committee propose, that they should keep the stock; that was rather too much. The partnership had been exceedingly unfortunate, so much so, that he was unwilling that the active member of it should be intrusted with another dollar. He should wish the bill to be recommitted, with a full expression of sentiment on the part of the Senate, that, in its present shape, it could not pass.

Mr. SHEPLEY said that, if they assumed this stock, they should assume also the responsibility of appointing officers, collecting tolls, making repairs, and transacting the usual and common business of a corporation. He did not wish Government to appear in any such capacity. In another view the bill was somewhat extraordinary in its character, for it went the length, not that Government was to pay the debt only, but the interest on it in all time to come. There was neither reason, sense, nor propriety, in this.

Mr. NILES was of opinion that Government had no agency whatever in bringing about the embarrassment in which the affairs of these corporations were involved. It was the natural result of a reckless improvidence on their part.

Mr. PORTER stated that he was unwilling to take this stock. We should again become interested; again excite hope and confidence in those who might become our partners, and again be petitioned for relief; for corporate bodies were never slow in pressing their claims upon Congress. Still a solemn duty called upon us to reject the bill, unless a clause was introduced providing for a transfer of the stock to the United States. Whether of value or not, we were entitled to it. Let us take it, and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to sell it within twelve months for what it will bring.

Mr. SOUTHIARD said that we were not, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SHEPLEY] supposed, about to assume, for the first time, the duties of a corporate body. This Government, so far back as 1828, had authorized the purchase of this stock to the amount of one million of money. Whether right or wrong in so doing, was not for him to say: there was the law on the statute book. The suggestions of the gentleman, therefore, are laid aside by this single fact. But Government had done much more. They had passed an act giving the District power to make the subscription, and they had authorized the borrowing of the money in Europe. The money never would have been loaned, but for the responsibility assumed by us. If not a legal, we tendered a high and honorable security, and so any enlightened jury would decide.

Gentlemen were desirous that Government should part with the stock. If you do add a provision authorizing the Secretary to sell at a given time, you will find that there will be little difference between such an operation and the giving of the money to the corporation. In either case the sacrifice will be complete. If you assign no period for the disposal of the stock, you intrust it with an executive officer. And this I will do, however reluctant I may be, rather than that the bill should be lost.

It is said the District is bankrupt. It is so. The Executive has appointed an agent to sell property; he has been directed to proceed; and your very Capitol may pass into the hands of a foreign creditor. Your whole treasury, in such case, would not be large enough to redeem your honor. This is not an emergency in which we can stand still. Something must be done. He was prepared to make any arrangement satisfactory to the Senate; to vote for the sale of the stock, when the proper time for taking such vote should arrive, or to place it in trust with the Secretary of the Treasury. He hoped the amendment to the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH said he was inclined to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey. No greater mischief could be caused than by announcing that the United States would sell the stock. There are efforts going forward to finish the work, and the notification that the stock would be sold at a given time would have the effect of totally discrediting it.

Mr. PORTER said he would not press his suggestion for the sale of the stock, although he considered that it would be the wisest course on the part of the Government to get rid of the stock, be it valuable or worthless. He had prepared a substitute for the amendment of his friend from New Jersey, authorizing the Secretary to sell the stock within the space of five years. Discretion must be vested somewhere; and he presumed the Secretary of the Treasury would exercise it wisely, and that the result would not be to injure the value of the stock. He had heard with great surprise the argument of his friend from New Jersey, that the Government was liable for all the debts of the corporation.

[Mr. SOUTHARD explained that the law had given all the power into the hands of the Government to collect the money and take all the measures; and that the money would not have been lent had not the creditors looked on the Government as becoming responsible.]

Mr. PORTER resumed, and said that he hoped the amendment would be ingrafted on the bill, although he could not say that he should vote against the bill if it was not adopted.

Mr. LEIGH did not see that there was any essential difference between the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut and that of the Senator from Louisiana. If, by purchasing stock in the canal company, we had caught a Tartar, it was one which we can get rid of whenever we please. He said that Congress had taken an unwarrantable step in giving a lien on the property of individuals. This had been done; and the only question now is, how the Government is to secure the payment of the debt; for he contended that we had guaranteed the payment of the debt to the Dutch creditors, and we had no right to avail ourselves of the plea that a former Congress had done an unconstitutional act. He entertained no idea that the people of the West would ever use this canal to transport their produce, when they have the great rivers of the West, any more than that they would forego the blessed light of the sun for the sake of extracting sunbeams from cucumbers.

Mr. CALHOUN did not understand the only question on this bill to be whether the Government should pay the debt now due; but it was to pay to the corporations all they had paid; to refund every expenditure. The only justification rests on the ground of an improvident contract. On what principle was the Government to pay back to the corporations what they had paid? He had heard this debate with infinite pain. It appeared to him as if he was living in the last stage of a corrupt age. He wished to know if his constituents were to be taxed to pay this money. There was no constitutional power to give the money. As far as he could, he would afford relief, but it must be only as far as the necessity of the case requires, and that under all possible indemnities. He was willing to go as far as the million and a half, and would take a mortgage on the property, with the right to receive dividends, and to make sale. He wished to recommit the bill, with instructions to report it in that form.

Mr. LEIGH said he was willing to go no farther than to pay the principal and the interest in arrear.

Mr. TYLER reminded the Senate that they had paid the interest for the city of Washington ($75,000) last year, and the object now is to put all the corporations on the same footing. If the act of the Government brought the corporations into this difficulty, why not relieve them fully from their distress, instead of going half way? Alexandria subscribed on the express condition that the United States should subscribe a million of stock. He declared that he would stand by the constitution as long as he lived, but he believed the Government was bound to relieve these cities, and he believed this could be done without violating the constitution. We had applied stimulants, and induced the corporations to do what they had done; this is their only Legislature, and there is a moral obligation on the Government to redeem its plighted faith, and relieve the cities.

Mr. CALHOUN insisted that all which was necessary to be done to place Georgetown and Alexandria on a footing of equality with Washington was to give to these two cities as much interest as had been given to Washington, and not to pay all the debt and the interest of the Washington part of the loan twice over.

Mr. WRIGHT said the bill authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to make the best terms he can with the holders. We are not in a situation to borrow money at six per cent., and he wished that, if the bill were re-committed, it should be amended so as to provide that the holders of the stock shall immediately surrender the stock. He was a member of the House when this improvident bill passed. He did not intend to debate it, but he would contend that the act of Congress did not make the Government responsible. Its only effect was to cheat foreigners. He would not say how far the moral obligation went. He would not vote for the bill in any way, but he wished to protect the Government as far as possible.

Mr. LEIGH said, if we had in any way used language which implied responsibility, we were bound in equity to pay the debt. He had no idea that we should ever be completely reimbursed.

Mr. DAVIS said he should be very unwilling to vote for the bill in the form in which it now stands. One reason was the indefiniteness of the sum. Another arose out of the price at which scrip would be in Holland. He thought it would bear a considerable advance on the nominal sum. He wished to see some estimate, to be assured whether the million and a half could be purchased for that sum. He was in the House when the act passed, and was at that time very doubtful whether Congress had any right to pledge the property of individual citizens of the District to make a canal through Maryland and Virginia. Another objection was, that this act would induce other foreigners to think that our Government would guaranty similar loans. He had also been subjected to a reproach for illiberality, because he was unwilling to give the corporations a power to borrow money. The District of Columbia was on its knees, and instead of seducing the corporations into the act, they put it on the ground that it was merely a solicitation of a little more power. He had been not at all disappointed in the result. When the bill should be presented in a form in which he could understand it, he would take the responsibility of a vote one way or the other. He could not vote for it in its present form.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said he should vote for the motion to recommit, if the Senator from South Carolina would withdraw his instructions. He denied that there was any guarantee, and said such was the understanding when the bill was passed. The amount of interest and expenditures it might be difficult to ascertain, but he wished to leave it to the committee to report the bill in such form as they might think best.

Mr. CALHOUN then withdrew his instructions.

After a few words from Mr. WRIGHT, the bill was recommitted.

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

A message was received from the President of the United States, returning certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, concerning the sale of the public lands in the vicinity of Fort Wayne. The message, which was ordered to be printed, is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith return to the Senate the resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, requesting the President to suspend from sale a strip of land ten miles in width, on a line from Monceytown to Fort Wayne, which resolution was referred to me on the 5th instant.

It appears from the memorial, to which the resolution is subjoined, that the lands embraced therein have been in market for several years past; that the Legislature of the State of Indiana have applied to Congress for the passage of a law giving that State the right to purchase at such reduced prices as Congress may fix; and that their suspension from sale is requested as auxiliary to this application.

By the acts of Congress now in force, all persons who may choose to make entries for these lands, in the manner prescribed by law, are entitled to purchase the same; and, as the President possesses no dispensing power, it will be obvious to the Senate that, until authorized by law, he cannot rightfully act on the subject referred to him.

LAND BILL.

On motion of Mr. EWING, the bill appropriating for a limited term the proceeds of the public lands, &c., was taken up, for the purpose of fixing a day for its consideration.

Mr. EWING then moved to postpone the bill, and make it the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. BENTON wished that it should be Wednesday week, as he desired to call up a military bill early next week.

Mr. EWING persisted in his motion for Wednesday; the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 16, nays 13.

SLAVERY MEMORIALS.

The Pennsylvania memorial, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, was called up, as the first on the list of general orders.

Mr. SOUTHWARD asked if it was not the understanding that Friday should be devoted to private bills.

The CHAIR. At one o'clock.

Mr. SOUTHWARD hoped that, as it was so near to that hour, this subject would be postponed.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed a hope that the Senator from Alabama, who was entitled to the floor, would be heard on the subject. He had waited some time for the opportunity, and it was proper to dispose of the subject as early as possible.

Mr. PORTER said it was desirable to get through the private bills, and prevent their accumulation; and he hoped the Senator from Alabama would acquiesce in the postponement. Still, if the Senator from Alabama earnestly desired to go on to-day, he would withdraw any opposition.

Mr. MOORE expressed a wish to go on with the discussion.

Mr. EWING objected to taking up the subject at this time. There was other business pressing upon the attention of the Senate, and this, if taken up, would probably occupy the day. Mr. E. said he had several memorials of a similar character in his possession, which he wished soon to present, but he waited until this should be disposed of before he offered them; and when he did offer them, he wished to present his views on the subject. He thought it better to pass it by to-day, and take it up early next week, and dispose of it.

Mr. TALLMADGE, considering that it would be proper that the Senator from Pennsylvania, who introduced the memorial, should be present, moved to postpone the consideration of the subject until Monday.

Mr. MOORE then said he would move to lay the subject on the table, as the Senator from Pennsylvania was not present.

These motions were withdrawn; and

Mr. M. addressed the Senate in support of the motion of Mr. CALHOUN that the petition be not received.

Mr. M. said he felt sensibly the obligations imposed upon him by the courtesy of the Senate, by their adjournment, when this subject was under discussion at a late hour on a former day; and, in order to make what he had no doubt they would receive as a suitable return for that indulgence, he promised to be as brief in his remarks as possible; and he would not even now trespass upon their patience for a single moment, except for the peculiar course of remark that had been indulged in by certain Senators, and the high state of excitement which prevailed in the section of country from which he came, connected with the subject.

Mr. M. desired to assure the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] who introduced this petition, that, in any thing he should say, or in the vote which he was about to record against receiving the petition, he was not influenced by any want of regard for that orderly and highly respectable body of men from which it emanated; for he believed in his heart, as a profession, the society of Quakers or Friends had as much to command his regard as any other. It was true, he said, there were certain points in their creed, or book of faith, to which he could by no means subscribe.

But it was claimed for these petitioners that they had assumed their attitude before the Senate under the constitution, and that the Senate had no right to refuse to receive their petition.

Mr. M. said it was with great deference, great deference, indeed, to the opinions of others, that he begged leave to say, in his opinion, that that article in the constitution which guaranties to the citizens of the country the right peaceably to assemble and petition for the redress of grievances had nothing to do with this matter whatever; that it was entirely foreign to the subject; and asked whether Congress was about to pass any law having for its object the infringement of this right, thus secured, peaceably to assemble and petition for the redress of grievances. Was any such proposition pending? No. Had these petitioners complained of any grievance with which they were afflicted? No. They had complained of the existence of slavery in the District of Columbia as a grievance, and they had complained of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, which they had been pleased to denounce in no measured terms. They had also taken the liberty to denounce those who participated in that trade. And to these allegations he said he would make a single reply. He said, if slavery in the District of Columbia be an evil or a grievance, it was one which it belonged exclusively to the people of the District to adopt the necessary measures to redress and be relieved of, and not to the people of Pennsylvania. And as regarded the traffic carried on in the person of slaves, this had been the case ever since the Government was established; and he was glad to know this property was secured and guaranteed not only to the citizens of the District of Columbia, but to the citizens of all the slaveholding States, by that sacred instrument, the constitution of the land, which we were all sworn to support. He said he regretted that these petitioners had, in this instance, violated a rule of propriety in their own deportment which he believed they very seldom violated upon any ordinary occasion. He alluded to the rule called by some "a golden one," by others "the eleventh commandment," "that enjoined the duty upon each member in society to attend to his own business, and let his neighbors alone."

These petitioners had unceremoniously left their own domestic firesides, and had thrust themselves here before the Senate, and demanded that they should be permitted to meddle with their neighbor's concerns. Suppose (said Mr. M.) these petitioners were to take it into their heads that the existence of slavery in Alabama, or in any other State, or suppose they were to imagine the liberty of speech or the freedom of the press to the extent they have been exercised of late, were grievances, (and he could not doubt but many would agree with him that the freedom of the press had been grossly abused and licentious,) yet would a petition, embracing these topics, be received by this Senate? He thought not.

Then, as to the language in which this petition is couched, although it was not as offensive as that employed in other petitions on the same subject, yet it was certainly highly objectionable; for he said it could not be disguised that in this petition was a serious charge, made, it was true, more directly against the good people of the District of Columbia, but it also included a portion of his constituents. The slave trade in the District is denounced, and those who participate in it are denounced as being as base, as criminal, and as guilty, as if they were to be concerned in the African slave trade, which it was known our laws have characterized as piracy, and annexed to its commission a capital punishment. He said he must be permitted, as far as his constituents were concerned, to enter in their behalf "the plea of not guilty;" and he would go further, and say they were not only not guilty but entirely innocent, and not only innocent but slandered. He said he would enter the same plea in favor of his colleague [Mr. KING] and himself, for they, too, had purchased slaves in the District for their own plantations; and he was unwilling to admit that they had committed any crime, much less one of so serious an import as that charged.

Mr. M. said he would feel it his duty to say more in defence of the moral character and reputation of the people in the South, who had been wantonly assailed as regarded the treatment to their slaves; but upon this branch of the subject he had been anticipated by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEIGH,] who had been so happy in putting this matter in its proper point of view, that but little was left for him, except to tender the honorable Senator his thanks, and the thanks of his constituents, which he had no doubt he would receive, as he would the gratulations of his own constituents, the citizens of the Ancient Dominion, whose honor, views, and principles, constitutional rights, and privileges, he had so ably and eloquently defended and supported.

Mr. M. said, on this point he would only add that, to those who knew the Southern people best, there would be no difficulty in doing them justice; they would at once admit that these attacks were made either through a gross ignorance of their character, or from a design wilfully to misrepresent them. The principles of humanity, (said Mr. M.,) which he fondly hoped had as much influence in a Southern as a Northern climate, as well as a proper regard for their own interest, dictated a different treatment to their slaves. Sir, (said he,) they constitute our property, our wealth, and, in some instances, our all. Our interest, therefore, requires that we should see that they are treated with humanity, in order that we may derive the greatest possible advantage from their services. And, sir, (said Mr. M.,) I will not hesitate to say, they are well treated, well fed, well clothed, furnished with comfortable dwellings to shelter them from the cold and from the rain. Yes, sir, and they are well satisfied, and well contented, too, and would remain so, if permitted; if these officious intermeddlers, these enemies of our peace, these instigators of insurrection, would only stay their hand, would let us alone. And surely we have a right to demand this much; less will not quiet or satisfy the South.

As a suitable commentary upon the manner in which the South has been slandered and abused, and a suitable commentary, too, upon the character of those base incendiary productions with which that section of country has been literally inundated of late, he would refer to a little book that had by accident got into his hands; it contained some plates, engravings, &c., one object of which was doubtless to place the Southern people in the most odious and degraded point of view that it was possible to imagine, at the same time that it laid the foundation for rebellion and insurrection among a portion of our population. He would not say that this was a principal object in the authors of this work, but he would say, this was among the natural consequences of productions of this character, connected with another result not much less objectionable—the creating prejudice and ill-will in the breast of the Northern against the Southern people. Mr. M. said no person of sensibility, of whatever political party he might be, whether he hailed from the South or the North, the East or the West, could read a half page in this pamphlet, and be able to suppress the most indignant feeling. Sir, (said Mr. M.,) will the Senate excuse me for reading one sentence only on the first page, as a sample of the work? Here Mr. M. read as follows:

"One of the reasons why the Southern States advocated the purchase of Louisiana and Florida was, that they might be able to recover their runaways, as well as to open a market for their surplus slaves, and increase the number of the slaveholding States. For the same reasons, they now urge the purchase of Texas."

Was ever a more foul calumny or base libel published against any community or class of citizens?

Sir, (said Mr. M.,) I wish this incendiary author, whilst he was so very learned and orthodox in the reasons assigned which influenced the republican administration of Mr. Jefferson in the purchase of Louisiana, had been pleased to furnish us with those which influenced the course of certain politicians in getting up and transmitting to Senators here, and members on the other floor of the national Legislature, instructions, by which an opposition was made to the admission of Missouri into the federal family, unless she would come in with a restriction as regards slavery, and which opposition was waged and prosecuted with a spirit and violence that threatened the integrity of the Union itself. Mr. M. doubted not but this author, from his peculiar locality, could have informed us whether that opposition was predicated upon political considerations, in order to prevent an accession of political power, in proportion to the black population, which is entitled to representation according to the principles of the federal constitution, or whether it proceeded from the dictate of humane and philanthropic motives, which these fanatics make great profession of, without possessing the least particle of such feeling.

Mr. M. said he had intended to have prosecuted this inquiry with a view to ascertain, if possible, the secret motive and latent springs which gave rise to the instructions and opposition alluded to; but he said he feared he would be deemed as approaching forbidden ground. He was well aware some would think it unkind to open old wounds. Some honorable Senators deprecated discussion on this subject; they deprecated excitement—caused by whom? Not by us who oppose the reception of these petitions, but by those who get them up and send them here. He was well apprized that the fears and sensibilities of certain gentlemen were easily aroused, lest by inquiry and discussion a political partisan leader should be involved. He, therefore, would not prosecute this subject further; he would not even say what he had intended to say, and what might be very well said in connexion with this subject, but would return to the petition of the citizens of Pennsylvania, asking the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. And Mr. M. desired to know where was the utility of receiving this petition for the avowed purpose of rejecting it immediately. Would the petitioners consider themselves as being treated with more respect by giving this direction to it than if its reception was refused? Would they be inclined to appreciate that right, guaranteed by the constitution, peaceably to assemble and petition for the redress of grievances, of which gentlemen talk so much, as being worth one cent, if it only extends to the right of having a petition read, and the prayer contained therein forthwith rejected, without having it referred or even considered in any manner. Gentlemen attempt to draw a distinction between a proposition to reject the petition and the one to reject the prayer of the petition; but surely this is a distinction without a difference, and so he imagined the Quakers of Pennsylvania would think.

Mr. M. asked whether this procedure was necessary, in order to give Congress jurisdiction in this case? Was it necessary, in order to hold out the idea to those petitioners and others who partake of their views and feelings, that they have a constitutional right to petition Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia? Was it necessary, in order to encourage persons of this description to continue to harass and embarrass Congress with applications of this character? If this was to be one of the consequences of receiving this petition, to his mind it furnished an additional reason why the petition should not be received. For he would not admit that any had the right to approach that body, and demand, or even to petition for, the adoption of a measure which it was admitted that Congress had no right constitutionally to pass; and, upon this point, he believed there was no difference in opinion among those representing the Southern section of the Union.

But, Mr. M. said, he had already intimated that an extraordinary state of excitement prevailed in the section of country from which he came, connected with this subject; and, in confirmation of this position, he would refer to the numerous public meetings that had been called by the citizens of the State. He believed the people in every populous county had congregated themselves together for the purpose of adopting such measures as they deemed best calculated to secure their safety, and avert the evils and dreadful calamity with which they were threatened by the publication of these incendiary pamphlets. Resolutions had been adopted advising a more rigid discipline over our servants; patrols recommended to be kept up incessantly day and night; passes refused to be given in the usual way; they not permitted to assemble for the purpose of holding their own public worship as usual; and many other measures looking to additional restraints upon the comfort and liberty of the servants themselves, had followed as natural results from the state of excitement. But (said Mr. M.) this was not all: resolutions had been adopted invoking the aid and the action of the General Assembly upon the subject, and the General Assembly had accordingly acted.

A memorial had been adopted by the General Assembly, addressed to the Legislatures of the States whence these insurrectionary pamphlets issued, a copy of which he had the honor of presenting to this body, and which the Senate indulged him in having printed, and which now lies on each Senator's table. In this, it will be seen, a most earnest appeal is made to these legislative bodies, urging the propriety and justice of legislative enactments to punish the offenders. Is more evidence wanting? It would be found in the correspondence which he had seen published between the Governor of the State of Alabama (J. Gayle) and the Executive of the State of New York, wherein it appears that the former had felt it to be his duty, in accordance with the oath he had taken to see the laws of the State faithfully executed, to make a formal demand upon the latter for the surrender of a certain individual against whom a bill of indictment had been found by the grand jurors of a respectable county, charging him with having wickedly and maliciously published and circulated these incendiary publications in that State. It is true, the Executive of the State of New York made a very courteous reply to Governor Gayle, declining a compliance with his demand. He refused to deliver up the celebrated — Williams, publisher of that notorious and insurrectionary work, upon constitutional grounds. But, (said Mr. M.,) as the Executive of New York had admitted it was constitutional for the General Assembly of that State to pass laws to punish those who might publish pamphlets calculated to excite rebellion and insurrection in a sister State, he regretted that, whilst the Executive of New York had made the most liberal professions of kind feelings for the people of the South, he should have declined to recommend to the General Assembly over which he presided, and exercised such a commanding popularity, the propriety and necessity of legislative enactments to punish the individual whom he had refused to deliver to the authority of Alabama, and his associates, for the prosecution of these nefarious and wicked schemes in which they are engaged, calculated to annoy and finally to threaten the peace and safety of the Southern country. Mr. M. said he could not doubt, if such a recommendation had been made by the Governor of New York, in good faith, that such enactments would have been passed; and such would have been more gratifying to the Southern people than mere empty declarations or expressions of friendly feelings; they would then have had the action of the Executive in confirmation of his friendly expressions of kind feeling for the South. He said he regretted that the Governor had not embraced the favorable opportunity that had been afforded him to prove the sincerity of the declarations so frequently made by Northern gentlemen in favor of the Southern people, as connected with this subject.

Mr. M. said it was not necessary for his purpose that he should either commend and laud the Governor of Alabama for the course he had pursued in relation to this subject, or that he should censure the Executive of the State of New York for the manner in which he had thought proper to discharge his official trust to his constituents. His object in adverting to this topic was to show the high state of excitement that prevailed—a state of public feeling that had scarcely a parallel at any former period in the history of our country.

Mr. M. said there were other circumstances connected with this matter, well calculated to excite fears that there was something more intended by the abolition party than met the public eye. He said he had been informed that from two to three hundred of these petitions had already been presented in the other branch of the national Legislature. Many had been presented here, more than ever had been presented in the same length of time at any former session; how many more were yet lying in the table drawers of honorable Senators, and in the drawers of members in the other House, waiting a favorable moment to be brought forth and presented, he could not say; nor could he pretend to say how many of these misguided fanatics were then industriously engaged in the laudable work of manufacturing these petitions at the very moment the Senate were discussing the propriety of receiving one of them. One thing he did know, that the number of the petitions had increased; he was informed the anti-slavery societies had increased; their exertions had been doubled, and their assaults trebled, of late, upon the District of Columbia; doubtless for a good reason, in their opinion, the District may present the most assailable point, from its peculiar organization; and hence they have concentrated all their force against the District in the first instance; but his word for it, give them but ground to stand upon here, and more than half their object is accomplished, for he had formed the deliberate opinion that this movement was intended only as an entering wedge to a great and general scheme of emancipation that, if encouraged, would be prosecuted with a zeal and perseverance that merited a better cause, into all the slaveholding States; and, entertaining this opinion, he felt it to be his duty, representing the section of country from which he came, to vote against receiving the petition, in order, if possible to arrest the project in its incipient stage. He thought it was not only our duty to reject the petition, (or the prayer of the petition, for he could see little or no difference,) as the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] who introduced it, was willing to do, but he thought it should be rejected in the most decisive manner possible, that the seal of disapprobation should be put upon the measure in that stern and emphatic manner that would be best calculated to put down this mischievous project for ever.

Mr. M. said he was glad the honorable Senator from Virginia to his left [Mr. TYLER] had introduced a resolution on this subject which would not give quite so wide a field for debate. He understood that resolution presented the single constitutional point, and negatived the constitutional power in Congress to meddle in any manner whatever with the relation between slave and master in the District of Columbia. When this resolution shall be discussed, (and he hoped it would be called up and acted upon very shortly,) Mr. M. said we should then see who would be willing to march up to the sticking point boldly; who would show their hands; who would yet halt and occupy neutral ground; and from what quarter "the non-committals would come." Until a decision was had, the South could not know their true position. When the question was finally acted upon and decided, they could then claim to know that those who were not with them were against them.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said he would like to say a few words, if not encroaching on the business set apart for the day. As the remarks he wished to make were principally called for by the remarks of the Senator who had just taken his seat, he preferred making them then, but would yield to the wishes of the Senate. No objection being made, Mr. K. proceeded to remark that he thought he had made up his mind to say not one word on these memorials. He disliked to participate in that which he had condemned in others. For the reasons just given, however, and for those given by other Southern Senators who had previously offered their views briefly, it was perhaps right that he, as a Southern man, should briefly explain the views which would induce him to vote against a motion made by a Southern man as a Southern measure.

Upon the general subject, his views had been already very well expressed by others. In fact, it had been well expressed in the course of the debate, that upon the object of the memorialists, their feelings, sentiments, and opinions, and also upon the pernicious tendency of their measures, there was not, nor could be, any material difference among the members representing the Southern section of the confederacy upon that floor. Their feelings and interests were the same; and if they differed, it was only a difference as to the mode in which the question should be disposed of; a difference, simply, as to the most expedient mode of stamping with disapprobation the pernicious labors of these disorganizing agitators. Perhaps, he said, like the Senator from Alabama, he should make some exception in favor of the intentions of the particular memorialists whose petition was now under consideration.

[Here Mr. K. asked if it was not the petition alone of the Friends that was under consideration, all others having been withdrawn; and being answered in the affirmative, he proceeded.]

He hoped even these good people would come to understand that their labors, however well intended, would be attended with the same mischievous consequences that followed the effects of those who could not, in all cases, have the same charity extended to them.

But (said Mr. K.) this being among the Southern members a mere difference of form in the manner of disposing of the subject, I regret exceedingly that the Senator from Carolina has thought it his duty (as he doubtless has) to press the subject upon the consideration of the Senate in such form as not only to permit, but in some measure to create, a necessity for the continued agitation of the subject. For he believed, with others, that nothing was better calculated to increase agitation and excitement than such motions as that of the Senator from South Carolina. What was the object of the motion? Senators said, and no doubt sincerely, that their object was to quiet the agitation of the subject. Well, (said Mr. K.) my object is precisely the same. We differ, then, only in the means of securing a common end; and he could tell the Senators that the value of the motion as a means would likely be estimated by its tendency to secure the end desired. Would even an affirmative vote on the motion quiet the agitation of the subject? He thought, on the contrary, it would much increase it. How would it stop the agitation? What would be decided? Nothing, except it be that the Senate would not receive the particular memorial before it. Would that prevent the presentation of others? Not at all; it would only increase the number, by making a new issue for debate, which was all the abolitionists wanted; or, at any rate, the most they now expected.

These petitions had been coming here without intermission ever since the foundation of the Government, and he could tell the Senator that if they were each to be honored by a lengthy discussion on presentment, an honor not heretofore granted to them, they would not only continue to come here, but they would thicken upon us so long as the Government remained in existence. We may seek occasions (said Mr. K.) to rave about our rights; we may appeal to the guaranties of the constitution, which are denied; we may speak of the strength of the South, and pour out unmeasured denunciations against the North; we may threaten vengeance against the abolitionists, and menace a dissolution of the Union, and all that; and thus exhausting ourselves mentally and physically, and setting down to applaud the spirit of our own efforts, Arthur Tappan and his pious fraternity would very coolly remark: "well, that is precisely what I wanted; I wanted agitation in the South; I wished to provoke the 'aristocratic slaveholder' to make extravagant demands on the North, which the North could not consistently surrender them. I wished them, under the pretext of securing their own rights, to encroach upon the rights of all the American people. In short, I wish to change the issue; upon the present issue we are dead. Every movement, every demonstration of feeling among our own people, shows that upon the present issue the great body of the people is against us. The issue must be changed, or the prospects of abolition are at an end." This language (Mr. K. said) was not conjectured, but there was much evidence of its truth.

Sir, (said Mr. K.,) if Southern Senators were actually in the pay of the directory on Nassau street they could not more effectually co-operate in the views and administer to the wishes of these enemies to the peace and quiet of our country. And yet (said Mr. K.) we have just been charged with sacrificing Southern interests to attain a political end. [Here Mr. Moore said the Senator from Georgia had misunderstood him, and made some explanations.] Mr. K. said he had expressly understood the Senator to say that the object of the course of the administration party was to favor the pretensions of a certain Northern candidate for the presidency, but accepted the explanation.

It was a good maxim in politics as well as private life, (Mr. K. said,) never to demand too much. By making unreasonable demands, we often lost that to which we were plainly entitled. If the non-slaveholding States were willing to allow us all our rights, we should be satisfied. We should never leave an impregnable position for the doubtful prospects of a dangerous ally.

Notwithstanding what he had said, he was not prepared to say that the motive of the Senator from Carolina might not be entertained without any dangerous invasion of a constitutional right. It has been insisted that the memorialists bear no interest in the subject, and therefore are not entitled to the right of petition. We should recollect, however, that the right of petition is esteemed a very sacred one in this country; and we should make up no unnecessary issues about it. The people on these matters usually measured in the lump; they did not understand these nice constitutional distinctions and parliamentary rules, and a refusal to receive petitions on such grounds would be looked upon as an arrogant attack upon a popular right, and would be so used by the enemies of the South.

But why were we bound to refuse to receive these petitions? If he understood Senators, it was on two grounds: the first was, that the language reflected on a portion of the members. Now, (said Mr. K.,) every Southern Senator feels an equal indignation at having these memorials brought before them. But he did not know how the memorialists, in this particular case, could have presented the subject at all in more respectful language than they have employed. But he said he was already strongly committed on this point, by votes given on other occasions, since he had been in the Senate. He could not change his action until he had changed his opinion. He considered the pretensions of the Senate on this subject the most dangerous and extraordinary ever tolerated in any representative Government. The doctrine, as acted on in a few cases in the Senate, was, that we would not receive any memorial that might, in the opinion of the Senators, "reflect on the body, or any member of it." On this principle, how are the people ever to obtain reform of abuses, originating in the two Houses, or either House? Where would the principle lead to? He would not dwell upon the subject, but he would put a few plain cases, that would be well understood by Senators. We have (said Mr. K.) been in the habit of voting ourselves privileges. All exclusive privileges are justly odious to our people. They are inconsistent with the American character, and opposed to the genius of our institutions. We have voted ourselves the franking privilege, not during the session, as formerly, but in perpetuity. This privilege, it was known, was sometimes grossly abused, which would be strong argument for its total repeal. He also spoke of the purchase of books for the members, and referred to the practice of members in paying for their newspapers out of the public money, in support of which practice he had never been able to elicit any argument, except the unanswerable one of the yeas and nays. The contingent expenses of the two Houses had been also swelled in a few years to an enormous extent. There were other cases of more magnitude, which might be made the subject of complaint by the people, but he referred to them as obvious cases, that had been spoken of during the present session. Suppose, then, the people were to petition Congress to abolish the franking privilege, and state, as a reason, the enormous abuses to which it is subject. Suppose they look at the sum total of your contingent account, and, believing it impossible it could be honestly expended for any contingencies that the constitution will allow, pray Congress to look into the subject, and reform the abuse: according to this novel doctrine, any Senator might rise and move that "[t]he memorial be not received," because it "reflected on the Senate or some of its members." Sir, (said Mr. K.,) I deny the whole doctrine. I deny it in the general, and I deny it in the particular; I deny it in the gross, and I deny it in the detail. It has not one single inch of ground in the constitution to stand upon. We were sent here to do the business of the public, and not to set up arbitrary codes for the protection of our dignity, and then be left to determine what dignity means. I consider true senatorial dignity to consist in a straightforward, independent discharge of our constitutional duties, and not in searching into the language employed by our constituents, when they ask us for a redress of grievances, to see if we cannot find some pretext to commit a fraud upon the constitution. If the people thought we had done wrong, they had a right plainly to tell us so; and, if we found the charge true, we should set about a reformation. If untrue, we should reject their petitions on that account.

Mr. K. said he had spoken of this doctrine in a general point of view, and could not honor the abolitionists so far as to suffer them to provoke him to a violation of the constitution as he understood it.

In the second place, it was contended that we should not receive the petition, because to grant it would be unconstitutional. Was it not apparent that this was assuming prematurely that which we should arrive at by an examination of the subject? It had been asked—why receive the petition, if it were afterwards to be rejected? Senators had asked—what was the difference between the two modes of proceeding? He would ask, in turn, if there was no difference, why did gentlemen insist on their motion? There was a difference, however, which he thought was well understood.

To refuse to receive, denied the right of being heard. To receive, and reject the prayer of the petitioner, gave the privilege of a hearing, and the judgment of the Senate upon the subject. This petition, he said, had been read, and its object considered; but not necessarily so. The motion was perfectly in order, before reading, on a statement of the nature of the memorial by the Senator offering it, and the theory of the motion was to deny the right to a consideration. This consideration might change an opinion previously formed without it:

and should not be denied because our first impressions may be against the rights of the petitioners.

Mr. K. said that he believed, also, after some reflection upon the subject, that Congress had no constitutional power to emancipate the slaves in the District of Columbia, in the manner contemplated by the memorialists. He believed that Congress had precisely the same power over the subject in the District of Columbia that the States had in their respective limits, and he agreed perfectly with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. LEROY] that the States themselves had no power to take the slave from the owner, except for public use, and for a just compensation. He did not agree, however, with the Senator from Virginia in his construction of the proviso in the Virginia cession, as the plain import and intention of the proviso was only to negative the idea that the soil was transferred with the jurisdiction. But the aid of this proviso was not necessary to the constitutional argument, and he did not believe the Senator placed much stress upon it.

The argumentum ab inconvenienti also of the Senator from Virginia, although powerful, even irresistible, to prove the inexpediency of exercising the power, if the power were admitted, was still not sufficient, perhaps, to disprove the existence of the power itself.

It was the intention of the framers of the constitution that Congress should have a very extensive legislative power over the District. It was necessary it should have it, and it was reasonably supposed that Congress could have no dangerous temptation to abuse it. What inducement could Congress have to oppress the helpless inhabitants of the ten miles square? or, on the other hand, what dangerous inducement to heap expensive benefits on the District at the cost of their own immediate constituents? None in the world. And hence the alarming pictures drawn of the effects of emancipation in this District, and in all the forts and arsenals in the slaveholding States, whilst slavery exists in the surrounding States, had not the slightest influence upon his deliberations upon the subject. The former might be admitted, and he had not the slightest apprehension that Congress would ever exercise it so long as there was virtue and patriotism enough in the country to hold the Government together.

But, he said, without any particular distrust of Congress as the Legislature of the District of Columbia, there was a restriction upon the whole legislative power of the Union, State and federal, which denied the right to Congress to do that which was wished by the memorialists. This was a national restriction, and extended to the District of Columbia as well as to the States. This restriction was to be found in the fifth amendment, which had been referred to by others. This amendment says that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Mr. K. said he thought it might be found, as a historical fact, that this amendment owed its origin to the apprehensions of the slaveholding States on this very subject. It was well known that the constitution met with great opposition in the convention of Virginia. There some of the greatest men, and the greatest patriots of the age, used every means to defeat it. Among other things, it was objected to by Patrick Henry and others, that Congress would have power under the constitution to emancipate the slaves in the slaveholding States. In vain did the advocates of the constitution appeal to its obvious guarantees on this subject; they still believed, or affected to believe, that Congress had the power, under the general welfare doctrine so long exploded. Finding that the constitution would be adopted, against their efforts, they then showed themselves consistent, by proposing and appending to the ratification of Virginia a bill of rights and sundry amendments, containing their principal objections, and this among the rest. Some of the principles contained in the bill of rights and amendments were adopted by Congress, and others rejected; and this principle was adopted in the fifth amendment, as before read. The great object was the certain security of private rights against the arbitrary powers of legislation; and it was evident that the private rights of the slaveholder in the District of Columbia were inconsistent with the object of the memorialists. He could, to be sure, imagine a state of things in which Congress, as the only legislative power for the District as a community, might interfere with the slaveholder at the expense of the District; but the case was so remote that it scarcely deserved our consideration. If slavery were abolished every where else in the Union, and the people of the District should find it a check to their prosperity and a curse to their community, Congress might, perhaps, in reference to the good and supposed wishes of the District, tax it for the emancipation of its own slaves. The only question in such a case would be, whether emancipation was such a public use as that contemplated in the constitution. He had given no special consideration to this branch of the subject, and would detain the Senate no longer upon it. He should vote against the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, because he thought it useless and impolitic to be making up useless and unusual issues with these people, only calculated to give them importance and strength. And he should vote to reject the prayer of the petitioners, because he thought it inexpedient; and, further, that Congress had no constitutional power to grant it.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the discussion was to him entirely unexpected; and as it had interfered with the arrangement, allotting this day to private business, he felt bound to explain the motive which governed him in resisting the motion to postpone the question, in order to afford the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MOORE] an opportunity to deliver his remarks. It is known that that Senator had, several weeks since, risen to discuss this subject, so important to his constituents, but the Senate adjourned before he had finished his remarks. After so long a lapse, he felt it to be due to that Senator that he should now have an opportunity of concluding what he then intended to say. As he was known to be generally brief in his remarks, I did suppose that he would not have occupied the Senate beyond the usual time of taking up the orders; and much less did I suppose that other Senators, who were not in a similar situation, would succeed him in the discussion. Had I anticipated such a result, I would certainly have acquiesced in the postponement of the question, in order to take up the business to which the day was allotted; and in order that I may occupy as little time as possible, I will not undertake to follow the Senator from Georgia in the course of his argument. I propose to touch upon a few points only, in the hope that, after I have concluded my remarks, the question may be disposed of for the present.

I have heard (said Mr. C.) with deep mortification and regret the speech of the Senator from Georgia; not that I suppose that his arguments can have much impression in the South, but because of their tendency to divide and distract the Southern delegation on this, to us, all-momentous question. We are here but a handful in the midst of an overwhelming majority. It is the duty of every member from the South, on this great and vital question, where union is so important to those whom we represent, to avoid every thing calculated to divide or distract our ranks. I, (said Mr. C.) the Senate will bear witness, have, in all that I have said on this subject, been careful to respect the feelings of Southern members who have differed from me in the policy to be pursued. Having thus acted, on my part, I must express my surprise at the harsh expressions, to say the least, in which the Senator from Georgia has indulged.

[Mr. KING here asked that the expressions might be specified.]

Mr. C. replied that he understood the Senator to designate the demand of the question on the receiving of the petition as a mere pretext.

[Mr. KING disclaimed having done so.]

Mr. C. said that he certainly understood the Senator from Georgia as having used the expression, but was gratified that he had disclaimed it; but he could not be mistaken in saying that the Senator had represented the course which I, and other Senators who think with me, have pursued in reference to this subject, as aiding and playing into the hands of A. Tappan & Co., and calculated to produce agitation. I would ask (said Mr. C.) upon what possible authority such assertion can be made? What has been my course? Has it not been purely defensive? I am averse to Congress touching the subject of abolition, and from the beginning of the session have prescribed to myself, as a rule not to be departed from, a resistance of all attempts to bring the subject within the sphere of the action of this body. Acting on this principle, I felt myself bound (said Mr. C.) to demand the question on receiving the various petitions which have been presented, in order to shut the doors of the Senate against the admission of the wicked and fanatical agitators. Had I not a right, (said Mr. C.,) secured by the parliamentary rules of this body, to demand this question, and was I not bound to exercise it on this occasion? When the incendiaries present themselves here, in violation of the constitution, with petitions in the highest degree calumnious of the people of the South, holding them up as despots, dealers in human flesh, and pirates, was it for me, representing one of the Southern States, to be silent on such an occasion, and to endorse such slanders on my constituents, by receiving them? I certainly do not so estimate my duty. I consider it the proper occasion to exercise the right, which belongs to me as a Senator, to demand the question on the reception; for doing this I have been accused as an agitator. This is the utmost extent of my offending. But (said Mr. C.) let us inquire, if there has been agitation, who are the agitators, and who is responsible for discussion? Is it I and those who have acted with me; who have acted on the defensive; who have demanded a question which every Senator has the acknowledged right of demanding on every petition, or those who have resisted that demand? And on what ground has this demand been resisted? Can any be more extraordinary than that to refuse to receive is a violation of the constitution? What are the words of that instrument? That "Congress shall pass no law prohibiting the people from peaceably assembling and praying for a redress of grievances." Has any such law been passed? Have these agitators been prohibited from praying for a redress of grievances? Does any one pretend that such is the fact? How, then, can it be asserted that, to refuse to receive these slanderous petitions, praying the enactment of unconstitutional laws, is a violation of the constitution?

I (said Mr. C.) am gratified that the Senator from Georgia concedes the point that Congress has no power to abolish slavery in the District—a concession which atones for much which he has said. To yield the right here, is to yield the right to Congress to abolish slavery in the States. I would proclaim (said Mr. C.) to the whole South that, if the right be surrendered to abolish slavery in the District, their most effectual guard is surrendered. But I will ask the Senator from Georgia, if Congress has no right to abolish slavery in this District more than to do so in the States, upon what principle can he vote upon the reception of this petition which, he concedes, prays the Senate to pass a law in violation of the constitution? Let us change the question, to test the principle on which the Senator acts. He admits the constitutional power of Congress over the subject, whether in this District or in the States, to be the same; I ask him, then, (said Mr. C., addressing Mr. KING,) is he prepared, as a Senator from Georgia, to vote to receive a petition for the abolition of slavery in that State—a petition, too, for his principles go to that extent, couched in the most abusive and slanderous language against the State and its institutions?

All, then, (said Mr. C.,) that I can say is, that the Senator and myself are so organized as to have feelings directly dissimilar. Rather than receive such a petition against South Carolina, against those whom I represent, I would have my head dissevered from my body.

I feel (said Mr. C.) that I have transgressed upon the time of the Senate; I must postpone much that I have to say to a more suitable occasion; but so deeply am I impressed with the magnitude of the subject, that it was impossible that I could say less than I have said. No question of equal magnitude has been agitated since the formation of the Government, and, in my opinion, the only way to arrest their progress is to meet them at the threshold with a stern refusal to permit them to enter these doors. If I stand alone, I shall continue to occupy this ground, regardless of the unfounded charges of agitation. I hold this question too deep and too serious to be mixed up with the presidential or any other question of the day. I accuse no one of so mixing it, or of seeking to agitate it for party purposes; but I must say that, if there be agitators, those only are such who resist the course which I feel it my duty to pursue, and which I believe to be the only one compatible with the interests and security of the slaveholding States.

Mr. HILL now rose. I do not (said he) object to many of the positions taken by Senators on the abstract question of Northern interference with slavery in the South. But I do protest against the excitement that is attempted on the floor of Congress, to be kept up against the North. I do protest against the array that is made here of the acts of a few misguided fanatics as the acts of the whole or of a large portion of the people of the North. I do protest against the countenance that is here given to the idea that the people of the North generally are interfering with the rights and property of the people of the South.

Mr. President, the authors and movers of the abolition excitement at the North, so far as I have been able to identify them, are the same people who have so often attempted to move on other subjects of political agitation. The older ones might be traced through most of the excitements, from the Missouri excitement of 1816 down to the present time. Almost the same means have been pursued in this matter that for several years were pursued in relation to the stopping of the mails on the Sabbath during and subsequent to the late war, and to enlist the sympathies of the religious community in behalf of the "poor Indians," within the last few years. It is but the attempt of speculating, gambling politicians, to operate on the prejudices of the fanatical and the credulous; and it is done through organized societies, having the furtherance of religion for their ostensible object.

It fortunately happens, that never were the people of the North so entirely united in opinion on any exciting subject as they are on this question. The good sense of the community has utterly prostrated the fanatical party, so far as relates to any evils they can effect at home. Nine tenths of those who had for the moment been honestly deluded by the artful and the designing, have already disclaimed the connexion.

FEB. 12, 1836.]

Slavery Memorials.

[SENATE.]

The policy of the friends to the Union in the State which I have the honor here, in part, to represent, had been not to contest the ground with the zealots who had embarked in a crusade against slavery in a country where slavery did not exist. They believed that the zeal of the few fanatics would sooner tire, if left the entire field to themselves, than if a collision was kept up. With all their efforts, with thousands of dollars poured in upon us to aid them, the malcontents made but few converts. There was no danger from their operations at home. It was not until the concentrated movements of the leaders of the abolitionists at the North began to produce alarm in the South, that the people took the business of putting down the agitators seriously in hand. Opposition has made them of more consideration than they were before; the artful leaders even now invite opposition, that they may cry out against persecution, and enlist more or less of public sympathy; just as the missionaries to the Indians in Georgia sought to be imprisoned, and even refused to be released till they found there was no longer sympathy left for them.

There is no course that will better suit the few Northern fanatics, than the agitation of the question of slavery in the halls of Congress—nothing will please them better than the discussions which are taking place, and a solemn vote of either branch denying them the right to prefer petitions here, praying that slavery may be abolished in the District of Columbia. A denial of that right at once enables them, and not without color of truth, to cry out that the contest going on is “a struggle between power and liberty.”

Believing the intentions of those who have moved simultaneously to get up these petitions at this time to be mischief, I was glad to see the first petition that came in here laid on the table without discussion, and without reference to any committee. The motion to lay on the table precludes all debate; and, if decided affirmatively, prevents agitation. It was with the view of preventing agitation of this subject that I moved to lay the second set of petitions on the table. A Senator from the South [Mr. CALHOUN] has chosen a different course; he has interposed a motion which opens a debate that may be continued for months. He has chosen to agitate this question; and he has presented that question, the decision of which, let Senators vote as they may, will best please the agitators who are urging the fanatics forward.

I have said the people of the North were more united in their opposition to the plans of the advocates of anti-slavery than on any other subject. This opposition is confined to no political party; it pervades every class of the community. They deprecate all interference with the subject of slavery, because they believe such interference may involve the existence and welfare of the Union itself, and because they understand the obligations which the non-slaveholding States owe to the slaveholding States by the compact of confederation. It is the strong desire to perpetuate the Union; it is the determination which every patriotic and virtuous citizen has made, in no event to abandon the “ark of our safety,” that now impels the united North to take its stand against the agitators of the anti-slavery project. So effectually has the strong public sentiment put down that agitation in New England, that it is now kept alive only by the power of money, which the agitators have collected, and apply in the hiring of agents, and in issues from presses that are kept in their employ.

To an interior town (Canaan) in the State of New Hampshire, funds were sent to establish a school to be devoted principally to the instruction of colored persons that might be sent there from abroad; and an attempt was made to mingle these colored persons, as equals, in a community of persons exclusively white. This little community rejected with disdain a bribe of twenty thousand dollars offered them. They expostulated, and entreated those who would force a favorite scheme of the abolition society to desist: finding they could rid themselves of the nuisance in no other way, the inhabitants of the town and vicinity collected en masse; they brought with them some hundred yokes of oxen, and proceeded quietly to remove the edifice in which the colored youth were to be instructed to a place where it could not be used for that purpose. The removal of the building was justified on the ground that a large majority of those who had erected it originally for a different purpose had a right thus to dispose of their own property; and the nuisance has since been abated.

It was in the place of my residence, at the centre of the State, that the incendiary Thompson, who had been expelled from England for his crimes, first met such a reception as compelled him in a few weeks after to flee the country. He and other agitators were known to be in the vicinity; and a numerous meeting of citizens had just passed resolutions deprecating all interference on the subject of slavery in the South and in the District of Columbia. Thompson made his appearance, and notified the citizens that he would address them on the subject of slavery the next night. In the space of three hours such a spirit was roused as could not be repressed by those who desired to see the public peace preserved. The few friends of Thompson were notified that violence would be done to his person if he made his appearance. A large collection of people went to the place where he was supposed to be; he had fled, disguised, as was said, in female attire, and under the darkness of night. The people being unable to find him, had his effigy burnt in the public square, and carried out their triumph by some hundred discharges of artillery.

These two cases are but samples of the deep feeling that pervades New Hampshire, indeed, I believe I may say, the whole of New England, on the subject of the slave agitation. There are no laws that can be passed by our Legislatures which will do so much to repress the agitators as will the strong public sentiment that pervades the country. That sentiment even goes further than has been known on any other subject; it would in all cases, be sufficiently scathing to the authors of the mischief if it discovered itself in that withering scorn which few men have the brass to withstand, without proceeding to tokens of disapprobation such as the law will not warrant.

Certain it is, that the South ought to be fully satisfied with the present disposition of the North. The Senators from Virginia and South Carolina [Messrs. LEE and CALHOUN] have mentioned a clergyman of Massachusetts—“the first scholar and writer of the age”—as being the author of a disgusting and reprehensible pamphlet in favor of abolition. Are the Senators not aware that this clergyman (Mr. Channing) is the same person who wrote and delivered an address laudatory of the crowned despots of Europe at the moment they had broken down Napoleon and France, when the latter Power was the only barrier between Great Britain (then at war with us) and the United States? This production of a Massachusetts clergyman is not an indication of the sentiment even of the city of Boston on the slave question. Probably half of the efficient abolitionists in New England are to be found among a certain description of the clergy; and those clergymen much of the character of those who considered it a high offence to Heaven to pray for the success of the American arms during the war with Great Britain.

The anti-slavery movement, which brings in petitions from various parts of the country asking Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, originates with a few persons who have been in the habit of making charitable religious institutions subservient to political purposes, and who have even controlled some of those charitable associations. The petitions are set on foot by men who have had, and who continue to have, influence with ministers and religious teachers of different denominations. They have issued and sent out their circulars, calling for a united effort to press on Congress the abolition of slavery in this District. Many of the clergymen who have been instruments of the agitators have done so from no bad motive. Some of them, discovering the purpose of the agitators, discovering that their labors were calculated to make the condition of the slave worse, and to create animosity between the people of the North and the South, have paused in their course, and desisted from the further application of a mistaken philanthropy. Others, having enlisted deeply their feelings, still pursue the unprofitable labor. They present here the names of inconsiderate men and women, many of whom do not know, when they subscribe their papers, what they are asking; and others of whom, placing implicit faith in their religious teacher, are taught to believe they are thereby doing a work of disinterested benevolence, which will be requited by rewards in a future life.

It is to the esprit de corps that has been moved of late years in whole religious bodies, directing benevolence away from home to distant objects—it is to the concentration of religious effort, sometimes to useful and salutary objects, but often to objects altogether impracticable, that we may attribute the present abolition movements. These movements, I do not doubt, are spurred on, if not secretly instigated, by those who have political objects to be effected by them. Never were men more mistaken than are that portion of the clergy in the Northern States who have embarked in this undertaking. At first these clergymen were countenanced by a portion of the people who had been accustomed to be guided by their teaching; but, within the last six months, nine tenths of even these have left them; and, as in other cases of unwise and improvident projects, the leaders are left nearly destitute of followers.

Within a few days I have received through the mail and abolition pamphlet, purporting to be the "first annual report of the Maine Anti-Slavery Society, held in Brunswick, October 28, 1835." Of eighteen resolutions passed by this society, I find that fifteen were made by gentlemen wearing the title of Reverend, and only three made by laymen. A resolution moved by one clergyman declares that "all Christian churches and ministers have something to do with it," (the abolition of slavery,) "as a great moral question." A second, by another clergyman, declares that "slavery is alike inconsistent with both natural and revealed religion," and "can never be defended or excused." A third resolution, moved by another clergyman, tauntingly declares that "we have liberated as many slaves as our opponents have educated." The last resolution, passed on motion of a deacon of a church, declares the society will attempt to raise two thousand dollars for the laudable purpose of keeping up the excitement another year in that State, where slavery does not exist. The last act is a prayer offered by one of the Reverends for the "blessing of God on the efforts" of the society, which then adjourned without day!

Now, sir, as much as I abhor the doings of weak or wicked men who are moving this abolition question at the North, I yet have not as bad an opinion of them as I have of some others who are attempting to make of these puerile proceedings an object of alarm to the whole South.

Of all the vehicles, tracts, pamphlets, and newspapers, printed and circulated by the abolitionists, there is not ten or twenty of them that have contributed so much to the excitement as a single newspaper printed in this city. I need not name this paper, when I inform you that for the last five years it has been laboring to produce a Northern and a Southern party; to fan the flame of sectional prejudice; to open wider the breach, to drive harder the wedge, which shall divide the North from the South. It is the newspaper which in 1831-'2 strove to create that state of things in relation to the tariff which would produce inevitable collision between the two sections of the country, and which urged to that crisis in South Carolina, terminating in her deep disgrace—

[Mr. CALHOUN here interrupted Mr. HILL, and called him to order. Mr. H. took his seat, and Mr. HUBBARD (being in the chair) decided that the remarks of Mr. H. did not impugn the motives of any man; they were only descriptive of the effects of certain proceedings upon the State of South Carolina; and that he was not out of order.]

Mr. HILL resumed. It is the newspaper which condemns or ridicules the well-meant efforts of an officer of the Government to stop the circulation of incendiary publications in the slaveholding States, and which designedly magnifies the number and the efforts of the Northern abolitionists. It is the newspaper which libels the whole North, by representing the almost united people of that region to be insincere in their efforts to prevent the mischief of a few fanatical and misguided persons who are engaged in the abolition cause.

I have before me a copy of this newspaper, (the United States Telegraph,) filled to the brim with the exciting subject. It contains, among other things, a speech of an honorable Senator, [Mr. LEIGH, of Virginia,] which I shall not be surprised soon to learn has been issued by thousands and tens of thousands from the abolition mint at New York, for circulation in the South. Surely the honorable Senator's speech containing that part of the Channing pamphlet, is most likely to move the Southern slaves to a servile war, at the same time the Channing extracts and the speech itself are most admirably calculated to awaken the fears or arouse the indignation of their masters. The circulation of such a speech will effect the object of the abolitionists without trenching upon their funds. Let the agitation be kept up in Congress, and let this newspaper be extensively circulated in the South, filled with such speeches and such extracts as this exhibits, and little will be left for the Northern abolitionists to do. They need do no more than send in their petitions: the late printer of the Senate and his friends in Congress will create enough of excitement to effect every object of those who direct the movements of the abolitionists.

Within a few days there has been introduced into this body a hussu naturæ, an animal with two heads, in the shape of a report, laboring to prove that Congress has no right to pass laws which shall prevent the circulation, through the mail, of incendiary publications, and, at the same time, presenting a bill for the sanction of the Senate, which makes it a crime for the officers of the Post Office to suffer these publications to pass through their offices. This report, this monster, whose paternity is disavowed by a majority of the committee which creates it, comes to us in such a "questionable shape" that I will speak of it. Had it not become a habit of this body to yield much to courtesy, to certain Senators of the majority, I would say that the monster comes here entirely out of order. It is, however, so great a favorite, that while the Senate can order no more than three thousand extra copies of a message of the President of the United States, highly interesting to the people of the country at the moment, five thousand extra copies are instantly ordered of this document, disavowed and disclaimed by a majority of the committee reporting it! The printing of these five thousand copies, if Senators will circulate and frank them, will save the abolition society at New York the expense of furnishing, and those who receive them the expense of postage. A better document for the agitators could not go forth, than this same two-headed monster. If the bill should become a law before the report is circulated, the poor postmasters, through whose hands it shall pass, may consider it of little advantage to them that they are of the forty thousand "parasites of executive power," whose names are printed in the Blue Book. The chairman of the committee [Mr. CALHOUN] will find his last bill much more effectual in driving postmasters out of office than any bill he can devise to protect men in office from responsibility to the Chief Magistrate of the United States. It will look well for this body to pass a law punishing postmasters for suffering that to go through the mail, which Senators themselves introduce to be read in this body, and circulated through the country in their speeches.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has introduced a certain newspaper, published at Utica, in the State of New York, favoring the abolition cause. This newspaper he states as recommending certain candidates (Martin Van Buren and Richard M. Johnson) for President and Vice President. He did not inform us whether the newspaper was printed last month or last year; nor did he inform us that the array of presidential candidates was intended to be a most gross imposition upon the people of the South. The authors of that newspaper, I do not doubt, sent it here to be used for the precise purpose it has been used; they placed the names of Van Buren and Johnson at the head of their columns, knowing that they might injure them more effectually by seeming to be their friends than by openly opposing them. The authors and abettors of that newspaper are known, and they are known to be not less decided enemies to the candidates named than the Senator from South Carolina himself. Since the Senator has chosen to cast the reproach on the friends of the nominations of Van Buren and Johnson, of being favorable to the abolition cause—a reproach that is not less unjust than indicative of the true cause of the determination to discuss this abolition question in Congress—I will inform that Senator and the whole South, that, in the State of New Hampshire, there is not, within the compass of my knowledge, a solitary individual in favor of the nominations alluded to, who is not as decidedly opposed to the present abettors of the anti-slavery cause in New England. The primary meetings preparatory to the annual election are now being held in that State. Ever since 1829, the opposition of every name has been beaten at each election; and it so happens that, for the coming election, they have not, as yet, chosen to offer us battle; they show no symptoms, either of organization or concentration.

The Hillsborough council district, being about a fifth of the State, held its convention on the 7th day of January. This district has steadily adhered to the principles of the democratic party, through evil report and through good report, from the commencement of Jefferson's administration to the present moment. Eighty delegates, coming from nearly every township of the district, and elected by the citizens of the several towns, attended this convention. These delegates unanimously passed resolutions approving the nominations of Van Buren and Johnson, and they unanimously passed the three following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the relation of master and slave is a matter exclusively within the regulation of the States in which it exists, and that any interference by the inhabitants of other States in regard to it is not only unauthorized and intrusive, but faithless and dishonorable, as being against the letter and spirit of the sacred compact which binds us together.

"Resolved, That those who promote inflammatory discussions, and are guilty of disseminating among the slaves of the South publications the tendency of which is to excite insurrection, are regarded by us as persons prompted by the most reckless wickedness, or by an insane fanaticism fully as mischievous in its consequences.

"Resolved, That we advert with the deepest regret to the fact that some individuals of the clerical order in this State have made their pulpits the source of exciting appeals and virulent denunciations on the subject of slavery; that we consider all interference from the sacred desk, in political questions, as aside from the sphere of the duties of clergymen; and that we view those clergymen who countenance the proceedings of the abolitionists, and indulge in such appeals and denunciations, as pursuing a course hostile to our Union and to the cause of civil liberty, and contrary to the true spirit of the gospel of peace."

Stafford county convention, of more than sixty delegates from about thirty townships, on the 18th of January, unanimously passed a resolution in favor of the same candidates for President and Vice President, and the following:

"Resolved, That we have no fellowship whatever with Northern abolitionists—a set of deluded individuals, deserving rather of pity than contempt."

Grafton and Coos convention, on the 27th of January, with about the same number of delegates, approved the same nominations, and unanimously

"Resolved, That anti-slavery, as acted out by its present supporters, is fit employment only for such as have no business of their own, and wish to interfere with the affairs of their neighbors. Should its advocates expect to ride into office by practising such wild delusion, they will, ere long, discover their mistake."

Sullivan county (a part of the old Cheshire council district) on the 20th of January, by delegates from nearly every township, unanimously declares for the same presidential candidates, and passes the following preamble and resolutions:

"Whereas much excitement has prevailed in this State, in relation to the existence of slavery in the Southern portion of the Union: And whereas, in the opinion of this convention, the constitution of the United States reserves to the slaveholding States the original right to the exclusive control of the servile portion of their population: And whereas the present excitement in the Northern States, got up by fanaticism and morbid philanthropy, and based upon an ignorance of the true condition of the slave, the character of the master, and of the relative rights and duties of the several members of the confederacy, has been seized upon by wicked and corrupt men, with a view to divide the democracy of the North and South, and sever the union of the States: And whereas, in our belief, the course of the abolitionists, if persisted in, will lead to a dissolution of the confederacy and its attendant calamities, a servile and civil war: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we view every abolitionist as an enemy to his country, to the union of the States, and the integrity of the democratic party.

"Resolved, That it is the duty of the democracy to discountenance and check, by all proper means, the prosecution of the plans and schemes of the abolitionists.

"Resolved, That, if Congress possess the constitutional power, it is inexpedient to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia."

Rockingham district, by delegates from its several towns, on the 28th of January, passed the following resolution, in addition to resolutions in favor of Martin Van Buren and Richard M. Johnson:

SENATE.]

Slavery Memorials.

[FEB. 12, 1836.]

Resolved, That we view with deep concern and regret the recent exertions of a few fanatics to disturb the harmony and peace of the Union, by their unconstitutional and illegal attack upon the rights and independence of the other States, by an unjustifiable interference with their domestic institutions of 'slavery.'

At another collection of democratic citizens, friends of the administration, from fourteen different towns in another part of the State, met for the purpose of celebrating the glorious 8th of January, besides other strong indications in toasts in disapprobation of a certain abolition teacher under foreign pay, who had accompanied the renegade Thompson in his futile attempts to hold meetings, the following resolution was unanimously passed:

Resolved, That we view with the highest disapprobation the avowed principles of certain individuals of the abolition and nullification parties; that the violent doctrines of the first serve only to irritate the feelings, but not to convince the conscience, of the master, and consequently to increase the severity, but not to ameliorate the condition of the slave; that the latter party is now only sustained and held together by the fanatical proceedings of the former—both openly avowing their readiness for the dissolution of the Union, thus proving themselves to be twin sisters, and closely allied to their unholy progenitor, the infamous Hartford Convention."

Still further, Mr. President, there is a town of New Hampshire (Barnstead) which has given in both the last elections a majority of more than three hundred for electors friendly to Andrew Jackson, out of less than four hundred votes cast. That town, at a meeting of its democratic citizens on the 9th of January, passed resolutions unanimously approving of the nominations before named, and also the following:

Resolved, That those foreign emissaries and domestic fanatics who profess so much sympathy for the poor blacks, by their pathetic appeals to our brethren of the South, on the subject of slavery, are sapping the foundation of our liberty, and would gladly sever our happy Union.

Resolved, That all legal measures for the suppression of unconstitutional interference by agents or incendiary publications among Southern slaves will meet our entire approbation.

Resolved, That what we most abhor among abolitionists is their attempts to introduce the blacks into the society of whites, having even dared to admit them as fit associates and companions of our youth in schools and domestic intercourse; may all such meet the fate of the Canaan academy.

Resolved, That we despise no human being for the form of his features or the color of his skin; but, in our opinion of the African race, their intellect is too feeble, their passions too strong, and their dispositions too irritable, to encourage their immediate emancipation in this country.

Resolved, That we deplore the existence of slavery and the slave trade, yet we do not claim all the morals nor all the religion in the country; but, though the evil does not exist in our own State, we set so high a value upon our Union as to concede to the several States their constitutional rights, leaving them to manage their own internal affairs and regulate their own morals."

These resolutions (resumed Mr. HILL) are from a community of respectable and intelligent farmers, as hardy as the face of the granite hills they inhabit, as ready to take up arms in their country's defence as they are to vote down the men of any party who take ground against that country—from a community who have not sufficient contention among themselves to give support and business to a single village lawyer.

The intelligent yeomanry who passed those plain, common-sense resolutions, understand what duties the people owe to each other and to the States of this Union quite as well as those who split hairs, and carry on a labored argument, at either end of the Capitol, to prove that Congress has not a right to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia. On the one hand, a gentleman [Mr. LEIGH, of Va.] is applauded for his most conclusive speech, proving beyond a doubt that Congress cannot legislate on the subject of slavery; and, in a trice, another learned and able gentleman, [Mr. HOWE, of Mass.,] in another hall, is complimented, perhaps by the same persons, who equally admire the talents and the principles of both speakers, with having demonstrated beyond all question that Congress has a right to abolish slavery in this District! Both the gentlemen belong to a party that can agree to disagree whenever and wherever it may be necessary. The object now is to keep the ball of contention moving between the North and the South; and no other course the two gentlemen can take will so effectually encourage the abolitionists on the one side, and arouse the slaveholder on the other. The people are aroused; the seeds of disunion are sown in new ground; an inveterate sectional distrust takes deeper root; and our congressional orators obtain a high reputation with all such as would make our constitution mean anything or nothing. They are little less than "godlike" in their masterly expositions of the constitution; an instrument so plain to common sense, before they had touched it, that he who runs may read and rightly understand!

Besides the strong and unanimous expressions by public meetings of friends of the administration, I have numerous letters from New Hampshire declaring the public sentiment. One letter says:

"Abolition here is at its lowest possible ebb. Not a dog attempts to move his tongue. I can recollect no political question that has ever been before the people that has been so completely put down. All parties, classes, ages, and sexes, hold the abolitionists in the most utter contempt. I observe that it is insinuated by certain politicians in Congress, that these professions of the people of the non-slaveholding States are not sincere—that they dare not toe the mark. Now, let those gentlemen come here, and they will find a people as hostile to disturbing the slave question as the people of the slaveholding States can possibly be. Our people consider this a question about which they have nothing to do, other than as a member of the confederacy to contend that the just rights of each and every State shall be guaranteed to them; and I am of opinion that Congress have no more right to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia than they have in any of the States."

Another letter says:

"The leading feature on which the times hinge (to use one of Lord Castlereagh's metaphors) seems to be a design of the nullifiers and opposition men of all sorts to agitate the slavery question, in order to produce a sectional division on the presidential election, and, it would appear, with a design, in some of them, eventually to produce a dissolution of the Union. There is nothing that could so effectually conduce to that end as a disregard in the South of all the efforts of the friends of the country at the North to preserve in their integrity Southern rights. The attempt to excite the feelings of the South, in order to induce them to contend against and put down the democracy of the North, is so base that it cannot be spoken of except with feelings of indignation.

"The democracy of the North are strenuously contending for the rights of the South. What can so effectually discourage them in their exertions as for the South to disregard all their efforts, and not only so, but to repay them with injury and contumely? To say that a man belongs to the democratic party, and is an abolitionist, is in New Hampshire a contradiction in terms. If a person should avow himself an abolitionist, we should read him out of our political church, and turn him over to Arthur Tappan and the nullifiers. But there would be no necessity for this; for if, perchance, a person becomes tainted with abolitionism, he at once leaves the democratic party. There is no one sentiment in which our party in this State are so thoroughly united as in detestation of abolition and of the proceedings of the abolitionists. There is no exception within my knowledge."

The session of Congress two years ago will be long remembered as the panic session. We have had repeated attempts to create panics, and I consider the present efforts to create an excitement on the subject of the slave question as one of them. I do not believe the agitators of the North would here present themselves with numerous petitions for abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, if they did not feel assured that Southern men in Congress would lend their efforts to agitate the question. On the 4th of March, two years ago, while certain famed resolutions, afterwards passed by the Senate, were under debate, I called the attention of the Senate to the various excitements which had been moved for political effect, and I then made use of the following language:

"Another subject, more recently moved by the agitators, is the slave question. Accordingly, we find the agitators at the public meeting in South Carolina declaring to their followers, on public occasions, that there is a deliberate design, on the part of the people of the North, to drive the whole white population out of that country, to annihilate their property, and destroy their prosperity. The agitators of the North being, in nine cases out of ten, the same persons who have labored so zealously in the Indian agitation; these persons, reduced to almost nothing in point of numbers and influence, by the unmasking of their hypocrisy, act in perfect concert with the agitators of the South. They attempt to give color to their complaints, by calling meetings and delivering inflammatory addresses in various places; and they are attempting to operate on Congress by facsimile petitions in various parts, asking that slavery may be abolished in the District of Columbia. Of these agitators it suffices to say that, in the whole North, not one intelligent man in twenty will join their standard. The South has nothing to fear from their efforts, but in the effect they may have at a distance. These efforts are made to produce that distant effect, and they are every where formed against a general expression of scorn from the real friends of the Union."

Without intimating in the Senate, said Mr. H., that I had in view any particular individuals when these words were spoken two years ago, I claim the merit of having then predicted precisely the course that has been taken on this abolition question. I now see in both branches of Congress an apparent desire to magnify this subject, to keep the ball of contention in motion. From what quarter this intention comes, let the records of Congress speak.

The book of Doctor Channing has been introduced into the Senate. If the Doctor had written his book for gain, he could desire nothing better than this—he will now sell ten books where he would not otherwise have sold one. In my mind it is a doubtful question, whether it be more reprehensible to write such a book or to read it in the Senate of the United States. The Doctor's motive might have been good in the one case, and the Senator's motive might have been praiseworthy in the other. I confess I was shocked at the infatuation or the folly which would prompt any man to deliberately write what was here read; and if the direct effect of reading those extracts was to spread before the people of the South doctrines the most odious and disgusting; if the effect of spreading the nauseous paragraphs in that region be to excite the colored population to mutiny and murder; if the effect be to fan higher the flame of disunion, let those only be responsible on whom the blame lies. Doctor Channing's book is condemned by nineteen in every twenty intelligent citizens of the North, as is the agitation of the slavery question in Congress.

The present agitation in the North is kept up by the application of money; it is a state of things altogether forced. Agents are hired, disguised in the character of ministers of the gospel, to preach abolition of slavery where slavery does not exist; and presses are kept in constant employment to scatter abolition publications through the country. Deny the right of petition to the misguided men and women who are induced from no bad motive to petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and you do more to increase their numbers than will thousands of dollars paid to the emissaries who traverse the country to distribute abolition tracts and to spread abolition doctrines. Continue to debate abolition in either branch of Congress, and you more effectually subserve the incendiary views of the movers of abolition than any thing they can do for themselves. It may suit those who have been disappointed in all their political projects, to try what this subject of abolition will now avail them. Such men will be likely to find, in the end, that the people have too strong attachment for that happy Union, to which we owe all our prosperity and happiness, to be thrown from their propriety at every agitating blast which may be blown across the land.

Mr. CALHOUN said the Senator from New Hampshire could not expect him to reply to him. That Senator had availed himself of the position he occupied on that floor to indulge very freely in assailing the motives of others. He was persuaded that no Senator who had any respect for himself would stoop to notice any thing of this character which had fallen from him. For himself, he would as soon condescend to notice the mendacious and filthy columns of the Globe, as to notice the general remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire. That Senator had, however, stated what purported to be a fact, that the abolition excitement in New Hampshire was entirely extinct. But here was a statement of facts in relation to what that gentleman said of the abolition question in New Hampshire. It was found in a publication coming from one of the incendiary publications in that State, and he would lay it before the Senate, in order that it might judge for itself. He would not institute a comparison between the relative degree of veracity in the statement contained in this paper and the one made by the Senator from New Hampshire. He would lay the paper before the Senate, in order that it might judge of the truth as to the abolition spirit in New Hampshire. It was a paper that had been sent to him through the mail, but he did not know from what quarter it came.

[Mr. C. here handed to the Secretary a newspaper containing an article impugning a statement made by Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, in the House of Representatives, as to the number of abolitionists in his State, with severe strictures on the state of slavery in the South; said article stating that a great number of petitions in favor of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would be forwarded to Congress from New Hampshire.]

The paper having been read,

Mr. HILL inquired the title of it.

[The SECRETARY answered, "The Herald of Freedom," published at Concord, New Hampshire.]

Mr. H. said he was aware that such a paper was there printed, and it was upon the sufferance of an enlightened community, who adopted and practised the doctrine of Mr. Jefferson, that "error of opinion may be tolerated, where reason is left free to combat it." This paper was there printed, but it could not be said to be there circulated; those engaged in it were ashamed to circulate it in its own neighborhood. It was especially intended for a foreign market, and was supported from foreign funds and from distant contributions; whether derived from South Carolina or from some other quarter, others knew better than he did. A friend who had been grossly abused in the same paper (said Mr. H.) had sent him a single number, not that which had just been read by the Secretary, as requested by the Senator from South Carolina, and this was the only number of the Herald he had seen at Washington. This number contained a speech of the same honorable Senator on the subject of abolition, which was published without comment, and was evidence that such speeches were the best matter for abolitionists. He thought the Senate was well employed listening to the reading of disgusting extracts here, for the purpose of impugning the statements of a member of the House of Representatives, who could not be present to defend himself. That Representative [Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire] was capable of defending himself in this or any other theatre, even against the Senator from South Carolina, who has caused the disgusting exhibition of reading the extracts.

The petitions spoken of in that paper do not correctly represent the state of public feeling in New Hampshire. They were, so far as he had information, signed in most instances by women and children, many of whom were utterly ignorant of the intent of sending them here. No petition from that State had been yet presented. When they are presented, it may be in better time to magnify their importance. The Senator from South Carolina seems anxious to make the number large; in this anxiety he but verifies what he (Mr. H.) had stated to be the object of keeping up the excitement on the floor of Congress.

Mr. H. said he had nothing to say as to the standing of the Senator from South Carolina on this floor; he believed each and every Senator stood here on the ground of perfect equality. The taunting remark of the Senator relative to himself, applied not to him, but to his constituents, to the freemen who sent him here, and who were not to be disparaged for intelligence and patriotism by any invidious comparison with the constituents of the Senator from South Carolina. One thing he would say, and that was, that great as were the disgust and contempt felt by the Senator from South Carolina for him, they could not exceed the contempt and disgust felt for that Senator in the State of New Hampshire and in all the North.

Mr. HUBBARD (who was in the chair) asked the indulgence of the Senate to submit a few remarks. He felt as if an apology was due from him to the Senate, for not having checked the reading of the paragraphs from the newspaper which had just been read by the Secretary. He was wholly ignorant of the contents of the paper, and could not have anticipated the purport of the article which the Senator from South Carolina had requested the Secretary to read. He understood the Senator to say that he wished the paper to be read, to show that the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire, as to the feelings and sentiments of the people of that State upon the subject of the abolition of slavery, were not correct. It certainly would have been out of order for any Senator to have alluded to the remarks made by a member of the House of Representatives in debate; and, in his judgment, it was equally out of order to permit paragraphs from a newspaper to be read in the Senate, which went to impugn the course of any member of the other House; and he should not have permitted the paper to have been read, without the direction of the Senate, if he had been aware of the character of the article.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was entitled to the floor, and objected to being interrupted by the Chair.

[Mr. HUBBARD replied, he had said all he wished to say. The Senator was entitled to the floor, and could proceed if he wished.]

Mr. CALHOUN continued. He knew nothing of the paper just presented. He had seen it for the first time that morning, and had presented it to the Senate for no other purpose than to show from another quarter the state of the abolition spirit in New Hampshire. He knew the gentleman [Mr. PIERCE] who was assailed in that paper, and was ready to bear testimony to his worth and high standing. He meant no disrespect to him. He had presented the paper because it was important that the real state of things should be known. It was due from gentleman of the North to those of the South, to give correct information. He did not call those friends of the South who would disguise the state of things at the North. He believed as yet that the real number of abolitionists was small; but he also believed that the number of those who contemplated ultimate abolition was very great; and that those ardent addresses in favor of liberty, so constantly made at the North, must have a deep effect on the young and rising generation. The spirit of abolition was not to be trifled with. It had had its bad effect on one of the most powerful Governments of Europe, and ended disastrously to its colonial possessions. It was commencing in the same manner here, and must be met at once with the most decided resistance. He repeated that he had the greatest respect for the member from New Hampshire mentioned in the paper just read; and he took pleasure in bearing testimony to his high standing and moral worth. He had only presented the paper to show the state of things in New Hampshire, and that the Senate might judge whether the abolition spirit was subsiding there.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he did not rise to enter into the debate at present. He wished merely to advert to a mistake, which seemed to be almost universal, in regard to the motion which he had made. He had not moved to reject this petition. His motion was to reject the prayer of the memorialists, and thus to decide promptly that slavery ought not to be abolished within the District of Columbia. He had made the strongest motion he could make, consistently with the right of petition, and the respect due to these petitioners. He might have moved a reference of the memorial to a committee; but he was prepared, at once, and without any report from a committee, to vote for rejecting the prayer of the petitioners. He believed that the Senate had not the power to refuse to receive the petition. He would, some time in the course of this debate, express his opinion at some length on this subject.

Mr. BENTON rose to say a word on the subject of Mr. PIERCE, the member of the House of Representatives from New Hampshire, whose statements in the House of Representatives had been contradicted in the newspaper article read at the Secretary's table. He had the pleasure of an intimate acquaintance with that gentleman, and the highest respect for him, both on his account and that of his venerable and patriotic father, who was lately Governor of New Hampshire. It had so happened (Mr. B. said) that in the very moment of the reading of this article, the member of the House of Representatives, whose statement it did contradict, was coming into the Senate chamber, and his whitening countenance showed the deep emotion excited in his bosom. The statement which that gentleman had made in the House was in the highest degree consolatory and agreeable to the people of the slaveholding States. He had said that not one in five hundred in his State was in favor of the abolitionists; an expression understood by every body, not as an arithmetical proposition worked out by figures, but as a strong mode of declaring that these abolitionists were few in number. In that sense it was understood, and was a most welcome and agreeable piece of information to the people of the slaveholding States. The newspaper article contradicts him, and vaunts the number of the abolitionists, and the numerous signers to their petition. Now (said Mr. B.) the member of the House of Representatives [Mr. PIERCE] has this moment informed me that he knows nothing of these petitions, and knows nothing to change his opinion as to the small number of abolitionists in his State. Mr. B. thought, therefore, that his statement ought not to be considered as discredited by the newspaper publication; and he, for one, should still give faith to his opinion.

Mr. B. then took up the bill reported by the select committee on incendiary publications, and read the section which forbade their transmission by mail, and subjected the postmasters to fine and loss of office, who would put them up for transmission; and wished to know whether this incendiary publication, which had been read at the Secretary's table, would be included in the prohibition, after being so read, and thus becoming a part of our debates? As a publication in New Hampshire, it was clearly forbid; as part of our congressional proceedings would it still be forbid? There was a difficulty in this, he said, take it either way. If it could still be inculcated from this floor, then the prohibition in the bill was mere child's play; if it could not, and all the city papers which contained it were to be stopped, then the other congressional proceedings in the same paper would be stopped also, and thus the people would be prevented from knowing what their representatives were doing. It seemed to him to be but lame work to stop incendiary publications in the villages where they were printed, and then to circulate them from this chamber among the proceedings of Congress; and that, issuing from this centre, and spreading to all the points of the circumference of this extended Union, one reading here would give it ten thousand times more notoriety and diffusion than the printing of it in the village could do. He concluded with expressing his wish that the reporters would not copy into their account of the debate the paper that was read. It was too offensive to the member of the House, [Mr. PIERCE,] and would be too disagreeable to the people of the slaveholding States, to be entitled to a place in our debates, and to become a part of our congressional history, to be diffused over the country in the gazettes, and transmitted to posterity in the volumes of debates. He hoped they would all omit it.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, it was ordered that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

ADMISSION ON THE FLOOR OF THE SENATE.

The resolution laid on the table some time ago by Mr. LINN, to add certain public officers to the individuals privileged to come on the Senate floor, was amended by adding to the list the names of the assistant Postmasters General, the mayors of the cities of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved to add, "and those also who have been Governors of States;" which was negatived.

The resolution was then agreed to.

VOL. XII—32

DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. SOUTHARD, was taken up:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be collected, arranged, and printed, the documents connected with the cession of the District of Columbia to the United States, the purchase of the lands therein, by the Government, from the original proprietors; the adoption and execution of the plan of the city of Washington, and the erection of the public buildings therein; the laws passed by Congress in relation to said District; and all such papers of a public character as relate to the connexion of said District with the Government of the United States."

Mr. SOUTHARD spoke of the great importance of having those laws and documents comprised in one book, as matter of convenient reference, and for the information of the Senate, and of the great difficulty and inconvenience in finding them when they were wanted. He could not tell the amount of the expense the printing and compilation of the book would incur.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, opposed the resolution on the ground that it would impose upon the Secretary of the Senate a very great burden, which was not strictly within the line of his duty. He knew of no obligation resting on that officer to compile and superintend the printing of such a work. They had no reasonable idea or data of the expense of the publication. He did not like this legislating in the lump. It was an unusual mode of legislation. There was a provision of the constitution, that no money should be drawn from the treasury except by law. If this mode of taking money from the treasury was adopted, they might as well blot out that part of the constitution; or if it would be more likely to arouse the attention of his honorable friend from Missouri, [turning to Mr. BENTON,] he would use the term "expunged." He adverted to the facility of obtaining the information embraced in these documents, by applying at the different offices in the Capitol. He moved that it be referred to a committee, who could report whether such a publication was necessary, and, if so, the probable expense.

Mr. SOUTHARD believed that committee did not know what documents were wanted. He presumed there were not three Senators in that body who knew what documents were wanted. It was to him most unaccountable, that Congress should be the sole Legislature of the District of Columbia, without having a compilation of the laws relating to it. These acts were small in number, but were scattered over the acts of Congress for many years. At the last session, some of the acts could only be found among the secret files of the Government. They were solemnly bound to know the relation in which these acts placed them towards the District. He spoke of a book containing a code of laws which the Senator from Missouri thought worthy of a place among the laws of the District. He (Mr. S.) wanted these laws for his own information, as well as for the information of the people. They ought not to pass laws as despots and tyrants. Three, four, or five thousand dollars, with an overflowing treasury, was no objection, compared with the importance of the object. If it were some favorite document from the Executive, there would be no difficulty in getting it printed. The object he had in view was what he had stated, and no other. He had no objection to the alteration of the resolution in point of form. He did not stand on matters of form.

It was not his intention, in offering the resolution, to compel the Secretary of the Senate to attend to it in person. The words in the resolution were, that he should cause it to be done. A duty had been imposed on him in another case, which would measurably qualify him for this. He had designated the Secretary of the Senate, because he believed that gentleman had the intelligence and the economy, with his knowledge of the subject, to secure to them the publication of the work in a style that would make it useful and valuable. Any calculation as to the expense must be uncertain. The country ought to have that document in its hands. This was the residence of the Government, and many of these documents were the acts of General Washington, and could not now be found in print.

Mr. WRIGHT enumerated various documents that would be embraced by the resolution, and among others the reports from committees in relation to the District of Columbia, many of which would be useless at this time, and it was the same way with many of the laws. He thought the resolution ought to go to the committee, to report such only as were useful to Congress.

Mr. BLACK would cheerfully vote for the resolution if he could see the benefit of it. He would ask if the resolution did not embrace reports made and bills reported that had never been passed into laws; and if so, whether any estimate has been made of the number of volumes it would make. He remembered they got into a difficulty a year or two ago in ordering printing in a case similar to this, which had been swelled to some one hundred and fifty volumes. Under this resolution he should consider laws, merely drawn up and never passed, were to form a part of the work, and there was no estimating what it would cost. That would rest entirely on whoever superintended it. He knew of no such projects in the several States. He was entirely opposed to this whole project. He thought the lesson they had received about two years since in printing documents, was enough to put them on their guard.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, then moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with instructions to ascertain and report the documents that would be required under the resolution to be printed, and the probable expense of executing the resolution. He was himself inclined to believe that the printing required to be done by the resolution would exceed twenty volumes as it was.

Mr. BENTON spoke against these resolutions for printing, by which tens and hundreds of thousands went out of the treasury, without any appropriation made by law, but by mere resolutions, read once and passed, and then charged upon the contingent fund. He specified many instances, and objected to these resolutions as being against the positive rules of the Senate, which he read, and which required the resolutions which took money out of the contingent fund to undergo all the forms of a bill; to be introduced on notice and leave; to be read three times, &c., and clearly discriminated them from the mere motions to do the current business of the Senate. These responsibilities (said Mr. B.) have heretofore been attached to our opponents, but we are so near a majority now that some responsibility begins to attach to us.

Mr. SOUTHWARD meant to pursue this subject till the Senate would say, by a direct vote, that they either would or would not sanction the publication. He was disposed to adopt the course suggested by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. KING.]

He had had no idea he was offering a resolution of such magnitude, in which was involved hundreds of thousands of dollars, capitulations at midnight, and the labor of the Secretary of the Senate. He hoped the Secretary would survive it. His sympathies were aroused for our poor Secretary. But, seriously, if he (the Secretary) had to cause this printing to be done, very little labor would devolve on him. The expense of printing the documents comprising a history of all the old States of the confederacy had been referred to. He thought the printing of the documents relating to this little ten miles square would hardly be confounded with that work. Did not the imagination of Senators carry them beyond the true state of the case? He had no idea when he offered this simple resolution that it would have engendered a discussion about squandering millions of the money of the country. If the committee had made an inquiry on the subject, and embraced these documents in their report, and asked the printing of them as a part of their report, it would then have become perfectly legal, and the objections to its legality would be entirely removed. The responsibility did not rest on the one side or the other of the Senate; it rested on all. He hoped the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. KING] would prevail.

Mr. KING'S amendment was then agreed to.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Senate proceeded to consider the petition from the Society of Friends in Pennsylvania, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he was one of those who believed that all discussion on this exciting subject was ill-judged as well as ill-timed. Under other circumstances, he would be the last to take part in it. But, said he, from the shape in which the question is now presented, and from the manner in which it is pressed upon our consideration, I am unwilling to record my vote without a brief explanation of the views which govern me.

I regret, Mr. President, the necessity of the discussion, because its natural tendency is to increase the agitation. The interests of the whole country require that it should cease. Excitement is the food on which abolition feeds: take this away, and it will die for want of sustenance. No one can view with more sincere regret nor with greater repugnance than I do the attempts of the abolitionists to disturb the peace and quiet of the country. Their efforts, however well intended on the part of some, are fraught with mischief, and on the part of others are characterized by a spirit of fanaticism which, if persisted in, may lead to consequences the most fatal to the peace and harmony of the Union. This spirit seems to be a part of the ultraism of the age; it is the same spirit that has shown itself in various excitements, which have, more or less, agitated the country within a few years past. I would by no means deny to many engaged in this ultraism of the day, honesty of purpose in the prosecution of their designs. There are others to whom I would not extend even this charity. But be their purposes what they may, they are equally productive of the most mischievous and injurious consequences. Their efforts, instead of alleviating the condition of the slave, tend to make it worse. The owners, feeling that their rights are invaded by these nefarious attempts to incite the slave to bloodshed and to murder, throw around them greater securities, and limit their indulgences within narrower bounds, than they were before accustomed to do. I do not say that it is the design of the great body of the abolitionists to excite the slaves to rebellion, and thereby produce all the horrors of a civil and servile war. But the tendency of their measures is to such results. And I have known instances where these awful consequences have been depicted; and the abolitionist has been asked if he could look upon them with composure, and without emotion, when he has answered, that he was pursuing what he believed his duty, and he left the consequences to God! Who can listen, without horror, to such foregone conclusions? What philanthropist can wish to see the blood of the master and the slave commingled in these desperate feuds? What patriot can wish to see the peace of the Union disturbed by the invasion of rights secured by the constitution, and which should be held inviolate as long as that sacred instrument stands?

In the hasty view which I have taken of this matter, I believe I speak the almost unanimous opinions of the North; I feel very sure that I do not mistake the public sentiment of the State of New York on this subject. And it is for the interests of the North, as well as the South, that these agitations should cease. It is to me a matter of deep regret that these petitions should be sent here. They have been sent, more or less, for years past. Congress has received them, but always refused any action upon them. They have either been laid on the table, or referred to a committee, and there been suffered to sleep, never again to be disturbed. There has been, heretofore, an almost entire unanimity in Congress in relation to them. Scarcely an individual in either House could be found who was willing, by agitating this question, to disturb the compromises of the constitution. After this course had been pursued for a series of years, it was to have been hoped that Congress would no longer be troubled with such unprofitable applications. In this, those who entertained this hope have been disappointed. The attack has been renewed, the petitions are again presented, and the question recurs, what shall be done with them? This brings us to the immediate subject of debate. The petition under consideration is from the Society of Friends. I take great pleasure in saying that this peaceable and quiet people are not abolitionists, in the modern acceptance of the term. An opposition to slavery is one of the principles of their society, and they have, from almost time immemorial, been in the habit of bearing their annual testimony against it. I am persuaded, from an intimate acquaintance with many of them, that they would deprecate any results, such as every man, conversant with the subject, believes would follow from the interference of Congress with it. They seem content to bear their testimony against slavery by presenting their petition here. They seem to look upon it as a religious duty. Having, in this way, discharged that duty, they leave to Congress to discharge its duty, in such manner as in its wisdom shall seem meet and proper. The language of this petition, it is conceded on all hands, is unexceptionable. There can be no objection, therefore, to receiving it on that account.

What, then, is the question which we are called upon to decide? It is, shall the petition be received? I regret that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has felt it his duty to make this motion. It were much better, in my judgment, that the petition should take the ordinary course; the course which has heretofore been pursued with them. The petition, however, has been presented; the motion has been made, and it becomes our duty to consider it. Although I regret the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, and think it unwise and ill-judged, still I most cheerfully accord to him, what I claim for myself in all my action here, purity of motive and honesty of purpose. At the same time, I cannot persuade myself that he has given to this subject that careful examination and reflection which its importance demands. It shall be my task, then, to examine the principle of the question before us. It involves two important considerations, namely: the right of the citizen to petition, and the obligation on Congress to receive his petition. To my mind the right and the obligation are correlative.

As to the right of petition. This has been deemed the inalienable right of every American citizen. Before the adoption of the constitution, he held it as a birth-right from his English ancestors. Like the right of personal liberty, the right of personal security, and the right of private property, he has been in the habit of looking on the right of petition as an inherent and inalienable right. Centuries have elapsed since this right was first asserted as one of the privileges of English freemen. The contest was long and bloody between the prerogatives of the Crown and the immunities of the subject. These rights, which were deemed natural, inherent, and inalienable, were asserted and reasserted, affirmed and reaffirmed, by various statutes in different reigns, and were finally embodied with the right of petition, in the far-famed "Declaration of Rights," which ended the dynasty of the Stuarts, and consummated the glorious revolution of 1688. By this it was established that every person had the right to petition the King or the Parliament for a redress of grievances; a right, not conferred, but confirmed, at that eventful period, and which has continued to the present day, unquestioned and unquestionable.

The Americans, as colonists of Great Britain, were entitled to these rights and privileges, and exercised them with that fearless independence that became the descendants of Englishmen. Many of the colonies at a very early day asserted them, by the most solemn legislative declarations; subsequently, but as early as 1765, "a convention of delegates from nine of the colonies assembled at New York, and made and published a declaration of rights, in which they insisted that the people of the colonies were entitled to all the inherent rights and liberties of English subjects."

But these rights and privileges were more solemnly established by the first continental Congress in 1774. This Congress adopted a declaration of rights, as their English ancestors had done before them, for the purpose of "asserting and vindicating their rights and liberties." They declared, amongst other things, "That the inhabitants of the English colonies in North America, by the immutable laws of nature, the principles of the English constitution, and the several charters or compacts, have the following rights:

"That they are entitled to life, liberty, and property; and they have never ceded to any sovereign power whatever a right to dispose of either without their consent.

"That our ancestors, who first settled these colonies, were, at the time of their emigration from the mother country, entitled to all the rights, liberties, and immunities, of free and natural born subjects within the realm of England.

"That by such emigration they by no means forfeited, surrendered, or lost, any of those rights, but that they were, and their descendants now are, entitled to the exercise and enjoyment of all such of them as their local and other circumstances enable them to exercise and enjoy.

"That they have a right peaceably to assemble, consider of their grievances, and petition the King; and that all prosecutions, prohibitory proclamations, and commitments for the same, are illegal.

"All and each of which the aforesaid deputation, in behalf of themselves and their constituents, do claim, demand, and insist on, as their indubitable rights and liberties, which cannot be legally taken from them, altered, or abridged, by any power whatever, without their own consent, by their representatives in their several Legislatures."

I have selected from this declaration some of the "great and fundamental principles of American liberty," so far as they are applicable to the question under consideration. It will be perceived that the right of petition is ranked with the right of life, liberty, and property—neither of which can be taken away, altered, or abridged, without consent, by any power whatever. The declaration of rights, in the reign of James II, which led to the Revolution of 1688, was but the prototype of the declaration of rights by the continental Congress, which resulted in the Revolution of 1776.

After the declaration of independence, and when the people of the several States began to adopt constitutions for their own separate government, this declaration of the old Congress formed the basis of the bills of rights which were adopted by most of the States. In this way the people of the respective States became entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, which they enjoyed at the time of the continental Congress in 1774, when they were thus solemnly promulgated to the world, and continued to enjoy them to the time of the adoption of the constitution of the United States, and the organization of the Government under it in 1789. One of these rights and privileges, as we have seen, was the right of petition. Has it been taken away, altered, or abridged, by the adoption of the constitution? No, sir; so far from it that it would be deemed one of the fundamental principles of a republican Government, and to result from the very nature of our institutions. This would seem to follow, even if we could find no traces of this right during our revolutionary struggle. But when it is seen in every step of our progress, from colonial infancy to revolutionary manhood, and until the final establishment of our independence as a nation, who can doubt its existence at this time, and who can doubt the propriety of its exercise by every citizen of this republic?

So well was the right of petition understood by the people of the several States, and that it was a right which no power under heaven could take from them, that it never entered into the thoughts of those wise and pure patriots who formed the constitution to provide for it in that sacred instrument. These men were familiar with our colonial history. Many of them, probably most of them, had assisted, in some mode or other, either in the old Congress or in their respective States, to declare, in a solemn manner, those rights and privileges as belonging to every citizen, and which could not be taken from him. Well might they suppose, then, that there was no necessity for protecting such a right in the constitution. No one dreamed that it could ever be infringed upon, and no provision was made in relation to it. But the people were jealous of their rights. The union of independent sovereignties, for certain purposes, in one general Government, was, at best, an experiment; and the wisest could not foresee the extent of power which might be attempted to be exercised. Many objections were made by different States to the ratification of the constitution of the United States; and so scrupulous were many of them that they would not simply ratify, but they accompanied their ratification by a declaration, or bill of rights, with which the constitution could not interfere, and also with certain proposed amendments, expressing the hope that the necessary measures would be forthwith taken, under the constitution, to have them adopted. The convention of the State of New York set forth the rights of the citizens at large, and with great particularity. Amongst others was the right to life, liberty, and property; and "that the people have a right peaceably to assemble together to consult for their common good, or to instruct their representatives; and that every person has the right to petition or apply to the Legislature for redress of grievances." The convention of New York also proposed many amendments to the constitution; and "declaring that the rights aforesaid (the right to petition, &c.) cannot be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid are consistent with the constitution, and in confidence that the amendment which shall have been proposed to the said constitution will receive an early and mature consideration," did assent to and ratify the said constitution. This convention sat at Poughkeepsie, the place of my present residence, and was composed of some of the most distinguished men of that or any other age—men who, in the cabinet or in the field, would not suffer in comparison with the sages and heroes of ancient or modern times; and I should feel that I was doing injustice, both to the place and to their memories, were I to pass over in silence so much assembled talent and wisdom; and if I did not attempt to maintain, at this time and on this occasion, a principle which they deemed of such vital importance to every American citizen. The constitution was thus ratified by the people of the several States, with these declarations of rights as a kind of condition or as part of the ratification.

What was the next step in putting into operation the new Government, and guarding the rights of a people jealous of their liberties? At the first session of the first Congress, in conformity to the wishes of the people, as expressed by their several conventions, Mr. Madison introduced certain propositions by way of amendments to the constitution. No one understood better than he what the constitution meant, what powers were granted by it to the general Government, and what rights were reserved to the people. He was aware of the jealousy that existed against it, and, on introducing his amendments, he said, "there is a great number of our constituents who are dissatisfied with it; among whom are many respectable for their talents and patriotism, and respectable for the jealousy they have for their liberty, which, though mistaken in its object, is laudable in its motive." He did not deem these amendments as essential in themselves; most of them being merely declaratory of the rights of the people, as they existed without them; but, said he, it would be "highly politic for the tranquillity of the public mind, and the stability of the Government, that we should offer something in the form I have proposed, to be incorporated in the system of Government, as a declaration of the rights of the people." Let it be remembered that Mr. Madison's propositions, as introduced, were the same in substance, and almost the same in language, with the amendments which were adopted, and which now form part of the constitution. Neither Mr. Madison, nor the convention of New York, supposed that an amendment, in regard to the right of petition, was necessary to grant to the people any new right, but merely to remove the jealousies against the new Government, by declaring, in that shape, a right which equally existed without such declaration. It is a remarkable fact, that so entirely were most of these amendments deemed mere declarations of rights, and not as granting any rights to the people which they did not already possess, but rather affirming and guaranteeing those with which they had never parted, that Mr. Madison incorporated the most of them from the declaration of rights by the New York convention, which accompanied the ratification of the constitution, and said, at the time of introducing them, that he offered them "as the declaration of the rights of the people."

What, then, is the amendment of the constitution in relation to the right of petition? It is this: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances;" or, divested of other matter, "Congress shall make no law abridging the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." Such is the amendment, and such its history; from all which it most clearly appears that the right of petition belonged to the people at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and which could not be "abridged or violated;" that the amendment gave no new right, but was a mere declaration or recognition of a right which existed equally without it.

As to the obligation on Congress to receive the petition. What is that obligation? If it has been shown that the citizen has the right to petition, and which, I apprehend, cannot be doubted, then it follows that an obligation rests on Congress to receive such petition; for it is in vain to grant the right on the one hand, without incurring the obligation on the other: it being always understood that the petition be couched in respectful language towards the body to which it is presented, otherwise it would be rejected on the principle of self-preservation and self-protection which belongs to every legislative body.

It is objected, however, that not to receive the petition does not contravene that provision of the constitution which says, "Congress shall make no law abridging the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." To reject the petition, says the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] is not to make a law abridging the right, &c. But let me ask, let me put it to the candor and common sense of every man who hears me to say, wherein consists the difference between refusing to receive the petition, or making a law by which the citizen is prohibited from presenting it? Let any one point out the distinction—show me its practical operation. In both cases the right of petition is equally denied; and it matters little to the citizens by what means you have arrived at such a result. It is in vain to tell them you have made no law prohibiting the people from assembling and petitioning the Government for a redress of grievances, if, when their petition is presented, you refuse to receive it. I have already shown that the right of petition existed prior to the constitution, that it was parted with on its adoption, that it was perfect without any amendment of the constitution, and that such amendment was merely for greater caution and to satisfy the jealousy of the people, and was considered as a mere declaration of an existing right. The language of the amendment is the language of prohibition to Congress, and not the granting of a right; because Congress had no power to grant it. The people had never parted with it, but merely, in this way, prohibited Congress from interfering with a right which already existed. There was no necessity of such a prohibition. If this amendment had never been adopted, there is no doubt of the perfect right of the citizen to petition, and the duty of Congress to receive his petition. How, then, can the amendment, which was intended, not to make the right more perfect, but more secure, be interposed to defeat if not to destroy it? How can we say to the citizen, true, you have a right to petition, and Congress cannot abridge that right; but inasmuch as we have made no law prohibiting its exercise, we have the right to refuse to receive your petition? The result is the same in either case. It is a denial of the right. And however much such reasoning may accord with the metaphysics of those who advance it, the practical common sense of the whole nation will reject it.

If Congress should pass a law that petitions on the subject of slavery should not be received, it is manifest that, under such a law, such a petition as the one now under consideration would be rejected. But all will agree such a law would be unconstitutional, because Congress is prohibited from making it; and Congress was so prohibited, because it was the right of the citizen, with which no power could interfere, but with his consent. Would it not, then, be equally unconstitutional to reject the petition, when there is no law on the subject? In short, if it be the constitutional right of the citizen to petition, it is equally the duty of Congress to receive his petition.

But it is said by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] they must petition for a redress of grievances; and that they are not aggrieved by the existence of slavery in the District of Columbia, and therefore have no right to petition. I will not stop to inquire how far a citizen of one of the States of this Union may be interested in what he deems the prosperity of this District; nor how that prosperity may be best promoted; nor how far the condition of the inhabitants of this District may have a moral influence on the whole Union; but I will test the matter of grievances in another way. Grievances, so far as the right of petition is concerned, are to be judged of by the petitioner himself. No power can prescribe rules by which he is to judge of them, and to which his petition must conform. You cannot lay him on the bed of Procrustes, and stretch out or lop off his views, in order to conform them to your standard. He must have his own standard, and with which no one must interfere, else his petition is not for the redress of those grievances which he feels. His grievances may be imaginary, or they may be real. In either case, the right of petition is the same; though they may seem to others to be imaginary, still to the petitioner they appear real. Of this he must be the sole judge, so far as the right to ask redress is concerned; but, so far as redress ought to be granted, that is to be judged of by those to whom the petition is addressed. They have the sole power of determining whether his grievances are real, and such as ought to be redressed. As they cannot lay down to him the rules by which he is to be governed in asking, so neither can he prescribe to them regulations by which the redress is to be granted. If the right of citizens be not such as I have described them, where is the propriety of permitting them peaceably to assemble and consult of their grievances, if, on such consultation they are not to be the judges of them, so far as the right to petition for redress is concerned? The right to petition is a right which exists at the time of making the petition, and before it is presented. If the right existed before it is presented, then Congress cannot refuse to receive it when it is presented. After it is received, then the petitioner can no longer determine as to his grievances, which may have been imaginary, but Congress is left to judge whether they are real. If not, they will reject his prayer, but not his petition.

Let us illustrate this right by some examples. Let us suppose that the citizens of South Carolina should petition Congress to pay off the debt of the District. Would this be a grievance, whether real or imaginary, for a redress of which they would have a right to petition? On the other hand, suppose the citizens of any State should petition Congress on this subject, by way of remonstrance against the appropriation of the funds of the Government to any such purpose. In either case, would Congress refuse to receive the petition? Certainly not. And, at the same time, it will be perceived that the grievances for which redress is asked are of a diametrically opposite character; and if the prayer of the petition be granted in the one case, it must be denied in the other.

Again, suppose some of the numerous and respectable citizens of the North, who are opposed to the abolitionists, should petition Congress not to interfere with the question of slavery in the District of Columbia; would not their petition be received? There can be no doubt of it. A petition of that character was presented, a few days since, by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] and received without objection, and ordered to be printed. But, when one is presented on the other side, we are gravely told that it is out of order, and cannot be received. Wherein consists the difference, in principle, so far as the reception of the petitions is concerned? I can see none. And this illustration also shows that the petitioners must be the sole judges of their grievances; for they are the antipodes of each other; and if their grievances are redressed in one case, they must go unredressed in the other.

It is objected, by the same Senator, that Congress has no constitutional power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and, therefore, the petition ought not to be received. This conclusion is drawn from assumed premises. I do not intend, on this occasion, to enter into the constitutional argument; I have sufficient grounds for the vote I shall give, without reference to that question. I will simply remark, in passing, that if it be seriously contended, as it seems to be, that Congress has not the power, then there are, at least, two sides to the question. It is, to say the least of it, a matter on which public opinion is divided. Shall we, then, undertake to reject petitions on this, or any other subject, where there is such a diversity of opinion as to the constitutional power of Congress to entertain them. Shall we undertake to settle, on the very threshold, on the question of receiving a petition, some of the most important powers of this Government? To what would it lead? How many cases are there, where there exists a diversity of opinion as to the constitutional power of Congress over the subject-matter? On all such subjects, would you refuse to receive petitions because, forsooth, we are unable to think alike on constitutional questions? Would not the Senator from South Carolina receive a petition for the establishment of a national bank?

I trust he would, appreciating, as he does, the importance of such an institution; and still the constitutionality of such a bank has been contested from the very organization of the Government down to the present time. Would the Senator refuse to receive a petition for a protective tariff? I take it for granted he would, on the same principle that he objects to this, namely, its unconstitutionality in his judgment; and yet the constitutionality of such a measure is deemed by many better settled than the Senator himself can possibly believe to be settled the constitutionality of a national bank. Examples might be multiplied, to any desired extent, to show the utter absurdity of the position, that a petition should not be received, when any man or set of men believe that Congress have no constitutional power to grant its prayer. The petitioner is presumed not always to be the best judge of such powers of Government. He should be presumed to pray for none other than a constitutional redress of grievances. He judges, in the first instance, as to his own grievances. Congress receives his petition, and determines, first, whether they require redress; and, second, whether it has the constitutional power to redress them; and whether it has or has not, the petitioner is to be presumed to have asked for nothing else. If he mistakes the constitutional power of Congress, it were better that his petition should be respectfully and kindly received, and the prayer rejected, because Congress has not the power to grant it. Such was the case with the petition of the society of Quakers in Pennsylvania and other States, and also with that of Benjamin Franklin, as president of the Pennsylvania Abolition Society, presented to the first Congress. They were received and duly considered, and Congress adopted the following resolution in relation to them.

"That Congress have no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them, within any of the States, it remaining with the several States alone to provide any regulations therein, which humanity and true policy may require."

These two petitions were to abolish slavery in the States; they were presented in 1790. No question was raised about this District, because the seat of Government had not yet been removed here. But, in regard to the States, there could not be a more palpable case of the want of constitutional power than those petitions presented; and yet, neither Mr. Madison, nor other distinguished men of that Congress, thought of not receiving them, although they were, each of them, from a source well capable of judging in such matters.

But I do not deem it necessary to discuss, on this occasion, the constitutional power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. I regret that the constitution is not so explicit as to put at rest all doubt on this subject. I wish the power had been expressly reserved by the States of Virginia and Maryland in their cession, so that Congress could not interfere, any further than to keep pace with those States in their legislation in relation to this matter. On the ground of expediency, aside from any constitutional power, I have no hesitation in saying that Congress ought not to interfere in any other way. If the proposition were now, for the first time, to introduce slavery into the country, I trust there would scarcely be a difference of opinion on the subject; but no such proposition is or can be presented. If slavery be an evil, as it is deemed one by a large portion of this Union, it is an evil entailed upon us; we did not bring it upon ourselves. When we assumed the rank of independent States, we found it here. It was intimately interwoven and incorporated with our institutions. When we adopted the constitution, which forms the basis of our happy Union, we recognised slavery as an existing institution in the country, and it formed one of those compromises without which we could have never presented ourselves to the world as one independent nation. Those compromises are sacred. They must not, they cannot be interfered with without a violation, not only of public faith, but of private rights. Those States where slavery exists must judge of the time and manner of abolishing it, if it be abolished. They are best capable of judging of it, and until Virginia and Maryland, which ceded this District, move in this matter, I am unwilling to take the responsibility of meddling with it contrary to their wishes, and in opposition to the people of the District itself. The efforts which are now made, in reference to this District, are deemed by the slaveholding States as mere precursors of the assaults which are intended for themselves. No sincere lover of his country can look upon them without serious apprehension of danger to the peace and quiet of those States, and to the Union itself.

Entertaining these views, I am ready to receive this petition, and equally ready to reject its prayer. By receiving it we shall discharge our duty to the very respectable persons who have sent it here, and by rejecting its prayer we shall discharge our duty to ourselves and to the country. In the former case we deny no right belonging to the citizen—in the latter we do but exercise a right belonging to ourselves. When we have received the petition, we have granted to the citizen his constitutional right. He can ask no more of us as a matter of right. Then commences our duty—a duty to consider the grievance complained of, if it be one. When our minds, from previous reflection and mature deliberation, are made up adverse to the views of the petitioners, then forthwith to reject the prayer is giving to it due consideration, and all that can be required at our hands. The object of referring petitions to a committee is that they may be duly considered; but if we are ready to pronounce upon them the moment they are received, it is no disrespect to the petitioner that the prayer of his petition be forthwith rejected; and the promptness with which it is done may satisfy him that it is an unnecessary burden to himself to send it here again.

Mr. President, I take leave to say that the right for which I have been contending is one not peculiar to the North nor to the South. It is one in which every citizen of this republic is equally interested. It belongs exclusively to no State nor section of the Union. It is one in the preservation of which our Southern brethren are as deeply interested as we can possibly be. It is a right for the establishment of which, amongst others, our fathers made common cause, and poured out their blood together. Are the gentlemen from the South willing to sacrifice so great a principle, merely because a few fanatics seem disposed to abuse it? I beseech them to preserve the right inviolate, and let the public sentiment of the North correct the evil of which they so justly complain. That public sentiment, I undertake to say, is sound. This has been manifested by the movements of our citizens. No sooner were these crusades against the rights of the South commenced, than there was a spontaneous burst of indignation throughout the North. I speak from personal information and observation in relation to the State of New York. Public meetings of its citizens were held in every principal city and village, denouncing, in unmeasured terms, these incendiary attempts to disturb the peace of the Union, and to violate the rights of the States. These meetings were held without distinction of party. Political dissensions were hushed in the universal wish to put down this ill-judged and ill-timed agitation. This was the sentiment of all parties; and afterwards, when political meetings were held by the great political parties of the State, in reference to the fall elections, they did not fail to echo in their proceedings the sentiments which had been expressed at the general meetings which were held at an early day. The opinions of candidates for the Legislature, and other elective offices, were publicly and distinctly known on this subject, and received the approbation of the people, as manifested by the result of their suffrages.

There is, also, an almost entire unanimity of the public press on this subject. New York, on this occasion, has presented a spectacle scarcely known in her past history. The violence of her party politics has been somewhat proverbial. The bitterness of her press has, not unfrequently, been regretted. But its course on this exciting topic exhibited a kind of moral sublimity which has not been surpassed nor equalled. It has shown that when the great interests of the Union are involved and the constitutional rights of the States attempted to be violated, it can rise superior to all local or political considerations, and sustain the principles on which the compromises of the constitution were founded. Yes, sir, the public press of New York was loud in its denunciations of these abolition movements. Friends and opponents of the administration vied with each other in reprobating these incendiary efforts. I know of no presses there, except those owned by, or in the immediate interests of, the abolitionists, but what speak the same language. When you see the presses that express the views of the great political parties into which the people of the State are divided uniting on this subject, and representing the feelings of the great mass of the people throughout the State, can it be doubted that the public sentiment of that people is sound? If more evidence were wanted, I might refer to the recent message of the Governor to the Legislature of the State. Knowing his sentiments as I do, and supposing they were familiarly known to every one who has taken an interest in this question, I was not a little surprised to hear his conduct arraigned before this Senate, by the Senator from Alabama, in reference to his correspondence with the late Governor of that State.

Perhaps I misapprehended the remarks of that Senator. I shall be glad to hear that I did, and will cheerfully give way for any explanation he may wish to make.

Mr. MOORE. In reference to the correspondence alluded to, I did not intend to commend the Governor of Alabama, nor censure the Governor of New York.

Mr. TALLMADGE. Will the Senator inform me whether he approves of the demand made by the Governor of Alabama on the Governor of New York, and of the reasons for such demand?

Mr. MOORE. I approve of his sentiments in relation to the abolitionists. But, in regard to the particular inquiry put to me, I can only say that the late Governor of Alabama is a lawyer, and I am not. I will not undertake to give a legal opinion. The fault I find with the Governor of New York, is, that whilst he was expressing such strong disapprobation of the movements of the abolitionists, he did not recommend legislative enactments to put them down.

Mr. TALLMADGE. I understand the Senator, then, to approve of that which we all approve of; and as to the residue of Governor Gayle's doctrines, his answer is non mi ricordo.

The case alluded to, said Mr. T., is simply this: Governor Gayle made a demand of Governor Marcy to deliver up to the authorities of Alabama the editor of an abolition paper in New York, as a fugitive from justice—a man who was then, and long had been, a citizen and resident of New York, but who had fled from justice from a State within whose limits he had never been! To state the case is to show its absurdity, and I will not weaken the force of the able and eloquent answer of the Governor of New York by any further remark of mine. But let us look to his recent message to the Legislature, and see if he is so obnoxious to the remark of the Senator from Alabama. This message has been universally read and approved. Honorable gentlemen from the South have frankly said it contained all that Southern men could reasonably ask or desire. After adverting at great length to the movements of the abolitionists, and the consequences which must follow from them, he adds:

“Relying on the influence of a sound and enlightened public opinion to restrain and control the misconduct of the citizens of a free Government, especially when directed, as it has been in this case, with unexampled energy and unanimity to the particular evils under consideration, and perceiving that its operations have been thus far salutary, I entertain the best hopes that this remedy, of itself, will entirely remove these evils, or render them comparatively harmless. But if these reasonable expectations should, unhappily, be disappointed; if, in the face of numerous and striking exhibitions of public reprobation, elicited from our constituents by a just fear of the fatal issues in which the uncurbed efforts of the abolitionists may ultimately end, any considerable portion of these misguided men shall persist in pushing them forward to disastrous consequences, then a question, new to our confederacy, will necessarily arise, and must be met. It must then be determined how far the several States can provide, within the proper exercise of their constitutional powers, and how far in fulfilment of the obligations resulting from their federal relations they ought to provide, by their own laws, for the trial and punishment, by their own judiciaries, of residents within their limits, guilty of acts therein, which are calculated and intended to excite insurrection and rebellion in a sister State. Without the power to pass such laws, the States would not possess all the necessary means for preserving their external relations of peace among themselves, and would be without the ability to fulfil, in all instances, the sacred obligations which they owe to each other as members of the federal Union. Such a power is the acknowledged attribute of sovereignty, and the exercise of it is often necessary to prevent the embroiling of neighboring nations. The general Government is at this time exercising that power to suppress such acts of the citizens of the United States, done within its jurisdiction, in relation to the belligerent authorities of Mexico and Texas, as are inconsistent with the relations of peace and amity we sustained towards those States. Such a power, therefore, belonged to the sovereignty of each of the States, before the formation of the Union, and, as far as regards their relation to each other, it was not delegated to the general Government. It still remains unimpaired, and the obligations to exercise it have acquired additional force from the nature and objects of the federal compact. I cannot doubt that the Legislature possesses the power to pass such penal laws as will have the effect of preventing the citizens of this State and residents within it from availing themselves, with impunity, of the protection of its sovereignty and laws, while they are actually employed in exciting insurrection and sedition in a sister State, or engaged in treasonable enterprises, intended to be executed therein."

These sentiments will, without doubt, be responded to by the Legislature. They are worthy of a Chief Magistrate who is worthy to preside over more than two millions of people. If public sentiment at the North be sound, if it be such as I have described it, is it desirable that it be kept so? One would suppose that to this interrogatory there would be a universal response from the South. How is it to be kept thus sound? I will tell you, sir. Let gentlemen cease to agitate the question; suffer the excitement to go down, which is only kept up by the ill-directed efforts of those here who profess the greatest horror of the abolitionists, and the cause in which they are engaged; and, above all, do not deny to them, or to any citizens, the right of petition. As they have no ground of principle to stand on, do not give them such a ground, by denying to them that which every citizen has the right to claim. We can adopt no surer mode to create abolitionists. We can do no act that would please them so well. They are anxiously looking for this indiscretion, nay, this infatuation, on our part; and let me say to Southern gentlemen that their friends at the North are watching, with equal anxiety, our decision on this question. They know its effect, they foresee its consequences, and would most willingly avert them. Let me say to them that we are the best judges on this subject. We know the feelings of our own people best; and if they are sincere in their desire, as I doubt not they are, to put down this agitation, let them not refuse to receive these petitions whenever they are presented. Let them not invade so great a principle; there are those whom such an invasion will arouse, when nothing else can reach them. Let them be assured that the great body of the people is with them—but violation of so great a principle as that involved in the right of petition may turn their thoughts into a different channel. It was not the paltry tax on tea which gave the impulse to the ball of the Revolution; but it was the principle involved which first rocked the cradle of American liberty. Give the abolitionists no such advantage, and you may safely rely on the public sentiment of the North; that sentiment which pervades the breast of every man who loves his country and reveres her institutions; that sentiment which restrains him from interfering in this delicate matter, even though he may suppose he has the constitutional power to do so; that sentiment which imposes voluntarily upon its possessor restraints far more to be relied on than all the restraints which parchment ever imposed.

Mr. President, I have felt it my duty to say this much on this subject; and I cannot but express the hope that the decision of the Senate will be such as to preserve in violate the great right of petition, the inalienable right of every American citizen; the inheritance from his English ancestors; one of the privileges of the people extorted from King John by the Barons at Runnemede, reasserted by the famous petition of rights in the reign of Charles I, and permanently established by the celebrated declaration of rights, which was the signal of the overthrow of James II, and with him the downfall of the house of Stuart. From that memorable period to the present time, this right has never been questioned either by the King or the Parliament of Great Britain. And scarcely threescore years have elapsed since the same principle was established by the great charter of our liberties; and shall the American Senate be the first to deny to the citizens of this republic that which is granted by the monarchy of England to all its subjects? I trust not; and I hope I may never see the day when the altar of American freedom shall not burn with as pure a flame as that of any land under heaven.

Mr. SWIFT argued that Congress have some power over the subject of slavery in the District, at least to regulate and modify it. He inferred from this that these petitions ought to be received. He regarded the disparaging language used in relation to some of these petitioners, especially among Mr. S's constituents, as not at all applicable. They were neither meddlers nor fanatics.

Mr. NILES now rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Sir, I did not intend, at an earlier day, to have taken any part in this debate; I was opposed to agitating this question here, and was prepared to have given these petitions almost any direction which would have prevented discussion and the agitation of the question here. I would have voted to lay these petitions on the table, or to have referred them to a committee, with or without instructions to report upon them, as I had no fears but what any judicious committee of the Senate would have made a report calculated to quiet the existing excitement, and to exert a salutary influence on the public mind. But a different course has been pursued, and a debate has been commenced, and is evidently, on this or some other question, to be continued; I have, therefore, felt it a duty which I owe to my constituents and the country to offer some few remarks on this exciting and delicate subject. This discussion, sir, has hitherto come mainly from one quarter, and appears to have proceeded on a great misapprehension of the real state of public sentiment in that section of the Union from whence danger seems to be apprehended. To correct this misapprehension, and disabuse public sentiment, so far as it may be influenced by any thing said or done here, is my principal object.

Before entering on this task, however, (said Mr. N.,) I wish to make one suggestion. What is the object of discussing this subject here; or the various questions connected with it? What beneficial results are expected from it? I make these inquiries because I perceive that, on the part of some gentlemen, there seems a determination to discuss the subject of slavery generally, or at least so far as relates to this District. Resolutions have been introduced presenting, for the consideration of the Senate, sundry abstract questions in relation to this subject, and the constitutional powers of Congress. These resolutions are not now under consideration, and I have alluded to them only as evidence of a disposition to press on the Senate a general, and, I apprehend, unprofitable debate. What is the object of such debate? Is it to settle constitutional or other general principles, and thus put this question at rest? If this is the purpose, I think it will fail. Sir, I have no belief in the utility of the discussion of abstract propositions, totally disconnected with legislation or any practical results. I have no faith, sir, in settling constitutional questions by resolutions, or the discussion of them, which for years past have consumed so much of the time of the Senate. Nor do I believe, sir, that any other abstract principles, to regulate the action of Congress, or the people, can be established by resolutions, however extensively or ably they may be debated.

I well remember, and I presume it is not forgotten by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, a resolution introduced by a Senator from the State I have the honor in part to represent some years since. It was a resolution, I believe, in relation to the public lands, which, in the ordinary course of business, would not have occupied the attention of the Senate one hour, perhaps not fifteen minutes. From some magic power, of which I have no knowledge, that simple resolution in relation to the public lands, (not a very abstract subject in itself,) was transformed into a text for a most voluminous commentary on the theory and principles of this Government. If I mistake not, this debate, which called forth the most profound talent and great erudition, occupied a large portion of one session of Congress. Of the evils of that debate I forbear to speak; but what benefit the country ever derived from it I have never been able to learn, on the most diligent inquiry, unless it be that it conferred on the name of the honorable Senator, who was the unintentional cause of that debate, a most unenviable notoriety. Sir, I believe at that time, not only every man, but every woman and child, in the country were familiar with the name of Mr. Foot and his resolution; yet, notwithstanding this, I believe that gentleman had very little to do with his resolution; and although he always appears to have regarded it as a very dear child, yet the care and protection of it seems to have fallen into other and abler hands. After the failure of this great experiment, I am surprised that any one should think of settling constitutional questions by resolutions. Surely, sir, we ought to draw some lessons of wisdom from the past; and when we are about to make a similar attempt, it may be well to remember the issue of the first great experiment.

But if the object of this discussion is not to settle abstract principles, I would ask what it is. Is it to quiet the public mind, and to put a stop to agitation? If I understood the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, he declared this to be his purpose. If so, I am happy to say that I can go with the gentleman heart and soul. I believe that the peace and best interests of the country, both at the North and the South, require that this agitation should cease, the public mind be tranquilized, and confidence restored. But how do gentlemen propose to obtain this desirable end? Why, it would seem, sir, that they propose to stop the agitation of this exciting question among the people by agitating it here.

[Mr. CALHOUN rose to explain. He said he had not urged on a debate—he had done nothing to cause a debate—he had only made the question that the petition be not received; and, if a debate had ensued, he was not responsible for it, but those who had opposed his motion.]

Mr. NILES. I did not allude particularly to that gentleman; my remarks had a more general application. The Senator from South Carolina made a motion, which he certainly had a right to make; and, although a debatable one, he is not particularly chargeable for the discussion which has taken place; nor can I say that he has himself partaken largely in this discussion. But the debate has come principally from one quarter; and until the speech, the other day, from the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HILL,] almost entirely. I alluded to the fact of this debate having been continued mainly by those who profess to feel great alarm at the agitation of this question.

Sir, I believe that the agitation of this subject here will promote agitation elsewhere, and tend to keep the public mind in an excited and feverish state.

And here I must be permitted to express some astonishment that gentlemen urge a discussion, whilst they avow that their object is to prevent agitation. When I hear that this is their object, asserted in the most solemn manner, I am bound to believe it. I trust the gentlemen are sincere; at the same time I must be permitted to say that the means by which they seek to attain their end appear to me very extraordinary. Was it not for descending from the gravity of the subject, I would say that it reminded me of a person I have heard of in my section of the country. A man who was very pugnacious and quarrelsome, who was constantly wrangling with his neighbors, yet always insisted that he loved peace; and so great was his anxiety for it, that he declared he would have peace with his neighbors if he had to fight for it. If I understand the views of some honorable gentlemen, they seem disposed to agitate this question for the very purpose of preventing agitation.

[Mr. CALHOUN wished to ask the gentleman whether he doubted the sincerity of his declaration, when he asserted that he was opposed to agitating the question.]

Mr. NILES. I do not doubt the gentleman's sincerity, when he so solemnly declares that he is opposed to agitating the abolition question here; yet I must claim the right to make such inferences from the course and the acts of that gentleman and his friends as I think they authorize.

Sir, I hope, most sincerely hope, there is no disposition any where in the North or in the South to connect this exciting subject with the party politics of the day. That there is no such intention here we are fully assured. But is there no such intention elsewhere? Sir, I am sorry to say that I fear there is. I cannot shut my eyes to occurrences of general notoriety; I cannot resist the evidence of my senses. I fear there is a spirit of mischief at work in a certain quarter at the South as well as the North; it is, I hope, in both sections, confined to a small number of individuals.

It is a fact of general notoriety that there is a press in this city, the one to which the Senator from New Hampshire referred, professedly devoted to the interests of a certain party at the South, which has long labored, with a zeal and perseverance worthy of a better cause, to agitate the public mind on the slave question, whilst it has sought to alarm the South by the grossest misrepresentations of public sentiment at the North; by magnifying the number and influence of the abolitionists; by representing them as connected with a political party, in the face of the most notorious facts, it has endeavored to encourage the abolitionists to persevere in their mischievous designs. There are also presses at the South devoted to the same party, which have pursued a similar course. Whilst these mischievous vehicles have professed the utmost abhorrence of the designs of the Northern abolitionists, and to feel the greatest alarm at the tendency of their incendiary publications, they have at the same time given a circulation through their own papers to the very worst of these publications, under a pretence of exhibiting their enormities. These papers have been circulated in the slave States, and are supported by a certain party in that section of the Union. It has been asserted by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that he has no fears from the circulation of the tracts and other publications of the abolition societies at the South; that such is the state of things there, it is impossible they should be circulated. In this, I presume, the Senator is correct; and it is therefore fair to conclude that the principal circulation which these mischievous publications have received in the slave States has been through the columns of political papers professing to apprehend the greatest danger from the movements of the Northern abolitionists, and to feel the greatest abhorrence of their publications. How is this inconsistent and absurd conduct to be accounted for, except by supposing that there are agitators at the South who are attempting to create an excitement on the question of slavery for political purposes? These same vehicles have been urging on the South the most dangerous and preposterous measures, as being necessary for the security of the slaveholding States; measures which, if not revolutionary in their character, have an obvious tendency to such results.

Sir, if there are such mischievous agents at the South, who are seeking to build up a sectional party, by appealing to the fears of the people in the slave States, and misrepresenting public sentiment at the North, they are more execrable and more dangerous than the Northern abolitionists. Sir, a Southern convention has been advocated by these men. And what can be the design of such a convention, but to increase the existing excitement, to irritate the public sensibility, and to blow the enkindling flame into a consuming fire? Can such a measure spring from sober and discreet counsels? Can it be called for to devise measures for the protection of their interests exposed by the mad schemes of the abolitionists? I think no intelligent and candid man will maintain this.

There is another measure proposed at the South by a very different set of men, and whose motives I would be the last to impugn. It is, that the Legislatures of the slaveholding States have a right to demand of the non-slaveholding States the punishment of acts committed by citizens of the latter within their own jurisdiction. In a report adopted by the Legislature of South Carolina, this principle is asserted and maintained; and, in another State sustaining an elevated rank in the confederacy, there is a discussion now going on in relation to the same principle:

"Your committee would be inclined to recommend to this Legislature to make an explicit demand on the non-slaveholding States, for the passage of penal laws by their Legislatures, providing for the punishment of the incendiaries within their limits, who are engaged in an atrocious conspiracy against our right of property and life.

"We concur entirely in the view which our own Executive takes of the grounds on which our right to demand the enactment of such conservative legislation rests. Apart from those obligations, resulting from the constitutional compact which unites these States, and which makes it the imperative duty of one member of this confederacy not to allow its citizens to plot against the peace, prosperity, and happiness, of another member, there is no principle of international law better established than that, even among foreign nations, such atrocious abuses are not to be tolerated, except at the peril of that high and ultimate penalty, by which a brave and free people vindicate their rights."

As rights and duties must be reciprocal, the right to make such demand presupposes the obligation to obey it. But supposing it is not obeyed, as it most assuredly would not be, what is then to be done? When one independent State makes demands of another, of the redress of some wrong done to it, which is refused, it then must seek redress in its own way. And the right to make the demand supposes the concomitant right to seek the redress.

We have heard something in a recent report, I hardly know what, about a sort of international law which is applicable to the States. This is to me a new and strange doctrine, and, as I have no faith in it, I shall not undertake to examine it. Can a State, acting in its sovereign capacity, commit an aggressive act against the rights of another State, which will render it necessary for the latter, acting in its sovereign capacity, to seek redress? To state such a proposition is to refute it. If any State should so far forget its obligations to the Union, and to its co-States, as by law, or otherwise, to commit any aggressive act against another State, such law would be unconstitutional and void, and could afford no justification to the persons executing it, who would be amenable in their individual capacity in the federal courts, or the courts of the State injured, if they committed any illegal act within its jurisdiction.

Can the citizens of one State, whilst residing within its jurisdiction, commit any aggressive or illegal act against another State or the citizens thereof? It is clear to my mind that they cannot. What relations, then, can ever exist between the States to which the gentleman's [Mr. CALHOUN'S] principles of international law can apply?

I admit, however, that the citizens of one State may be guilty of an improper and unjustifiable interference in the local concerns and interests of another, and I will not deny but that there might be a case in which it would be proper for such State to restrain and punish such conduct by legal enactments. But this never can be demanded as a right; it must emanate from a spirit of comity and that sense of justice which the councils of every State must be supposed to entertain, relative to what is due to its associate States in the confederacy. If such evils exist, it must be conceded that the State where they exist is the rightful and best judge of the most suitable and efficacious means to repress them, and it is to be presumed that she will not want the disposition to apply those means. This mutual confidence the States must repose in each other; it is the cement of the Union, and should the time ever arrive when it becomes generally impaired and destroyed, I shall despair of long preserving that political system which ought to be the pride and boast of every American, as it is the admiration of every enlightened lover of liberty on the face of the earth.

Having briefly alluded to what I believe to be errors in one quarter, I will now proceed to notice those in another, and to bear my humble testimony to what I consider to be the true state of public sentiment on this interesting subject at the North. In speaking of the North, as I may do for brevity's sake, I wish to be understood as intending my remarks primarily for the State which I have the honor in part to represent; yet I think I may say, in the language of the almanac makers, that with little or no variation they will be equally applicable to the neighboring States.

On this point I feel more confidence, and shall boldly speak the things which I know, and bear testimony to the things which I believe.

Sir, I apprehend that public opinion on the slave question at the North, both here and in the slave States, is greatly misunderstood; and that by some, as I have already said, it is grossly misrepresented. From these two causes, I fear, great evils may follow, unless the truth is made to appear. This I shall endeavor to do, so far as respects the State whence I come. I shall fearlessly give the whole truth, as I understand it, let it cut where it may or whom it may.

Why is it that, at this time, there is so much excitement and so much alarm in the slave States regarding public opinion at the North, in relation to their peculiar institutions and interests? It is owing to the conduct of a small class of men who call themselves abolitionists, and who have formed themselves into societies, the better to prosecute their designs. That the conduct of these fanatics—for I think I shall show they deserve to be so considered—should have occasioned some excitement, is not at all surprising. It was perfectly natural, and probably unavoidable. At the same time I do not hesitate to declare, as my solemn conviction, that the general state of public sentiment at the North, in relation to the subject of slavery, in all its aspects and bearings, was never sounder since the establishment of this Government than it is at this moment. If I am correct in this position, as I shall endeavor to show that I am, the danger to the South, if any, can be nothing more than what is to be apprehended from the immediate acts of the abolitionists, in attempting to circulate their inflammatory publications within those States.

But we have been told, by the Senator from South Carolina, that this is not the evil which is apprehended; because, he says, it is impossible to circulate the publications of the abolitionists in those States. In what, then, does the danger consist? Why, the gentleman says, in agitation. It is the spreading of the sentiments of abolitionism in the non-slaveholding States, and the prevalence, among the people of those States, of opinions unfriendly, hostile, and injurious, to the institutions, to the rights, and to the character, of the people of the slave States. To prove that this is regarded as the source of the danger, I will again refer to the report from which I have once read:

"Let it be admitted that, by reason of an efficient police and judicious internal legislation, we may render abortive the designs of the fanatic and incendiary within our own limits, and that the torrent of pamphlets and tracts, which the abolition presses of the North are pouring forth, with an inexhaustible copiousness, is arrested the moment it reaches our frontier, are we to wait until our enemies have built up, by the grossest misrepresentation and falsehoods, a body of public opinion against us, which it would be almost impossible to resist, without separating ourselves from the rest of the social system of the civilized world? or are we to sit down content, because, from our own vigilance and courage, the torch of the incendiary and the dagger of the midnight assassin may never be applied?"

We are here informed that the danger which is apprehended is from the building up of a body of public opinion at the North, injurious to the South, and which cannot be resisted without separating the Southern States from the rest of the civilized world. But have the proceedings of the abolitionists done this? Have they tended to such a result? I think not; but their tendency has been directly to a contrary result. How have they been received? Have they not every where met with opposition? Have they not every where called forth the honest indignation of the people, the strongest expressions of their reprobation? That this has been the case, in the State whence I come, I shall endeavor to prove.

But gentlemen seem to look to erroneous sources to discover the public sentiment at the North. At one time we are told that the women at the North are all turning abolitionists; that they are signing petitions to Congress, praying for the abolition of slavery in this District. If this was true, there might be cause of alarm; for they are very apt to carry the men with them. I hope, however, it will not be supposed that the females in the cold climate at the North are opposed to union, or the Union; for I verily believe they are ardently attached to both. In respect to those who send their names here as petitioners, they belong to that small class who are always meddling with matters which they do not understand, and which do not properly belong to their province. They are of those who are more busy and more anxious about the morals and religion of their neighbors than they are about their own. They are of that class who, a few years since, were petitioning in behalf of the poor Indians; and if applied to by the same agents, would as readily sign a petition, praying Congress to appropriate the whole surplus revenue to send missionaries to Asia. I really hope, sir, no such petition will be sent here this session, as we have now at least three projects before us for disposing of this surplus, and thus saving the virtue of the people, which, in the opinion of some, seems exposed to sink beneath the corrupting influence of this alarming surplus.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia has discovered public opinion at the North from another source, more elevated, but scarcely entitled to more reliance, as an evidence of the general state of popular sentiment on the slave question. He has had sent to him a pamphlet, written by a distinguished divine in one of the Northern States, which favors the cause abolitionism. I have not seen that publication, and was not in my seat when the gentleman read certain extracts from it, and know not how far the writer carries his abolition notions. But I was surprised at the comments of the gentleman on this pamphlet. He stated that, from conversing with many intelligent gentlemen from the non-slaveholding States, from the proceedings of public meetings, and other sources of information, he had come to the conclusion that the general sentiment was sound at the North, until he received the pamphlet referred to; which led him to believe that something was rotten in Denmark.

[Mr. LEIGH said he had used no such language, nor conveyed any such sentiment.]

Mr. NILES. I do not profess to quote the gentleman's language; I have only stated what I believe to be the substance of what the Senator said as to the influence this pamphlet had on his mind. I claim the right to use my own language to state the substance of the gentleman's remarks, and to comment upon them. I think I am not mistaken as to the import of what the gentleman said.*

*Mr. LEIGH the next day read an account of this conversation or incident in a newspaper, and said that, according to that account of the occurrence, it would appear that he had been insulted, and had tamely submitted to it; although he did not then, nor did he now, believe the gentleman intended any insult. He repeated his disclaimer of using the language and sentiments imputed to him.

Mr. NILES said he had no intention to misrepresent the gentleman, or do him any injustice, or treat him with discourtesy. He had no experience here, and did not know what was the parliamentary rule; but supposed he had a right to put his own construction on the gentleman's speech, and comment upon it, leaving him to make such explanations or disclaimer as he saw fit.

Mr. LEIGH then asked the gentleman to state explicitly whether he intended to doubt the sincerity of his disclaimer of the language and sentiments ascribed to him.

Mr. NILES said he had already denied having any such intention; that he had never pretended to give the precise language made use of by the gentleman, but only the construction of which he thought it was susceptible.

Mr. LEIGH replied that he had no further remarks to make, except that he was wonderstruck that any human being could put such a construction upon the portion of his remarks in question.

The following is an extract from Mr. LEIGH's speech, published in the National Intelligencer, understood to have been made out by Mr. L. himself. It is believed fully to justify the construction put upon it.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Why, sir, did the gentleman mean to be understood that he regarded the sentiments of one individual, however distinguished for learning or intelligence, as outweighing in his mind all the evidence he had received from all other sources? And why does the Senator attach so much importance to the opinions of one individual? Is it because he is a clergyman, and one eminent for talents and learning? If so, he has but little knowledge of the character of the people.* Was the gentleman aware that, in looking to such a source, he was going into the very camp of the abolitionists? So far as I am informed, a large portion of the abolitionists are clergymen. He might, with nearly the same propriety, have read a tract of the abolition society, as most of those are probably written by clergymen, as evidence of Northern sentiments. However much the opinions of the clergy may be respected on subjects connected with their profession, on political questions, and all others relating to the interests of the country, there is no class of men whose opinions are more at variance with the general current of popular sentiment. The reason is obvious: they do not mix or take part with the people in secular concerns; their ideas are drawn from different sources, and their opinions are abstract and speculative. Those who seek for public opinion at the North must neither look above nor below the people, but they must look for it among the people themselves: they must direct their attention to the great mass; the men who toil and the men who think; the yeomanry, mechanics, and laborers; the men of hard hands, sound heads, and honest hearts. These classes constitute the great body of our citizens, and are nearly all sufficiently intelligent to form their own opinions on all questions regarding their own rights or duties, either as individuals, or as electors, interested in the concerns of the great republic.* I will now proceed to consider what I believe to be the general state of public sentiment among my constituents, in relation to the matter under consideration. The subject of slavery is a comprehensive one, and I cannot speak of public sentiment without analyzing it, as it embraces several distinct questions.

And I must say that I have never risen from the perusal of any book with a feeling of deeper sorrow. It has had the effect of weakening the chief remaining ground of hope in my mind, that the incendiary schemes of the abolitionists in the Northern States, the system of agitation they have organized, the war they are kindling against the peace and happiness of the South, and the harmony of the Union, would be effectually counteracted and suppressed by the efforts of our fellow-citizens of the non-slaveholding States."

Extract from the Globe.

"Since that debate, he had read a book entitled 'Slavery,' by a Mr. E. Channing, of Boston. He had never read any paper that filled his mind with a deeper sorrow. * * * This book (said Mr. LEIGH) has impaired in my breast the strong hope founded on the belief deduced from conversations with intelligent gentlemen from non-slaveholding States, that that intelligence and good sense would be exerted to suppress this cause of mischief and agitation throughout the Union."—Note by Mr. Niles.

* These sentiments may not accord with those of Mr. LEIGH, who once stated in a speech, if my recollection is correct, (as I have not the speech before me,) that those classes who were compelled to obtain a livelihood by labor occupied a position similar to that of the slave population; that they had not, and could not have, sufficient intelligence to be safely intrusted with the elective franchise, or any participation in the concerns of Government.—Note by Mr. Niles.

The first is, that of slavery, as it exists in several of the States in this Union, and the power of this Government over it. On this question it is necessary to say but a few words, as I am not aware that Northern sentiment differs at all from Southern sentiment. No one supposes that Congress can directly or indirectly interfere; and, with the exception of the small number of modern abolitionists, the opinion is scarcely less universal that the people of the non-slaveholding States have no right to interfere in any way with the local concerns, and the relations of master and slave, in other States. Domestic slavery is generally regarded as a political and social evil, but one with which the people where it does not prevail have no concern, any more than they have with political evils in Canada or Ireland. But it is not considered that the present generation at the South are responsible for the evils of slavery; nor is it believed that, in general, the condition of the slave population, in point of comfort, is worse than that of the free blacks of the North. Slavery is regretted as a political and social evil, in relation to its influence on society.

The second form of this question is, slavery in this District. The prevailing opinion is, that Congress have constitutional power to legislate in relation to slavery in this District. This opinion is not generally the result of examination, as the question has not been discussed; it has never been found necessary to discuss it, because very few have ever supposed that it would be proper or right for Congress to act on this subject whilst slavery exists in the surrounding States. What I have stated to be the common opinion, I must add, is my own opinion; but I do not intend to go into a discussion of this constitutional question. I will only say that the ingenious and able argument of the honorable gentleman from Virginia did not carry conviction to my mind. That argument was based on two assumptions, neither of which I think is true. The first is, that the power of Congress is derived from the cessions of the States of Virginia and Maryland, and is co-extensive with the power possessed by those States. This, I apprehend, is incorrect. The cessions conferred no power on Congress; they were nothing more than a relinquishment of the jurisdictions of those States; but such relinquishment did not transfer to, and invest in, Congress, the precise measure of power which they possessed, nor, indeed, any power at all. If any State were to cede to the United States a part of its territory, would such cession vest in Congress the same jurisdiction and power over it previously possessed by the State? It is evident it would not. The power of Congress is not derived from the cession, but from the constitution. A State can confer no power on Congress. The other assumption regards slaves in the light of property only. This, I apprehend, is incorrect; because their owners have not an absolute, unqualified, indefeasible, right of property. They have only an interest in their services; they are also regarded by the laws of all the States as human beings, so that there is something on which laws can operate besides the right of property. I do not like the language which speaks of slaves only as property; it sounds harsh to my ears; I much prefer the language of the constitution, which speaks of them as persons held to labor. I admit that, so far as regards the existing right of property in slaves, it cannot be destroyed by legislation, and I can go no farther.

But I leave this question; I do not deem it of as much importance as many seem to regard it. There are other, and, to my mind, equally insuperable objections to the abolition of slavery in this District, whilst it exists in the neighboring States. Are there no general principles which ought to control the action of Congress, except those of a constitutional nature? I think there are principles of higher authority and higher obligation: the great principles of justice and moral right. These principles existed before the constitution, and will survive it, unless that shall endure for ever. For Congress to abolish slavery in this District, against the will of the inhabitants, and whilst it exists in the adjoining States, I should regard as a palpable abuse of power, more censurable than a violation of the constitution in a case not entirely free from doubt. This would be an abuse of power involving a disregard of the great principles of justice and moral right. Such, I believe, are the prevailing sentiments of my constituents, who, for that reason, do not trouble themselves about the constitutional powers of Congress over slavery in this District.

I proceed now to speak of the third form in which the question of slavery presents itself—that of abolitionism. This consists of two kinds: abolitionism of the old school, and abolitionism of the new school. The former amounts to nothing more than a rational wish and desire for the emancipation of all persons held in bondage, and a disposition to advance that object by the diffusion of knowledge and the progress of society. Of this kind of abolitionists were Franklin and Jefferson; and there are many such at the North, and I presume at the South; and were it not for the difference in the two races—a difference existing in nature, which seems to interpose an insuperable barrier to that object—I should hope that the whole free population of the Union would be abolitionists in this sense.

Very different from these are the abolitionists of the new school. What are their principles? I judge of them from their own publications, which I have examined. They propose an immediate abolition of slavery, and against the will of those interested in it. They therefore propose to abolish slavery by violence. And this they design to effect in communities where they do not reside, and have no interests or sympathies with the inhabitants. Whatever may be their intentions, no rational person can doubt that their scheme has a tendency to insurrections, massacre, and a servile war.

They regard slavery as a theological question. They say it is a sin and a moral evil in the sight of God and man, and ought to be eradicated from the earth; and that it cannot be wrong to remove an evil. They aver that they have nothing to do with the consequences.

Can men be sane who avow principles like these, who are pursuing an object having the most important bearing on the vital interests of society, which exposes it to all the horrors of insurrection, massacre, and servile war, and yet declare that they have nothing to do with the consequences of their own acts? To call such men fanatics is too mild a term. I have no concern with their motives, but, like all other moral agents, they must be held responsible for the natural and obvious consequences of their own acts. This principle, true in morals, is not less so in politics. Is it to be wondered at that a scheme, based on a total recklessness of consequences, should have excited the almost universal indignation of an intelligent and moral people? Does any one suppose that this scheme of abolitionism can, under any circumstances, prevail to any extent among the people in any of the free States? It is impossible. That it has been discountenanced and reprobated by the people of the State I in part represent, I shall endeavor to show.

But there is reason to believe that there is one part of this scheme of abolitionism which has been kept more out of sight—that is, amalgamation. Their first movements appear to have been directed to this object, and were made in Connecticut. In 1832, some of these men, residing in another State, established a school in one of our towns for the education, in the higher branches, of colored females. It occasioned great excitement in the town, and some in the State. In 1833 a law was enacted by the Legislature, making it unlawful to set up any school in the State for the education of persons of color, without the consent of the selectmen of the town. In violation of this law, the school was continued, and a prosecution was commenced against the instructress, which was resisted on the ground that the law was a violation of the constitution of the United States, and the question was never brought to a final decision; but such was the honest indignation of the inhabitants of the town and vicinity, that the school was finally broken up.

The proceedings of the abolition society in the city of New York called forth an immediate and strong expression of indignant feeling in Connecticut, which was nearly universal.

The first public meeting was called in New Haven: it was large, and comprised the most distinguished and influential citizens of all parties. The Governor of the State presided. The resolutions adopted are strong and decided, and reprobate the principles and proceedings of the abolitionists in the strongest terms. I will read some of the resolutions, sufficient to show the views and sentiments of the meeting:

“Resolved, That we have witnessed, with mingled feelings of alarm and reprobation, the reckless course of some professed friends of the cause of freedom, whose efforts, under the mask of philanthropy, have infused gall and bitterness into our social system.

“Resolved, In the language of a report of a Committee of the House of Representatives, made in the second session of the first Congress which assembled under this constitution, and by that body ordered to be recorded in its journal: that Congress have no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or the treatment of them, in any of the States; it remaining with the several States alone to provide any regulations therein which humanity and true policy may require.

“Resolved, That no man, or combination of men, in one State, has the right to interfere with the constitutional rights or to violate the criminal laws of any other State in the Union, either by sending publications leading to insurrection in such States, or in any other manner; and that we hold it to be the duty of good citizens, by all lawful measures in their power, promptly to arrest such proceedings.

“Resolved, That the concurrent testimony of all parties in the Southern States, as well as that of the ministers of the gospel of all denominations among them, whose proceedings have been published, cannot fail to convince every reflecting man that the late proceedings of what are called the abolition and anti-slavery societies have a direct tendency to excite insurrection and dissolve the Union.

“Resolved, That as the mail of the United States was intended for common good, and is supported from the common treasury of the Union, any citizens who make use of it as the means of distributing publications hostile to the public tranquillity, and, under the presumption of secrecy and security, transmitted thereby, privately, incendiary documents that they would not dare to follow to their destination, are deserving of the reprobation of all good and patriotic men.

“Resolved, That, in responding to our fellow-citizens of Carolina, we are not insensible to the devoted zeal which she exhibited in the achievement of our national independence, and that the land of the Pinckneys, of Laurens, of Moultrie, of Marion, of Sumpter, and a host of other gallant men, who periled with our fathers ‘their lives, fortunes, and their sacred honor,’ in a common cause, deserve, as a right, not as a favor, the protecting influence and support of every Northern patriot.”

A public meeting of the citizens of Hartford was soon after called. For reasons, not necessary to mention here, it was not so generally attended as the meeting at New Haven; but the resolutions adopted did not the less speak the true sentiments of our citizens. I had the honor to be the organ of the committee which reported the resolutions that were adopted. There is one which expressly touches on the question of slavery in this District, to which I would particularly call attention. I will read some of the resolutions:

"Resolved, That the States, in confederating, retained all their rights, as independent sovereignties, except such as were expressly delegated to the Union; and among the rights reserved were those relating to all matters of a local and social nature, to private property, and the security and relations of persons, including those of master and slave—for at that period slavery existed in nearly all the States, and was sanctioned by their laws.

"Resolved, That, in view of these obvious principles, it is a violation of the spirit of the constitution for citizens of one State to enter into combinations (to give more energy to their efforts) for the avowed object of effecting a change in the institutions, laws, or social relations, of the people of other States, who, as regards all such matters, are as entirely independent communities as they would have been had they not entered into the confederacy.

"Resolved, That the conduct of the abolitionist societies, in publishing and distributing in the slaveholding States, in violation of their laws, newspapers and pamphlets, the natural and obvious tendency of which is to excite insubordination and insurrection among the slaves, and expose the country to all the horrors of a servile war, is highly censurable, and cannot fail of meeting the reprobation of every friend of his country. Such proceedings, being a violation of the spirit of the constitutional compact, are not more hostile to the peace of those States more immediately affected by them than dangerous to the general harmony and the preservation of the Union.

"Resolved, That it is the duty of all good citizens who love liberty and venerate our happy institutions, to discountenance all interference by the citizens of any State in the local interests and concerns of other States; that such interference in the relations of master and slave, and the interests connected therewith, is in an eminent degree reprehensible and dangerous. That we will use all legal and proper means, not incompatible with our rights, and those great principles of liberty, freedom of speech and the press, to repress and prevent any such interference, so unwarrantable in principle, and so dangerous in its consequences.

"Resolved, That we can see no good, but much evil, from agitating the question in any form, in the States not immediately interested; and that we should deprecate any action or proceeding by Congress regarding slavery in the District of Columbia; and, therefore, disapprove of the petition which we understand is in circulation among the people of this State, to be presented to the next Congress, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

"Resolved, That we regard the subject of slavery in the United States as solely a civil and political question; and, therefore, cannot see the propriety of its being taken up by religious communities, and treated as a moral or theological question; and, for the same reason, have viewed with regret and decided disapprobation the interference of some of the clergy, and especially those of a foreign country, in a matter involving such momentous political principles, and such important social rights."

Other public meetings were held (said Mr. N.) in different towns in the State, at which similar sentiments were expressed. But it is unnecessary to refer to them. The sentiments expressed by the citizens in the two largest towns in the State were responded to by the great body of our citizens with a unanimity seldom if ever witnessed. The public presses, of all descriptions, proclaimed the same opinions. I know of but one abolition meeting in the State, and that occurred since I left home. It was, I understand, disturbed and broken up by violence. These proceedings led to a call of a general meeting of the citizens of the town, which passed sundry resolutions, of which I will read two that may serve to show their sentiments:

"Resolved, That as, by the constitution of the United States, domestic slavery is left entirely and exclusively under the control of the individual States where the same exists, any interference of the other States, or the citizens thereof, with a view of dictating to the slaveholding States on this difficult and delicate subject, and particularly by insisting on an immediate abolition of domestic slavery, is a violation of the spirit of that constitution.

"Resolved, That this meeting, while it deprecates and will discountenance all tumultuous and disorderly proceedings on the great question of slavery, which now agitates the public mind, cannot but deem anti-slavery associations, formed for the purpose of disseminating, either by themselves or their special agents, the principles of immediate abolition of domestic slavery, in all the States of the Union where it exists, highly inexpedient, and injurious to the slaves themselves; and this meeting cannot, also, but consider the circulation of pamphlets and other publications, in the slaveholding States and elsewhere, denouncing all those holding slaves under the sanction of the laws of those States 'as man-stealers,' and representing, either in words or by pictures, all slaveholders, indiscriminately, as guilty of cruel and barbarous treatment of their slaves, to be highly reprehensible, calculated not merely to disturb the harmony of the States, but to promote a servile war, and to destroy the Union itself."

Is it supposed that the reckless principles and violent measures of modern abolitionists are calculated to build up a body of public sentiment at the North, unfriendly, injurious, and hostile, to the South? Far from it. Those who believe this know little of our population. Their tendency has been directly the contrary. They have aroused attention, and excited a spirit of inquiry, which have produced not only a reprobation of the violent measures of the abolitionists, but a decided and settled conviction that it is morally wrong for the people of one State to interfere, in any manner, in the local concerns of others, and especially in the delicate question of domestic slavery; that such interference has a direct tendency to destroy the confidence which should exist between the different sections of the confederacy, and thus to jeopardize the Union, which can be sustained only by public opinion.

That such has been the influence of the rash proceeding of these fanatics, in the State whence I come, I am fully assured. Previous to these events, there were some abolitionists among us. I know of some who are abolitionists no longer, or, at least, deem it prudent to keep their opinions to themselves.

Sir, I can state a fact that shows the force of public opinion, developed by the measures of the fanatics. A short time previous to their proceedings becoming known, petitions were sent into different parts of the State, to be circulated for signatures, and intended to be presented to Congress, praying for the abolition of slavery in this District. These were generally sent to clergymen; from my situation, in connexion with the mails, I was enabled to ascertain these facts. But, sir, not one of these numerous petitions has been sent here; there is not a single petition from Connecticut on the subject of slavery in this District. Sir, public opinion must be respected; the indignant voice of the people, aroused by the conduct of the abolitionists, put a stop to this movement. Does this look like building up a body of public sentiment favorable to the cause of abolitionism?
